So I say my kitchen is not small to me, because in at my door or my window comes the joy and beauty of the forest, the bigness of the sky, the out-dooriness of the world.

Places are small or big but relatively. It is always well to have windows to scrub as well as kitchens. How we should pity or else laugh at a man who should shut himself up in a cave and complain at want of sunshine and space!

Some of us women do that same thing. We get surrounded by our work, shut in; and leaving out the windows, the work which might have been joy and beauty becomes toil and drudgery.

Besides the trees, my kitchen has a fine outlook to the very tall chimney of the Cook County Hospital. From this chimney often rolls up a billowy mass of smoke. It goes with the wind, sometimes rolling quietly and majestically upward, or again curvetting and dividing, chased about like great playboys. Sometimes, as the sun goes down, the cloud of smoke rises into the blue sky all tinged with fire, a fit pathway for Apollo's sun-steeds, and one over which dewy Iris might speed in lack of a rainbow.

From this same little kitchen I see the ice men going their rounds, leaving the crystal winter; I see the banana men trundling their carts; the apple men and vegetable men, the newsboys, the fish man, the balloon man, the popcorn man, with his musical cadence, these and many more I seem to receive as friends of toil.

I see the back yards fill with the clean washed clothes; I see into people's morning lives; I see children at play, their blessed play, and they climb into the broken cart in the alley, and supply its missing wheel with my ash barrel, and they climb the telegraph poles and ride the fence, and scream and laugh, and wherever their young fresh play goes on, the world, whether park or alley, seems fresh and sweet to live in.

Meanwhile the birds fly in and out on my little porch; and I—I iron, or bake, or something else, and I do it feeling the kitchen to be large and roomy for the blessed largeness of the world.

But there are dearer and sweeter helps than these of the tree or the bird or the rolling smoke,—they are the helps of happy thoughts. It is wonderful how beautiful things are; a weed reveals divinity; the speck of dirt has in it the elements of sun and stars and cloud tints, and the blood that pulses in the warm heart of man.

But what is all this beauty of the beautifulness about us, when so much more is the beauty and joy and blessedness of love? Who of us so poor as not to have this wealth? What kitchen so little that love cannot enter? What "mind-cure" like the wondrous cure of love? How glorious all things become, how transmuted in the alchemy of love!

Do you call it scrubbing? It is making the dear one's home white. The work we do for love is something more than work. it is blessedness.

The world is so large, so beautiful, so full of possibility for love and service! It is very sad to miss its blessed largeness. But we do miss it if we get shut into a kitchen, or a parlor, a calling of any sort, and leave out the windows. We miss it if we even get shut into our own homes, however lovely they are, for the world is God's home, and He only comes in to us as we go out to Him in the bigger home of the lives around us. Then how grand life grows, how large our little part, large because touching the all.

How ready are hearts for hearts! and hands for hands! How a kind word, a loving look, a gentle sympathy, calls out love and cheer and blessing! How lovely people are! How good! I thank God each blessed day of life, not for health, nor home, nor wealth, nor poverty, nor all else so much, so deeply, so joyfully, as that we all have one another.

GRACE CURTIS.

From Jerusalem.

Our friend Mr. B. B. Wiley, of the Third church of this city, has had an interesting letter from a friend in Jerusalem, who with his wife removed to the ancient holy city some years ago in the belief that he was led and directed to do so, and that it was the spot of earth where they best could live a religious life. We found it a novel pleasure to see this epistle, straight from Jerusalem. We asked the privilege of printing the following passage:

"Our life flows on very peacefully and joyfully. Our household, consisting, with the children, of about twenty-five persons, is a wondrously united and happy one. From what has been already stated, you will see that we are not here as missionaries or 'teachers' or anything of that kind, but you will also be sure that in the midst of such a population as that which makes up Jerusalem there are abundant opportunities of ministering in every way to others, if there exists the heart to do it.

"Our house constitutes a kind of common meeting place for all classes—we make no differences—all are welcome. Not a day passes without many visitors. There is scarcely an evening in which there are not from five to twenty Mohammedans—of every class, from shepherds in sheep-skins to Effendis—visiting in the salon. Each Sunday many Greeks and Protestants come to see us. Every Saturday, for nearly four years, Jews have come (rarely less than fifty—sometimes over two hundred—last Saturday there were more than a hundred and sixty) to hear us sing. We make no attempts to proselyte among any class—we distribute no tracts—we begin no discussions. But we are known to be Christians, and if there is anything in the life they see lived in our house, in the words spoken, the treatment received, which attracts, Christ has the praise. The most powerful sermons, we find, are not the spoken, but the lived ones.

"Among all these classes, Mohammedans, Jews, Greeks, Catholics, Copts, Protestants, we have many friends, who never tire in manifestations of friendliness and affection. Never a night passes in which fellaheen (i.e., peasantry from the villages) do not make our house a stopping place. We have a guest chamber for them, and give them their supper. They often show their appreciation of it in little gifts—a few dry figs, flowers, nuts, etc.,—and when we return their visits and go to their villages, as we sometimes do, there is nothing they have which is too good for us.

"Jerusalem has greatly changed in appearance since we have been here, now almost six years. A very large amount of building is constantly going on, in large part for the accommodation of the constantly incoming Jews. A majority of the 45,000 people in Jerusalem are now Jews. The Latins (Catholics) and Greeks are always prosecuting great building enterprises—churches, schools, hospitals, and hospices for the accommodation of pilgrims. The Greeks, backed by the Russian government, and the Latins, are each, with desperate energy and great outlays, seeking to obtain a preponderating plant and hold upon this land."

THE STUDY TABLE.

The Humboldt Library. J. Fitzgerald, Publisher, New York.

The number for April is devoted to two papers by Herbert Spencer, entitled, "The Genesis of Science" and "The Coming of Age of the 'Origin of Species.'" For May the contents is fourteen papers by Richard A. Proctor beginning with "Notes on Earthquakes," and treating such subjects as "Photographing Fifteen Million Stars," "The Story of the Moon," "The Falls of Niagara," "Sun Worship," "Science and Politics," "Parents and Children." The last named discusses the law of heredity in its relation to the training of children. The Humboldt Library is one of the most excellent of publications. It is an excellent idea thus to publish from month to month, at $1.50 a year or fifteen cents a number, pamphlets of 40 to 50 pages which have not the varied and often salad-like character of an ordinary magazine, but consist of real treatises or else of a collection of articles all bearing on one topic or on one kind of subject. For example, number 22 consists of a treatise 47 pages long, by the lamented Professor Clifford, on "Seeing and Thinking," with the following table of contents: "The Eye and the Brain," "The Eye and Seeing," "The Brain and Thinking," "Of Boundaries in General." Number 65 has articles by the same author on some of the "Conditions of Mental Development," "Aims and Instruments of Scientific Thought," "A Lecture on Atoms," "The First and Last Catastrophe." Number 88 gives a paper on "Science and Crime," by Andrew Wilson, and adds sundry scientific articles such as "About Kanga-roos," "On Giants," "Leaves," etc. Examples of entire treatises are given by numbers 46 and 52, which are works by Ribot of great interest, one on "The Diseases of the Will," the other on "The Diseases of the Memory." The work on the Will treats of its impairment by lack of impulsion and by excessive impulsion; of the impairment of voluntary attention; of the realm of caprice; and of the utter extinction of will. The work on Memory treats of its subject as a biological fact; of general amnesia, which means forgetfulness; of partial amnesia; of exaltation of amnesia, learnedly called hypermnesia. The last chapter treats of the relations of memory to nutrition, circulation, quantity and quality of the blood, etc. Examples of treatises of a different kind are given in numbers 67 and 72, both by Dr. Hecker: "The History of the Black Death," the deadly pestilence in Europe in the fourteenth century, and "The Dancing Mania of the Middle Ages." Each issue of the Humboldt Library has a good table of contents at the end. We repeat that such an enterprise does excellent service for thoughtful readers.

P. Terenti Afri Adelphæ. Text with Stage Directions. By Henry Preble, Tutor of Latin and Greek, Harvard College. Boston: Ginn & Co.

This is the Latin text of this witty play of Terence, with the stage directions in English. As the Latin poet has not condescended to give the directions himself, after the manner of modern playwrights, the directions added by a scholar have all the force of explanatory notes, and make the play vivid to the reader's imagination, and also plain where it would be blind or difficult. We quote the opening stage direction, which is the longest and sets forth the scene clearly: "Scene—street in Athens. Back of stage represents two adjoining houses. The larger, to the right of the spectators, belongs to Micio, and has a large door near the center of the stage and a smaller door to the right. The smaller house to the left is Sostrata's, and has but one door. The street leads on the left to the harbor, and on the right to the Forum (market-place, Agora); a lane also on the right, but towards the rear leads to the country. There is also a lane on the left. In the middle of the stage an altar. Enter Micio from the front door of his house. Calls as he comes out: "Storax! (No answer. Soliloquizes). Non rediit hac nocte a Cena Æschinus," etc. The play is thickly strewn with directions which show the action and the connection of the speeches, such as "Pauses a moment," "Aside to spectators," "Threateningly," "Parmeno takes position by Sannio," "Parmeno strikes Sannio," "Soliloquizes, not noticing the others," etc., etc. At the beginning of act second stands the following: "Sannio rushes in from the market-place pursued by Æschinus with Bacchis, and followed by the slaves (Storax, Parmeno, etc.)." These examples show with what vivacity the play is helped for the reader by such directions. A table of metres is appended.

Poetry as a Representative Art. By George Lansing Raymond, L. H. D. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co.

This is a solid, careful book of 350 pages, which is truly characterized by its title, and yet not completely. It is the author's aim throughout to show that poetry, being an expression of thought by various qualities of sound, including rhythm, must use verbal expression in such manner as not merely to utter the thought in words, but furthermore to represent or express it in the sounds and movements of the lines. This thesis the author develops in 18 chapters on such topics as "Poetry and Primitive Language," "Force as the Source and Interpreter of Poetic Measures," "The Sacrifice of Sense to Sound," "Meanings of Words as Developed by Association and Comparison," "Poetic and Unpoetic Words," "Prose and Poetry; Presentation and Representation in its Various Forms," "Pure Representation in the Poetry of Homer," "Representation in Poems Considered as Wholes," "The Useful Ends of Poetic Representation." The author illustrates with a wealth of poetic examples, ancient and modern. The following quotations, from the middle of the book, will allow the author to express the purposes of the volume in his own words: "The theory underlying all that has been said thus far is, that poetry is an artistic development of language; its versification of the pauses of natural breathing; its rhythm and tune of the accents and inflections of ordinary conversation; and the significance in its sounds of ejaculatory and imitative methods actuating the very earliest efforts of our race at verbal expression. The inference suggested has been that these effects produced by sound are legitimate in poetry because, like language, and as a part of it, and far more significantly than some forms of it, they represent thought." . . . "No effects produced by sound are legitimate in poetry, which fail in any degree to represent thought." (p. 150). "It is because of the exceeding difficulty of perfectly adjusting sound to thought and thought to sound till, like perfectly attuned strings of a perfect instrument, both strike together in all cases so as to form a single chord of a perfect harmony, that there are so few great poets." (p. 151.) The following judgment is interesting: "It is doubtful whether, amid all eulogy and abuse which have greeted all the works of Robert Browning, any one, in private or in print, has ever told him plainly what those faults are—all so easy to correct—but for which the man with the greatest poetic mind of the age would be—what now he is not—its greatest poet." (p. 171). We have read this book through slowly, for it is a book to study. This is the same as saying that no real justice to it can be done in a little notice. The book is worthy of an extended analytical review. Any one who will study it carefully will find himself better furnished to enjoy the masterpieces of poetry.

Waste-Land Wanderings. By Charles C. Abbott, M.D. New York: Harper & Bros. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co.

This volume of 312 pages is written in the same entertaining style as the author's "Upland and Meadow," but is a description of his wanderings on Crosswicks Creek instead of Poet-quissings. The book is divided into nine chapters, having as titles the names of the different parts of the explored creek,—like "At Linden Bend," "Watson's Crossing," "Dead Willow Bend," "The Twin Islands," "The Landing," etc. Each chapter is divided into many smaller heads, as, for example, in chapter VII under the general title of "Mill Creek," are "A Lonely Sand-piper; Tree-climbing, its Merits and Disadvantages; Wood-tattlers, a Nest of these Birds destroyed by a Bull-frog; Meadow-mice; Bush-nests of White-footed Mice; Etheostomoids; Mythical Fish described by Early Writers; Bill-fish; Sudden Changes of the Weather." And in chapter VIII he speaks of "Cowpen-birds; Early Navigation of Crosswicks Creek; Snowy Owls; Golden Club; Traces of Indian Occupation of the Place; Velvet Ant; Burrows of Animals; Food of Eels," etc. The author apparently has a poor opinion of the naturalists of olden times, for after showing the unworthiness of many of the old sayings about the weather, he says: "It may be rash to say that meteorological science can gain nothing from scientific observation of animal life; but the character of the weather-lore that has been handed down from father to son for the past two centuries plainly indicates that the observations which gave rise to them were anything but scientific in character. Mankind now, as formerly, may be close observers of Nature, but this does not imply that they are accurate observers. . . . The simple and sad fact derived from a study of local animal weather-lore is that, in the days of our grandfathers, painstaking naturalists were few and far between." Mr. Abbott has the quick eye of the true naturalist, and sees many things that an ordinary observer would pass. For this he has been censured, and he replies: "It is true, sights and sounds crowd upon each other till I am bewildered. Could I have seen less, I should have learned more. I have never dared to recount the adventures of a single day. The sleepiest twenty-four hours of the year is more exciting than a battle-field, if one has the will to use his eyes and ears. I have seen too much. Alas! it is the one fact that saddens me, wherever I ramble." At the back of the book is a very thorough index, covering some ten pages, printed in double columns. The book is neatly bound and well printed. It is a work which will be welcomed by all lovers of Nature, and it should find a place in every school library.

The Art of Reading Latin. How to Teach It. Boston: Ginn & Co.

A little pamphlet with the above title has been lately put forth by W. G. Hale, professor of Latin in Cornell university. The pamphlet is not much larger than a common almanac, and yet so full of excellence, so ripe in thought and suggestions concerning the teaching of Latin, that, were its size to be measured by its worth it would be a ponderous tome.

Very briefly, but very clearly, Professor Hale shows that as Latin is usually taught it is and ever must be a dead language. This usual method is laboriously and with much torture, at length to enable the student of Latin to manage to turn a good Latin sentence into a poor English one. Mr. Hale proposes to have a scholar read Latin just as a Roman youth would have done, to accustom himself to the construction and arrangement of sentence, and to bend to Latin form. He shows the folly of the common rule. "First find the subject, then the predicate." Mr. Hale would leave the Latin as it is, and train the scholar to read it in its own order, in true Latinity. He gives many examples of class exercises, so suggestive that it is hard to praise them too much. They show plainly that teachers have it in their power, by right methods, to enable their pupils to acquire ready command of Latin.

Professor Hale says, that at the end of two years' work he finds it practicable for the class to devote itself to study of the Latin literature without translation into English.

In this way it is easy to see that the life and soul of the text is left in,—and in no other way can it be. Laboriously to translate Cicero's orations, or anything else Latin, into pure English is to destroy its meaning and the student's appreciation.

If Latin study is to be a hapless meandering hither and thither through the Latin sentence to capture a subject and ever fleeing predicate, and then the proper modifiers, until, at last, the train is coupled and on its true English track, surely it would be better to drop it. From some experience in teaching Latin we know that students become interested in the language in the measure that they succeed in dropping their own tongue and following the author in Latin without the intervention of English.

THE HOME.

A Youthful Contractor.

Last summer there came to our house a young gentleman from the newsboy rank of life who had reached the mature age of ten years, and went by the name of Jim. Jim persuaded my little boy, aged eight, that he had found an excellent opening for a young man, that fitted exactly the abilities of my son. He thought it would yield him money enough to tide him over till Christmas, if he was frugal. Of course such an opportunity was not to be refused, so without consulting any of the family, my boy joined his new-found friend in walking down to Washington Park, two miles away, on one of the big race days. On reaching there Jim gave him a horse to hold, while he himself looked up a few more innocents. Jim finally secured six more, and engaged them on the same liberal promises. He placed each one of them at the head of a horse, and there among more than a hundred restless, fly-bitten, stamping creatures, these little fellows stayed at their task until the last race had been run, and the sun had gone down the horizon. Then as fast as the owners came for their steeds, each little chap received from Jim the magnificent sum of five cents, and they two miles from home. Their young contractor received six dollars for the thirty-five cents he paid out. This transaction certainly gives promise of a financial genius, which if not prematurely nipped, will dim the fires of no less a personage than Jay Gould himself.

As a Boy.

"When I was a boy," the grandsire said
To the bright lad by his knee,
"Of the victors crowned with fame, I read,
Who triumphed on land and sea!
And through the years, from the deathless page,
A summons has sounded long;
To youth, and manhood, and hoary age,
The message is this: 'Be strong!'"

"When I was a boy——" he paused and said
To the listener by his knee,
"Of the men who were as lights I read
In a dark world's history!
They prized the truth and were loved of God,
And no fear of man they knew:
And still, from the glorious heights they trod,
The message was this: 'Be true!'" — Quiver.

A San Francisco Flower.

A certain wise man was strolling among the hills just outside of 'Frisco, somewhere about the first of this very April. Suddenly he paused and looked intently at a little flower at his feet. It was a tiny yellow blossom, star-shaped, and similar to a thousand others that swarmed over the hills; but it differed from the others in this, that the tips of its petals were pure white, as though they had been dipped into some bleaching acid. Looking more intently, he found others like it scattered down the hill-side.

Now you or I, no doubt, would have marvelled for a moment, and would then have passed on and forgotten about so trifling a fact as the variation of color in a wild flower. But this man, being so much wiser than you or I, only smiled to himself and said: "I will ask one of these curious little blossoms what this means."

So he bent over one of them and questioned it (for he that will, may understand all that the grasses and flowers say, if he only keeps on asking questions, and then listens with patience and tender interest for their answers). And just what was said, I will tell you, for he told it to me to-day.

"We plants," began the little flower, "we plants have our living to make for ourselves and our children, just as you human beings have, and these gay petals are the advertisements we hang out, to invite our customers to call. You don't understand? You mean that you have forgotten—for so wise a man as you surely knows the main business of a flower, and the names of its customers?"

"Seed-making and honey-making, you say, are the two kinds of business that every flower transacts or tries to transact? Right. The seeds, you see, are our children; and, like a wise parent, every plant works hard to equip its children well in one way or the other, before they start out for themselves.

"Now, one of the best legacies a plant can ever bequeath to its children is a healthy constitution. And, to secure this, the pollen grains which fertilize the flower and make the ovules at the base develop into seeds, must not come from the same flower as the one containing the ovules, or the seeds are likely to be small and weak. These pollen grains, holding as they do the fertilizing principle, must come from some other flower on the same plant, or better still, from another plant of the same species, growing under widely different conditions, perhaps a mile away.

"How shall this be secured? By the wind blowing the pollen dust about from one flower to another? Yes, that is one way. But we plants have learned a still safer and surer method, and that is to send the pollen in charge of certain individuals who act as traders between flower and flower, unloading and re-loading at every stopping-place." These are the bees who in stopping to get honey, carry away on their wings and legs this pollen dust and mix it with that of the next flower they visit.—I. C. Craddock, in the Kindergarten.

ESSAYS OF JAMES VILA BLAKE.

SUBJECTS:—Choice, Faculty, Public Education, Happiness and Time, Vainglory, Luck, Seeing Good Things, Side Lights of Intelligence, Individuality, Questions of Heroism, Praising, Censure, Flattery, Government, Handwriting, Knowledge, Meditation, Common Sense, Requit, Anger, Judgment of Others, Patience, Enemies, Immortal Life, Death, Emergency, Conscience Character as a Work, Superiority.

The volume of this [gnomic] wisdom is properly the world's Bible, and every sentence, every fragment of it is precious beyond price. Mr. Blake has given us in this little book the condensed result of the thought of his best hours—hours spent, and a great many of them, in study, reflection, observation, calm, careful meditation upon the great problems of life and of being. The fruit is a rare work of wisdom; a neat volume full to the brim of enrichment, suggestion, stimulus; a very encheiridion, a vademecum to carry amid all passages, the varied experiences and exposures of our earthly life. Every one will find something here to feed upon, pemican to carry for the waste and solitary places in his journey—song of conquest, notes of the battle cry for successful conflict and victory.—Charles D. B. Mills in Unity.

The essays of Mr. Blake will surprise and delight all lovers of good English prose. He has made a contribution of lasting value to our literature in a form so condensed and so original as to inevitably attract and hold the attention of thoughtful readers. One is reminded not only by the brevity of these essays, but by the cast and mould of the sentences, and the plain, fine, discriminating language, of Bacon's condensed wit and sense. The quaint, clear English, like that which has come down to us from other days, is, however, the only thing in the book that is not modern. This writer reflects the culture of to-day. He respects individuality; he is humane; he is not afraid of the truth; he believes in the future, and that justice and mercy must prevail.—Chicago Tribune.

The quality of these essays which impresses us throughout is one for which we can find no better word than charm. There is something in their manner which is pleasing and delightful to a very high degree. Their quaintness, their archaic simplicity of manner and turn of phrase, have much to do with this. Very likely a critic here and there will say that the style is artificial and affected, but if the impeachment cannot be denied, it is certain that the artificiality is agreeable, and the affectation wonderfully pleasant. We do not imagine that Mr. Blake has chosen any of the great essayists for a model. But it is evident that, like all the essayists, he is a lover of his kind, that he has read them carefully and lovingly, and some of the colors from their palettes have been floated off upon his own. Perhaps it is Bacon more than any other who is subtly echoed here and there. But Mr. Blake is a lover of them all, and quotes from them with generous admiration. Nor has he hesitated, in two or three instances, to revert to subjects which the genius of Bacon has already touched and beautified—praise, anger, death, vainglory. It would be a daring thing to say that Mr. Blake's essays on these subjects are much better than those of "the wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind," but "a consensus of the competent" would probably assign to them a greater value relatively to the needs and problems of the present time.—The Index.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Pundita Ramahai at Normal Park.

A notice that the Pundita Ramahai would speak on the condition of women in India summoned us to the hall of the Cook County Normal School on Friday last. The hall was well filled with an interested audience, and the brave little woman, wrapped in the white mantle of the Orient, made a moving plea for the 120,000,000 of Hindu women who are kept in dense ignorance and superstition. The priests tell them that they are wholly foul; that their lips are too unclean to pronounce the sacred texts, and so the knowledge of their scriptures is forbidden them. The husband even risks the salvation of his soul if he loves his wife too tenderly. The woman is taught to worship the man and obey him in all things. No matter how vile his character, her obligation remains the same. When she asks for education and wider opportunities of usefulness, Ramahai told us with suppressed mirth that the men borrowed reasons from England and America, and told them that they had not brains enough to study the difficult things that men learn; that they had not the physical strength to endure education; and lastly that they were such pure, beautiful angels that men couldn't endure to have them polluted with the knowledge that education would bring.

If they are sick it is forbidden them to tell their symptoms to a man doctor, and alas there are no women physicians! So the sick Hindu woman must struggle with disease unaided, must even die modestly and respectably rather than violate the proprieties of Hindu society. About 200,000 Hindu women have received instruction in the schools which have been established by the English government; but the school age of girls is only two years, from six to eight, or from eight to ten. At about this age the little girls are married and go to live with their mothers-in-law. The schools are taught by women who are themselves densely ignorant, and whose methods of instruction are of the most primitive character. The Pundita herself had never attended one of these schools, and said she felt sure that if she had she would have lost what little intellect she possessed. But the Pundita's intellect is by no means small. She is clear-headed, earnest, courageous. Her of untold generations of ignorance and superstition, she illustrates the liberating power of education, and it is such emancipation she seeks for her countrywomen. "Educate them," she says, "and they cannot be kept slaves as they now are." Her purpose in coming to this country is to raise the sum of $70,000 to establish a school for high caste Hindu widows. These widows, it must be remembered, are many of them the merest children. High caste widows are never permitted to marry the second time, but are condemned to lives of the most deplorable wretchedness and oppression. The effort of this heroic woman to emancipate these victims of superstition and barbarous custom, and lift them into lives of usefulness and independence, is one which ought to meet a warm response from every American woman. It ought not to take long to raise the $70,000. The Pundita has written a book on "High Caste Women in India," which she desires to sell for the benefit of her proposed school. Price $1.25. Miss Frances Willard, of Evanston, will supply the book to all who will remit to her the price. In Boston a public meeting has been held and a committee appointed to aid the Pundita in her gracious work.

Hinsdale.—On Sunday, July 17, the pulpit of Unity church, Hinsdale, was filled by J. R. Effinger, Secretary of the Western Conference. At the close of the services the congregation were requested to remain a few minutes to hear a letter received from Rev. W. C. Gannett, accepting the invitation extended to him by the society some weeks since to become its pastor for the ensuing year. This communication was received by the people with great satisfaction. UNITY congratulates the young church on securing an able and consecrated minister and congratulates the minister on the warm hearts and ready hands that await his coming in September.

Englewood, Ill.—The pulpit of the Universalist church—Miss Kolloch's—was filled on Sunday, July 24, by Mrs. J. R. Effinger. After the service a bright Sunday-school gathered in the vestry, one hundred and twenty attending. This church gains steadily in numbers and influence. The American Unitarian Association Hymn and Tune book is used upstairs, and "The Carol" down stairs. Unitarians and Universalists dwell together here in unity.

Buffalo Prairie, Ill.—Last month it was Princeton reporting a Sunday Circle organized. This month another hand is held up in Rock Island county, a new center, organized through the direct agency of the Post-Office Mission, under the lead of an interested layman. Meetings every week and a Sunday-school already started. The western secretary goes down to see them next week, and will report further on his return. Shall we not have one such movement reported each month of the present conference year? Next!

Des Moines, Iowa.—Rev. Ida C. Hultin, of Des Moines, passed through the city last week en route for Sherwood, Mich., which will be her address during the month of August. She proposes to preach at several points during her vacation.

Boston Notes.—At the grove meeting at Weirs, N. H., the National Bureau of the Unity clubs was accepted as a useful organization. Several clubs joined on the spot. Your Brother Jones and our Brother Bodge and Brother Beane explained its proposed methods and its value. Two hat collections were made to aid its start. Several Unity leaflets were planned, and it was thought well soon to make lists of home readings in liberal Christianity, in history and in poetry. About three hundred visitors were in daily attendance in the grove. Fifteen hundred listened on Sunday to the sermons of Rev. M. J. Savage and Brooke Herford. The cordiality of the New Hampshire brothers and sisters made visitors feel at ease and in a mood to enjoy the lake and hill scenery of Weirs. The conference meeting at parting on Sunday evening was full of glowing enthusiasm.

CHOLERA INFANTUM.

This most fatal disease of Infancy.

PREVENTED, CONTROLLED, AND CURED BY Lactated Food

It has been successful in hundreds of cases where other prepared foods failed.

FOR INFANTS, of any age, it may be used with confidence, as a safe and complete substitute for mother's milk.

FOR INVALIDS,
it is a Perfect Nutrient in either chronic or acute cases. Weak stomachs always retain and relish it. Physicians and mothers concede its superiority. The most palatable, nourishing and economical of Foods.

150 MEALS for an INFANT for $1.00.
EASILY PREPARED. At Druggists—25c., 50c., $1.00
Valuable circulars and pamphlets, sent free.

MORE of the sins of to-day, and perhaps we may say of all days, are traceable to an inordinate love of money than to anything else. Money! men lie for it, steal it, give their lives for it, cheat themselves out of all the best that life affords for this imaginary good—money. All our lives are poisoned at their very sources by this greatest and saddest of mistakes—living for money. Let us live for life, for love, for God, at least one day in seven.

It is reported on good authority that Rev. T. L. Eliot, of Portland, Oregon, will not accept the Western Secretaryship of the A. U. A. This is just as we feared, and yet who can blame him or charge him with lack of wisdom? His work on the Pacific coast is one that no one can do but he, and surely nothing that even he could do in the Mississippi valley is so important as for him to hold his grand position and finish his great work where he is.

Do we deserve this? James Eddy, writing from Bar Harbor, Maine, to the Open Court, asks:

Can't you put a little more of "religion" in the Open Court? Have you not found more signs of the existence of a God at the West, in and about Chicago, than you did in Boston? The western Unitarians have lost all sight of God, and don't care to name Him at all. If you can find no traces of God at the West you can find plenty of evidence of the existence of the devil in and about Chicago, represented by the anarchists and the ultra Henry George men.

We have no means of knowing whether Mr. Eddy is sincere or sarcastic in his expectation of more theology and religion in the Open Court, but it is unfair and all wrong to say what he does of western Unitarians.

PROHIBITION for Texas has failed. For several weeks the papers have been preparing our minds for a great surprise. Texas, that we always think of as inhabited chiefly by cowboys and Indians and Texas rangers, whatever they may be, was to come bodily and voluntarily into the sisterhood of the most civilized, to be one of the states where public sentiment is so disciplined and chastened that drunkenness can be prevented and all dealing in alcoholic drinks forbidden. But alas! just as we had so happily made up our minds to be surprised, the election goes the old way, and Texas is still Texas. But let us at least keep it in mind hereafter that life has much the same difficulties and problems in new and old states. If the drink question could be settled in Glasgow and Calcutta, it could be settled also in Texas and on the Congo.

THE strangest literary phenomenon of last month was, certainly, the appearance of a magazine article in defense of the Keely motor. This article purports to have been written by a woman, Mrs. Bloomfield Moore, and appears in the July Lippincott's Magazine. We had supposed there was no one now living of sufficient education and intelligence to write a magazine article who was not satisfied that the Keely motor is, and has always been, a fraud. Many intelligent people were deceived at first, but as the years ran on and no results appeared, the conclusion was reached almost universally that the only use the motor would ever be put to would be drawing money from the pockets of the credulous for the support of the cunning impostor, Keely.

But now the matter takes on a new phase. A woman takes up the cause, not from the mechanical, but from the metaphysical side, and demonstrates, logically, that the motor is right, and must succeed. The universe it seems is with the motor, all the laws of nature favor it. The very air about it is supercharged with "etheric force," and that it should not run and manifest great power would indeed be stranger than that it should. To judge Mrs. Bloomfield Moore by her language one would say she had but just graduated from some school of "Christian Science." If so, or at any rate, we can but wish she would investigate Keely's heart instead of his motor, and give him some kind of a treatment that would make an honest man of him.

THE shore of Lake Michigan in the vicinity of Chicago is strewn with dead grasshoppers, tens of thousands of them, enough to be offensive to the nostrils and spoil the pleasure of picnic parties resorting to the beach. Better this, from a human point of view, than that these Rocky mountain locusts should be alive to-day and feeding upon the vegetation left by the drouth in this region. But what light does a fact like this throw upon a theory of universal Providence? It used to be taught that the instinct of an animal or insect was infallible; it was a whisper from God by which the creature was guided, fed and preserved from danger. On that theory God must have been angry with these locusts that he had brought from the far away mountain regions; must have smitten them like the host of Pharaoh; must have led them to the lake on purpose to drown them. But why? For their sins? Is it not much more reasonable to suppose that the insects were looking out for themselves, that they tried to cross the lake without knowing its width, and that their mistake cost them their lives?

THE August Forum has an article upon "An Outside View of Revivals," by Dr. C. C. Everett, Dean of the Harvard Divinity School. The article is noteworthy for its exceedingly calm and judicial tone. At its close, quoting a recent remark of Doctor Pentecost to the effect that the preaching in the churches with which he (Doctor P.) is connected has become largely "pastoral" rather than "evangelistic," and that a division of labor seems desirable whereby the preaching of pastors shall be "pastoral," while evangelists shall devote themselves to the work of conversion, Doctor Everett acutely says: "The statement and the suggestion are both of great interest. If evangelistic preaching is dying out in the churches, it can only be because the special beliefs from which this preaching sprang are fading out. If this form of preaching is remanded to a different order of clergy, and thus is no more heard in the regular ministrations of the church, the evangelist will find fewer and fewer souls prepared to meet his coming. The aspect of the church will be changed, and the revival system, in the narrow and technical meaning of the word, with all its machinery, will have passed away. Revivals, let us hope, in the broader meaning of the term, will still remain; the poor and the unchurched will still have the gospel preached to them; but if the doctrines that gave to the violent measures of the revivalist their justification shall have lost their power, all this will be accomplished by less questionable means."

EDWARD EGGLESTON'S "Books That Have Helped Me" in the Forum for August is a charmingly frank, fresh and suggestive paper. He sets little value upon the "intellectual pharisaism" of choosing "a best hundred books for other folks to study," because "the helpfulness of a book is largely relative," and "not only is it quite possible that the books which have helped one may not be of assistance to another, but it is certain that books helpful at one period of life are quite useless at another." None of us can look back over the course of his mental growth without feeling the truth of this. Books of little permanent value and of no wide reputation have often been fruitful seeds in one's mental soil, by reason of the peculiar conditions of his mind at the time. Doctor Eggleston acknowledges his indebtedness to a little volume lent him by the minister's wife, who "kept a little collection of books to lend about the village with missionary intent,"—a suggestive tribute to the value of humble private beneficences that have not yet grown into "institutions." The book was "Robert Dawson, or the Brave Spirit." "In many a season of difficulty afterward, when ever-recurring sickness seemed destined to defeat all my boyish ambitions, I have been heartened by remembering Robert Dawson facing a rain-storm with the words: 'Only a few drops at a time.'"

If there is any other body of believers who have to reply so often as Unitarians to the question "What do you believe, anyhow?" it is the new churchmen or Swedenborgians. The following brief statement of their faith we clip from the New Church Messenger:

The Lord Jesus Christ is the only God of the heavens and the earth. In Him is a divine Trinity of Love, Wisdom and Power, called in the Scripture the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, and represented in man, who was created in His image and likeness, by the soul, the body, and the operation thence. He came to man by assuming his human nature, through which He overcame the ascendancy of hell with him, and thus redeemed him.

By shunning evils as sins, in the acknowledgment of the Lord, man may accept this redemption and be regenerated.

The Sacred Scripture is the Word of God, containing within and above its letter the Divine Truth itself. By it man may know good from evil, may be associated with angels, and conjoined to the Lord.

Man is an immortal spirit, clothed with a material body, which is put off at death; after which, according to the quality of his life on earth, he dwells in heaven as an angel, or seeks an abode with his like in hell.

The Second Coming of the Lord is not in person, but is in the opening of the spiritual sense of the Word and the establishment of a New Church on earth. It was effected by a General Judgment which took place in the spiritual world A. D. 1757, and by the revelation of the doctrines of that Church through Emanuel Swedenborg, a servant of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Boodle.

The word which we make the caption of this article is not a pretty one, but it seems destined to take its place in our language. In the Philological Society's new Dictionary, Part III, this word is defined as meaning "stock in trade, capital." This meaning is extracted, it would seem, from a sentence which is quoted in the dictionary from the Boston Globe, Oct. 7, 1884, ("sinews of war . . . soap and other synonyms for campaign boodle are familiar") but our respected friend, Mr. J. A. H. Murray, or whatever sub-editor had this new American word in charge, allowed the real meaning of "boodle" to elude him. Booodle does not mean capital or stock in trade except the business or trade be something secret, peculiar and illegal. Booodle always means money, but money is not always booodle. Money honestly received and spent, money that circulates in regular and honest channels, that appears in cash book and ledger and expense account is never booodle, but when a sum, a thousand dollars more or less, is given to some one to use in influencing some third party, given perhaps in silence and certainly without requiring any writing of acknowledgment or obligation, that is booodle. Booodle is money used for purposes of bribery and corruption, and the same word is used to indicate the money that comes as spoils, the result of some secret deal, the profits of which are silently divided. The term is also used to cover the ill-gotten gains of the bank robber or the absconding cashier—"he carried away so much booodle."

This word seems to have come into use within five years, and during the same period the thing signified seems to have become wonderfully prominent and important. For one thing no election can be conducted now without booodle first and last. The primaries have to be "fixed," a great many men have to be "seen," and, in short, the amount of money that it seems necessary to use to elect a few honest public servants is a thing to wonder at. And when these men are elected it seems that they often lose the power of distinguishing between "boodle" and "straight money." What is the meaning of their having an office if there is'nt anything in it? As throwing a side light upon human weakness nothing for years has so appealed to our pity as the stories our condemned commissioners have told on themselves. At first they had no appetite for boodle so far as they knew, but they had the common American appetite for money. Almost before they knew it they had fallen, and then like Esau and all sinners since the world began, they "found no place for repentance though they sought it carefully with tears." Booodle is dirty money, it soils whoever touches it and we ought not to have any of it in our city or country. And yet there is reason to fear that supply and demand for it are both increasing. And this leads to the question, whether it is better to try to stop the demand or shorten the supply. Friend Grinnell and his co-laborers have been working against the demand.

The recent convictions will undoubtedly check the demand for the present in the county board. (And yet it is not reassuring to be told as we are in a morning paper that there are more than a hundred candidates fairly clamoring for the vacant places of these men who are sent to the penitentiary.) But there are other rings yet where the demand for booodle still exceeds the supply. And here is our work; we can do something at shortening the supply. For it is said that the men who bribe aldermen and commissioners are many of them most respectable, some of them in churches, and teachers in Sunday-schools. And it is undoubtedly true that public sentiment at present regards a man who uses boodle to accomplish a worthy, or at least a not unworthy end, very differently from the way in which a "boodler" is regarded. "We've got to do it," the man seeking a contract says, "we hav'nt a ghost of a chance unless we give as much as others." Give, that is, boodle, to some one who is ready to be influenced by that means. To all such thinkers we commend the story of poor old Jacob Sharp. He knew he had'nt a ghost of a chance for his tramway except by bribing aldermen, and so he did that. He succeeded in getting his road and also in posing for the instruction of all Americans as a man who thought the briber innocent and the taker of a bribe a criminal. May his fate be a sufficient warning to others who have thought the same, for the bribe giver as well as the bribe taker is a boodler.

Without the swing of Beauty's gates
A minstrel band forever waits,
By lyre and harp and tuneful lay
To fill the earth with minstrelsy
Of Heaven.

The rolling wonder tone so pure,
Resounding through the beauty sphere
If earthly singers were not here
To chant it.

Sweet mission theirs to fill the heart

The Grove Meeting at Weirs, N. H.

"A grand meeting!" "The best meeting ever held here!" are the exclamations I hear all around me from those who have attended the Unitarian grove meeting on the shores of this beautiful lake. The services held here annually by our people for the last ten years have steadily increased in interest until the Weirs meeting has become one of the most important of Unitarian gatherings. The marvellous beauty of Lake Winnepesaukee, surrounded by hills and mountains; the social greetings at the hotels; the excursions on the lake; the able addresses and sermons delivered by prominent ministers and laymen; the sweet spirit of rest and peace, that like a divine benediction rests upon all; are the things of which one must write if he describes the gatherings of the week.

The exercises of Tuesday, June 26th, the first day, were in charge of the National Bureau of Unity clubs. Rev. J. L. Jones, of Chicago, delivered an address on the "True Functions and Methods of the Unity Club." He said that the national organization of Unity clubs seeks to co-operate in making true character. Its purpose is to render assistance to local Unity clubs in suggesting courses of study on great themes, in laying out plans for work, to make it possible for each club to know what other clubs are doing, and thus enable one to profit by the experiences of the others. The National Bureau will help the different clubs to secure lecturers of recognized ability at much lower prices than they could possibly arrange for themselves. Rev. Edward Everett Hale stands at the head of this movement, which promises to help the local clubs to do the best work in promoting higher culture and in making nobler character. The address was earnestly discussed by Rev. S. C. Beane, Rev. E. R. Butler, and others, and a strong indorsement of the aims of the club as outlined by Mr. Jones was given by all the speakers.

At 11 A. M., on Tuesday, Mr. Edwin D. Mead delivered an interesting lecture on "New England's Debt to Holland."

The lecture was replete with interest and was listened to by a large audience. The lecturer said that Holland is the finest of the seventeen low countries of Europe. Here the Pilgrim Fathers sojourned twelve years before their departure for America. Holland stood for the future democracy and thought of the 17th century. Holland had been quick to endorse the reformation. It was in the Netherlands that the first echo of Luther's voice was heard. Holland received her Protestantism from Luther. The excellence of Mr. Mead's lecture suggests that any Unity club that wishes to study American history the coming winter should, if possible, arrange with Mr. Mead to deliver this lecture.

At 2 P. M. Mr. Darius Cobb, author of "Christ Before Pilate," delivered a lecture on "Vital Elements of Art." The lecture was scholarly and comprehensive, and eloquently delivered. He said that religion and art were indissolubly connected. The greatest works of the old masters in music, painting and sculpture had a religious inspiration. What makes a genius is the love that he puts into his work.

Rev. J. L. Jones, at 7 P. M., delivered his eloquent lecture on Robert Browning. The lecture was a masterpiece, showing the results of years of thoughtful study of the great poet. Rev. Calvin Stebbins, of Worcester, Mass., preached a sermon at 10 A. M. on Wednesday, taking as his text, "He went about doing good." Under the inspiration of Mr. Stebbins' strong sermon, possibly, 119 persons went to Wolfboro' on the Lady of the Lake and attended the fair held by the Unitarians of that place, who have a fine church building almost ready for dedication.

Thursday, at 10 A. M., Rev. J. L. Marsh, of Winchester, Mass., Secretary of the Unitarian Church Temperance Society, delivered an address on "The Motive and Method of Christian Temperance Work." He presented the strongest and most urgent reasons for temperance work, and outlined methods of work that suggest themselves as excellent to all thoughtful minds. Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, to whom all Unitarian audiences are ever delighted to listen, spoke in her happiest manner on "The Power of Religion on Human Life."

Thursday, at 2 P. M., one of the most impressive and interesting meetings of the week was held. "What we owe to each other" was the subject, and the novel sight was seen of representatives of six different denominations standing on the platform, and as the first speaker, Rev. W. A. Keese, Baptist, of Chelsea, Mass., expressed it, gratefully, gladly, speaking of the debt that his denomination owed to other denominations and especially to liberal Christians for broadening the scope of religious thinking and sweetening, brightening and softening the spirit of religious fellowship. Rev. Mr. Keese was followed by Rev. Howard Hill, Episcopalian, of Montpelier, Vt.; by Rev. G. W. Bishop, Methodist, of the New England Conference; by Rev. Mr. Clarke, Trinitarian Congregationalist, of Salem, Mass.; by Rev. Darius Cobb, Universalist, and Rev. S. J. Barrows, Editor of the Christian Register, Unitarian.

This meeting was what Rev. S. C. Beane happily called "an epoch-making event." The limits of this article will not permit me to speak in detail of the services of Friday, which was laymen's day. Judge Whitehouse, of the Supreme Court of Maine, delivered an eloquent address on some near questions in law and theology. He was followed by Dr. George B. Loring, of Salem, Mass., and Judge Pitman, of Newton, Mass.

Rev. Thomas R. Slicer, of Providence, R. I., delivered a sermon on Saturday on "Human Consciousness of God." Mr. Slicer's sermon was so impressive that the subject of his sermon became the text of the helpful conference meeting of Saturday evening. On Sunday there were two large audiences, morning and afternoon. Rev. M. J. Savage, of Boston, delivered an able sermon at 11 A. M., on "Reconciliation with God." Rev. Brooke Herford, of Boston, preached on "Salvation through Christ." Mr. Herford's sermon finely supplemented Mr. Savage's discourse. Both sermons were listened to with the closest attention by the deeply interested audiences.

I cannot close this article without speaking of the interesting prayer and conference meetings that were held from time to time during the week, and of the earnest spirit of devotion that characterized them all, and the profound spiritual truths expressed by such men as Mr. Slicer, Mr. Beane, Mr. Jones, Mr. Cooke, Mr. Herford and others. Such services show the power of Unitarianism to touch the heart and kindle the emotions and quicken spiritual aspirations, as well as to illumine the intellect. Nor would my report be complete unless I spoke of the excellent music sung at the services, and the earnest work of Rev. J. B. Gilman, of Concord, N. H., in leading the congregation in the musical services at all the meetings. All has been so delightfully social and pleasant that the gathering seemed like a family reunion, and as we take our farewells on leaving this sylvan retreat, we all say, "It was good to be here."

E. C. ABBOTT.

A Reunion of Colored Veterans.

August 1st and 2nd have been gala days in Boston for the colored people. There has been a reunion of the 54th and 55th Mass. regiments and the 5th Mass. cavalry. It is their first since the war. Exercises were held in Tremont temple, which was beautifully decorated. There was abundance of bunting, banners with some of the noble words of Governor Andrew, a wreathed bust of Colonel Shaw, while here and there, in the hands of some comrade, was a battle-worn flag. There was a full attendance of the friends of the soldiers, but, I am sorry to say, the white citizens of Boston did not largely assemble to do honor to the regiments that, at the time of their formation, the state was so proud of. For enthusiasm these meetings have seldom been equaled here.

Among the speakers were Lieut. James M. Trotter, the eloquent colored lawyer, now Recorder of Deeds at Washington, Colonels Hallowell and Hartwell and General Carrington of Ohio. The story of the regiments was retold to the thrilling interest of the hearers.

In various states colored men desired to enlist, but they were not accepted until Governor Andrew, of Mass., said, "Come here and we will enlist you." This was before the emancipation proclamation. When Colonel Shaw, the brilliant and noble son of Harvard, whom afterwards both Emerson and Lowell honored in verse, was given command of the 54th, the south declared he should "be buried beneath his niggers," a fate they little foresaw would so exalt him. "It must be a mean class of white men who would officer black regiments," was also another saying from that quarter, while in reality these officers were of the best class, young men noble and well-born. The tributes paid to these officers by the colored speakers were well worth being present to hear. They showed that the colored soldiers fully realized what qualities those white men had, who volunteered to lead them. Looked at with uncertainty by the regular troops, and with malignity by the southern army, as the black troops were, it was no easy task that they set themselves to do.

Events proved that Governor Andrew exhibited his usual wisdom when he trusted the colored men as soldiers. They always showed themselves efficient; Wagner, James Island, Obustle, Honey Hill proved that; and Colonel Hartwell stated that although he had commanded in several white regiments he could truly say that those troops did not show themselves as faithful to discipline as did the colored ones.

They had, too, a peculiar trial. They enlisted with the understanding that they would receive full pay. The government considered them entitled to only ten dollars a month. Seven times it was offered, and every time refused, the soldiers declaring that they would take nothing less than equal pay. For eighteen months they served without receiving one dollar. It was during this time that Governor Andrew, importuning the government for justice to them, made his memorable addresses in their behalf, passages from which were inscribed on the banners at the reunion: "I will never give up the rights of these men while I live, whether in this world or the next." "I thank God that I never despised a man because he was poor, or ignorant, or black." "The government found no law to pay him except as a nondescript or a contraband, nevertheless found law enough to shoot him as a soldier."

But, through their persistence, and the urgent call of Governor Andrew for their rights, they won their great moral victory, more great, more important, as Colonel Hartwell declared, than any on the field. It is no wonder that these veterans look upon our noble "war governor" as almost more of a friend to them than Lincoln himself, and that one of the special reasons for their holding this reunion was to show their honor and devotion to his memory. On the second day they visited his grave at Hingham to decorate it. "Two names must ever stand first in our thoughts when we recall the actions that made our liberty possible," said Lieutenant Trotter, "and these are John Brown and John A. Andrew."

One could not fail of noticing how extreme was the enthusiasm whenever their freedom was mentioned. Those who say that the colored people would gladly have their former servile condition forgotten, and hence the records of the strife for their emancipation unremembered, do wrong. Their representatives on this occasion expressed themselves freely, with the deepest pride and gratitude in that deliverance; and not only the veterans, but all the friends present, applauded with feeling again and again.

An occasion like this, recalling so fully the wonderful significance of our civil war, naturally brings to mind the discussion now taking place in UNITY, "Would it be well to return the battle flags?" and it makes one think that there may be circumstances that demand a different action on the part of the nation from that of the individual. At any rate, not yet is the time for returning them.

WHETHER the legend of the painter hanging in his studio the portrait of an angelic child, then seeking for years a demoniac face as a model for a perfect contrast, finding it at last in a murderer's cell, and then discovering that child and felon were the same person—whether the legend be true or false in the letter, it is substantially true. In either direction, debasing and deforming, or refining and spiritualizing, works this plastic, vital energy of the soul.—Advance.

Things Behind and Things Before.

Forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before.—Paul.

The past leaves, away, a legacy for the present; the present is accumulating a store to be handed down to the coming time.

We are the children of all the yesterdays. Our possessions, mental, material, spiritual, represent the study, the toil, the achievement, of all the generations that have gone before. The leaves in all the volumes of a library have come fluttering down through the years, some of them a long, long way; caught on the breath of this man's soul, or that, they bring from places remote, and from the far-off time, all the tangled story of life,—the poet's song, the vision of the seer, the scholar's ripe conclusion, the dreamer's longing hope. Society is not a creation, nor is it an accident. It is a growth. It strikes its roots deep through all the strata of time, slowly thrusts its form up toward the inviting sky, little by little crowds the buds of early promise on toward the bloom of later days and the perfect fruitage of the last.

The civilization of an age stands for all the ages by which it is ante-dated in the records of time; garners in its treasures all wealth of earlier thought, all the fruit of moral heroism, and of unselfish sacrifice.

Death holds not a universal scepter. Men die. Deeds live, and are immortal. Often has the battlefield,—Death's chosen play-ground,—been the birth-place of good that never can die. Every victory has its own baptism of blood; and victory is not the prey of death. The immortality of human achievement, the deathless persistence of whatever through the incarnation of righteousness tends toward the weal of men,—this it is that compels the movement of the race along the ascending pathway of its life.

It does not follow simply because the present time is in possession of all the good springing from the ceaseless striving, the patient seed-sowing, the heroic enduring, the deathless hoping of other days, that each actor in the world-wide scene is to have distinct recognition, to be called before the curtain to receive the meed of praise. Were that to be, we should have an endless procession of heroic ones who could toil and suffer for their kind, and laugh at pain; to whom toil were sweet, and tears were joy, if only tears and toil might in their mingling make lighter another's load, and his cup less bitter; and we must needs stop in the doing of life's present duty to applaud the deeds already done.

Each generation has a multitude, who, by patient well-doing in spheres high or humble, win a perfect right to wear in the sight of all men the insignia of royalty. There are kingly men not a few, and queenly women without number, who come to our public coronation. In truth, the story of the truest heroisms is never told, and if it were told would not be understood by the hurrying crowd of men. Far apart from the busy thoroughfares, out of the glare of life, with no pomp of circumstance, and with no hope of rest till life's sun shall sink in the western sea, may be found a multitude,—some of them very near to you,—who, in the omnipotence of the love that endureth all things, are bearing burdens for others, are stemming a tide that sweeps in upon them from a shoreless sea of woe, are daily winning deathless victories over selfishness and every marring passion; are incarnating the Christ spirit as truly and sweetly as it breathed in the child of Bethlehem.

I have heard of three sisters, who gladly denied themselves the much coveted culture of the schools, that they might save from a limited income the means with which to educate their own brother. I could tell the story of a young woman, peculiarly endowed with all the qualities that make beauty most beautiful, who deliberately and resolutely put from her lips love's jeweled chalice, that she might give an undivided life to the care of an invalid father and mother. Did ever altar bear more perfect sacrifice than that? If the savor of it come not to heaven, heaven must be far away. I do not know that they knew it, but I believe that from that day of renunciation, that father and mother lived upon a Mount Calvary, and that their dying was under the shadow of as true a cross as ever Love stretched its arms upon.

Of such deeds the world does not hear. They are not done to be told, but in obedience to the inexorable law of duty, as interpreted by love, large-hearted and loyal. And yet such lives are not lost, though they are unsavory. Each is a part of the precious legacy bequeathed by the yesterdays to to-day. They are the crystal springs hidden in shaded places, that feed and sweeten life's turbid and turbulent stream, and with it are carried out to the sea. More than this; every such life, though known to the few only, in a certain and beautiful way receives the tribute of the many.

Not knowing all who have suffered and made willing sacrifice of self for the common good, each generation embalms the memory of the few whose sacrifice and suffering for it were made prominent by the special circumstances of their lives, and in that embalming remembers the lowliest of all. Each name, in the recorded roll of memory's cherished ones, represents countless throngs of the unwritten, and a very few stand for all. Florence Nightingale is but the prototype of the ministering spirit, everywhere carrying into the carnage of life, to cheerless beds of pain and death, the joy of sympathy and the comfort of love. In wreathing her name with the fadeless laurel, we say to all men, and to all time, "This is our tribute of love, to all who have loved, and wrought in the spirit of it."

The name of Lincoln is made immortal, not for himself alone, but that in his name the great army of the unknown, who were bound to the same altar of devotion to principle, and the freedom of men, may have immortal remembrance. His monument is a memorial of all the dead, who died for us.

This much is said in recognition of the fact that the past truly lives in the present.

When one tears the latest date from his calendar, he does not bid farewell forever to a departed day. The light of that day shines through the night, to kindle with fresher splendor the coming dawn; and so it comes to pass that light is evermore cumulative; and in this is the true interpretation and guarantee of that sweet prophetic voice of old, "There shall be no night there." The brightness of that heavenly day will come when the gathering brightness of these earth-days shall have chased the night away.

It is not needful to dwell on the reverse of this. Much might be said of the persistence of evil, as well as of good. Only too well is it known that many of the shadows that have fallen athwart the path of human life in the days gone by, are projected into the life of to-day, but they do not fall so far, nor settle so darkly down under the noonday sun, as in the distant morning time; and it follows in all reason that in exact proportion as the light flows in, the shadows must flee away.

Without doubt there are many things in the patrimony received from the fathers, with which it were well that we should part.

There is much trumpery in the garret of the old homestead, that you do not care to move into the new house that you are building. There are a few things you will keep, not for utility, for the day of their usefulness is gone by. They are supplanted by newer and better means in household economy; but as curiosities, or for sake of a sentiment, you will give them room.

Grandmother's spinning wheel and reel have nothing to do in these days of steam driven spindles, but to destroy them would seem to be sacrilege. The music they made under her touch is so mingled with memories of childhood, is so much a part of a life that blessed you with gentlest benediction, for her sake you will give them room. An old chair that came to mother on her wedding day; the cradle baby out grew fifty years ago; the trundle-bed, that stood the shock of many a pillow battle, long before were heard the sounds of real life's smoking field; an earthen cup, touched often by lips that long since turned to ashes,—what are these things that they should not be left to perish out of sight? That question each heart can answer.

So also is it, that as by generations we move out into the ampler dwellings of life, we carry with us, away from the parental homesteads, both in church and society, not a few ideas, and forms, and observances, which though really belonging to the past, are harmlessly held, and are held tenderly, because they are linked with tender recollections of the faithful men and women who saw in them what we cannot see, and who, in their day, were served by them, as we in ours can not be.

Let not mine be the hand that shall rudely strike at any one of the innocent antiquities, by which is cherished for any soul the lightest sentiment, if it be sweet and pure. Rather let us vie in a patient kindly effort to forestall such as would insist on lugging all the trash found in the old garret into the dwelling of to-day. Much of it we can well spare. Whatever stands for no sentiment, and embodies but little sense, we would better leave behind.

Certainly our religious house-keeping would be a much simpler thing, and lead to an experience more saving by far, if we were less cumbered and cluttered with relics from the old garret. There are few who have not observed that much infelicity in God's family springs from a difference of opinion as to the value and arrangement of this antique furniture.

The thoughtful mind of this time encounters a problem of infinite import in the ever-recurring question: "How in the realm of religion shall the best possible use be made of the spiritual possessions into which we have come by right of the fathers?" To lay this wealth away in a napkin of indifference, or to fritter it away in idle and dangerous speculation, were alike false to our ancestry, cruel to posterity. It will not do—it must not be that the next generation shall come upon life's scene to find itself less richly endowed than are we, in any of the essential elements of spiritual understanding and beauty.

The fear is entertained by some that such a calamity threatens the race. I can not think it so. The very attitude of inquiry in which men stand; the eager listening for some voice from afar which shall explain the hitherto unsolved mystery of being; the reverent and grateful attention commanded by every prophet of the voice of God, whose anointing is for the proclamation of a gospel of glad tidings, and goodwill; the growing disposition to throw off the thralldom of tradition, and the long borne oppression of authority—whose commission was never from the skies; the deepening conviction that religion best serves its high office, not in offering rewards or threatening woe in another life, but by giving its benediction to the life that now is, by enthroning in all honor the principles, truth and love, and faith in God and man—from such conditions of thought and life springs the ever-speaking prophecy of the still better days yet to be.

Forgetting the things which are behind, reaching forth unto those before; fearing spiritual stagnation as we would not fear death; hungering more and more to know the ineffable sweetness of that life that finds shelter under the shadow of the Almighty; thirsting always for deeper draughts from the springs that nestle in the hills of God—so shall we best embody the spirit of the world's wisest teacher and most tender-hearted lover, and so leave as our legacy to the to-morrow of time, a religion as far-reaching as the needs of the race, as free as human thought, and sweet as the breath of God.

CORRESPONDENCE.

DEAR UNITY:—You are before my eyes and in my hands very often, and you are not of the kind to be forgotten, and if you have the faculty of mind-reading you have known that I have almost put pen to paper many a time to give expression to spiritual affinity, and to tell you what the outer man enables the inner man to do. It seems as if you and the dear old Christian Register were nearer than ever now that other friends are so far off. It is delightful to have your frequent calls upon us, and to feel our sympathetic heart-strings vibrate in accord with your tones of humanity, of the highest moral principle, and of the sweetest and truest reverence. The controversies of the day affect us less in their pros and cons than in the spirit with which they are conducted. A little active work in the direction of humanity has a wonderful effect in changing one's whole thought and purpose. From the abstract, theoretical, ideal one easily passes to the real, concrete, practical, while in direct view of much to be done.

Here the indolence, improvidence and squalor of the old Indian is a constant stimulus to efforts to improve the physical, intellectual, moral, spiritual condition of the young. The parents and relatives of our pupils camp near by and loaf day after day, so that even a boarding school, if on the reservation, does not save the children completely from the example of laziness. You may be sure they find no such example within the walls of our building. Our employes are obliged to be as busy as bees to accomplish the task which ever obtrudes itself before them. And what can we do? We have taken the children from their homes, in some cases without the consent of the parents, for the government is determined that the young Indian as well as the young white child shall be prepared for citizenship by education, and the parent is tenderly fond of the child and craves to see and fondle it often. Shall we repel him? The gentlest repulsion is but rudeness to such an one. And again one must exercise all wisdom and caution not to give the color of contempt to his disapproval of the ways of the fathers lest the children should interpret it into contempt of the fathers themselves. "Honor thy parents" is an injunction for the wild Indian as well as for others, and we would alter the conclusion to suit his case, and say whether thy days be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee or not. And this making camp and showing indolence and filth is not all. Here comes a young woman with her face apparently covered with black scabs, as though she were a leper, and she is the mother of one of our boys; and there is another wrinkled old face—the face of the grandmother of another boy, and it is in a like plight. This horrid aspect is no visitation of providence in the sense of unavoidable. It is self-inflicted. These women were lately widowed, and it was held proper that they should show their grief by gashing the forehead till the blood ran down over the face, and that the blood should remain there and dry and blacken and make the evidence of their grief the more lasting. They would neither wash off the stain nor wash out their sorrow. So the face continues daubed and disfigured for months.

A father and mother of one of our little girls comes and reports the mother's brother dead. Both of them have fingers bandaged with rags. They have cut some of their fingers off, perhaps as far down as the first joint, in token of their grief. How are we to treat such nonsense in presence of the children? It is trying enough to us. We find it a little hard to keep still—but we conclude to say nothing about it till general enlightenment prepares the way.

Then one who has had three years' study at Carlisle brings us a story which he himself believes about a certain Crow who is invulnerable. He has many a time allowed men to shoot at him and they can't hit him, and he can command the lightning to strike whomsoever he please. So can you or I command the lightning, but him, you are told, the lightning will obey, and you are expected to believe it. The Crows believe it.

But the most unfortunate piece of credulity is that the government is going to feed the Indians forever, or that somehow the Indians are going to live without work. In regard to this the children must be undeceived, and must be made to feel that the necessity of labor is not a curse but, contrariwise, a blessing, and all over this land they must be taught how to work most efficiently. The Indian has tested the Henry George doctrine for a long time, now have him try individual ownership and citizenship, and the only thing that will make individual ownership and citizenship successful, I mean education—education of the head and of the heart, of the eye and of the hands. Let him understand and talk the language in general use. Let him have more free and intelligent intercourse with the whites. Let him and civilization and, if possible, the better part of civilization, rub against each other at every point till light and sweetness, too, are fairly rubbed into him. He should have this rubbing in our school. It is for this purpose that we board him as well as instruct him—that we keep him with us day and night—civilization is his playmate, his table companion, his bed-fellow. We do not stick instruction upon him, but we mean to give him an atmosphere of it that he must breathe continually. He must be taught to make all kinds of effort—for effort above all things makes the man; but the more we have him in intimate association with us and our modes of life the better for his effort. If with us always from infancy upwards, he would become nolens volens a white man except his skin. Environment helps his evolution, but the school requires money. The government pays part of the expense by contract. Who will pay the rest?

RAMONA RANCH.

LET those who find in the Messianic scenery,—in the strange contents of its diviner world, with its beasts beneath the throne, and its seven trumpets and its vials of wrath, and its war with the great dragon, and white-robed hosts, and its garments dyed in blood,—and in the coming on the clouds of heaven "with sudden destruction" to conquer, judge and reign,—and in the kingdom of the saints on earth,—and in the great assize and the second death, and the blessed city "without sorrow or crying,"—the crowded lake of fire and brimstone being outside the gates,—let those who find in all this a congenial nurture for their spiritual life turn it to what account they can. The roots of purity and piety creep into hidden crevices and find some film of living water on every rock. But let them not say that there is no other fruitful world; and that, were this dissolved, the spirit must drop into the empty gulf of the unconditioned.—James Martineau (Appendix to "Loss and Gain in Recent Theology.")

THE HOME.

Proverb Sermon—II.

Proverb: All are not merry that dance lightly.

The lower animals, our speechless fellow-beings, sport merrily, but they sport only when they are sportive. A sad animal shows himself sad, and there an end. As no creature but man clothes his body, so no other cloaks his mind. But a man may disguise himself to seem above his station or under it, as he will, dressing at one moment like a king, and again like a clown, though he be neither. He puts like feints to use in his mind, clothing one feeling with signs which nature has made for the garment of another, thus, as to being sad or merry, frocking himself like one when he is the other, or neither. Therefore, if an animal be merrily antic, be sure that his heart skips also; but with men, all are not merry that dance lightly.

Now, among those who dance lightly when they are not merry, I have seen two kinds—they who dance bravely and they who whirl with despair. There is a patient, brave, saintly dancing wherewith a good heart spreads the balm of cheerfulness on the wounds of grief; for as melting snow thaws a frozen part, so will warm cheerfulness cool the burn of a sorrow. We cannot seize happiness whether or no; for it hangs often on things above our power, like the deeds of others, and happenings which we cannot rule either way or in the least turn, though they be grievous. This is to be kept in mind, that we can not fashion happiness as we will, lest we be like a wild bird who will not mind his cage and tears his wings. But better still to bethink ourselves, and to fix it in us, that always we can set up cheerfulness and shape it to our will, and soon it takes a form very like happiness. Moreover the good heart thinks more of others than of itself, and moulds a face having a smile on all sides, from whatever point it be seen. Therefore, among light dancers if there be any not merry, they may be brave hearts that make themselves bright for others; and as one could not tell which were they if they danced behind a curtain covering them half-way, leaving but their feet to be seen, so neither could one pick them by their faces, for these will not belie their merry feet, but sprinkle even a sweeter light, as much as love is above pleasure.

Again, as I have said, they that dance lightly, not being merry, may be dancing with despair. There is a reckless, wild, mutinous plunging into pleasures, and whirling into gayeties to fly from griefs and pains. This is a kind of mad dancing, and they that plunge into it are out of their heads or out of their souls with trouble, either wild men or rebels against God. For men may dance blasphemy as well as speak it. If one have had a hurt of heart or a loss of fortune, then to go whirling madly and bitterly into revels is not to take life piously and soften with sorrows, but to rave in it and grow hard under them; and then one dances curses, which is no better than to scream them into the sky. This feigned lightness can clothe itself only in part of the body. Though the feet move as well as in that other kind, that brave dancing when the heart is not merry, yet when we have come to the face there is not the same sweetness and truth but a false glare or glitter which is but the ghost of light. I know not whether this hard, bitter and reckless dancing or other revelry be any better than the hard drinking and other intemperance whereto sometimes persons fly instead of to dances—though perhaps it be worse in hurting others more; but it is one act in two parts—one makes a sot, the other a kind of savage. Therefore among light dancers if there be any not merry, they may be those woeful persons who whirl, and whirl themselves away; and their eyes have no dew, but the glare of a desert; and they will not sit down with sorrow at home and wait and pray, but are rebels. This is very woeful and dreadful, and hard to cure; and how it will be cured no one can tell, and sometimes never here, because the soul hath grown up to age without discipline. But I am sure—and happy this is—it is not to be found so much as the good, light kind of dancing, which, though it be not merry at heart, is cheerful and brave.

As to not being merry though we dance lightly, it is to be said that very often this is our own fault, and most often by reason of two small errors: for not the great tragedies of life but the small, menial faults make the most miseries. The first of these two errors is that we are fretted by little things and let ourselves be heated by petty troubles. This, as I have said, is but a menial trait. If it be like a lackey to be galled if he have not a good brush for a coat, is it less like him to chafe because the coat is ill-brushed? Or if it be like sculchery manners to fume over a bad fire, is it less menial for a lady to kindle at a poor dish? Now this fault can be put away by reason, and even by a pure kind of pride. For if we take counsel of our station, we shall keep little things beneath us; and if we advise with reason, we shall know that little fishes eat not the big so long as the big be alive—which is to say plainly that little plagues and scourges destroy not happiness if it have life in the mind. La Rochefoucauld has said the truth, "We take less pains to be happy than to appear so."

The second error is that we keep not joys by us by remembering them, as we ought to do. It is no way strange that people should be unhappy, since they throw away pleasures out of their minds; for by a like way they would thirst and famish if they threw away the food from their stores. When a man has gained a pleasure, if he keep it not in hand it is the same as to throw it overboard. In like thankless manner people notice greatly an untoward hap (which frequently they say is "just their luck") because they are too early or too late, too quick or too slow, or however it happen; but they pass unheeded the many helpful, timely and tallying hits without ever calling them "their luck," how delightfully soever they square and fall together. But why think most of the ill? Is pain keener than pleasure? And why let slip a joy? One way to dance lightly is to remember past dances, by which one may make the feet keep in time and the heart in tune in the intervals. Shelley has the saying, "Thou comest as the memory of a dream which now is sad because it hath been sweet;" but this I call no better than a feeble prating or a sickly moping. If a man waking from a lovely and sweet dream hath nothing better to do than to fall dismal because he dreams no longer, how much better is he than a man whom once I read of, who having partaken in a friend's house at Christmas of a fine saddle of mutton, bemoaned him for the rest of his life that he had not eaten another slice thereof. Plutarch relates that Aristippus, when he lost a farm, was beset by his friends with bewailings and sorry faces for his misfortune. Whereat he cast down his eyes till he could master his impatience, and then rebuked them thus: "Thou," he said to one, "hast but one piece of land, and never hadst more; but as I had four farms, I have now three remaining, which are two more than ever thou hadst." When he admitted it, "Why then," said Aristippus to all of them, "do you come chopfallen around me, since still I have three times as much as you have? and why rather should not I bemoan your misfortune, since it is only the raving of a madman to bewail what is lost, and not rather rejoice in what is left?" The like wisdom is in the good fable of a jug and pitcher that were taken to a fountain, and while the jug looked very jolly the pitcher moped and hung its ears. Whereat the jug asking what ailed his neighbor, the pitcher answered that he was disheartened with thinking that it mattered not how full he should leave the fountain since always he came back empty. "But how strangely you look at it," said the jug, "for I was thinking of my good fortune, since however often I come empty, always I go away full."

From these thoughts touching those that dance lightly but are not merry, whom every day one shall meet in company, I gather two precepts for behavior. First, if one go among the grieving, let him look out for whatever is joyful, either to take it with him or to seize it on the spot and show that it is there. In like way if one go among the gay, let him watch a little for the sorrows that may be underneath, for the lairs of hidden griefs; not that he may drag them forth, and the less if they be hidden sacredly under cheerfulness, but that he may give some sign of fellow-knowledge, by which great comfort goes forth. This needs no great wit, unless, indeed, feeling be another form of wit, as in truth I think it is. I have met the saying that "good humor will even go so far as to supply the lack of wit." Nay; but I think lack of wit is lack of good humor. There is no diviner like love, nothing that gives a man to understand so many things of others as love. But some will say, how watch for the griefs that lie under? or how make room for them? In two ways. First, by being careful not to touch hurts or hurting topics. This is a caution to be carried into any company, though it be as gay as lambs or children. For the very deep things of life are to be touched lightly with any one, and especially with a stranger, lest there be a hurt in them. As the physician who truly has the soul of a physician, will touch gently any man's body which he knows not, since he knows how many sore places and sad ills it may hold which show not on the surface, so one who has both love and skill touching the soul will lay hand very softly on any person since he knows how many hurts and pains may lie under his smiles. Likewise it is worth thinking how great a sting even a little hurt may be and how easily given if one roughly get tangled with his neighbor; for sometimes, as Richter says well, "to have all one's hair pulled at once hurts not so much as a single hair pulled." Secondly, we should be careful to give little pleasures, for these make the happy happier; and, since many are not merry that dance lightly, mayhap a small attention set flying will light on a sore heart, and then it fills a great office. The keenest of pleasures, which soonest touches the quick of the heart, is personal respect, notice, and approach.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Chicago.—The usual summer quiet rests over headquarters. No meetings of Sunday-school teachers or boards of directors; only an occasional call from friends passing through the city on a summer outing. One or two workers are kept on duty in the Channing club room, by judicious relieving of each other, while work goes on in the adjoining UNITY office very much as usual. Mr. Jones is in the east, has been attending the Unitarian grove meeting at Weirs, and speaks at the Chautauqua "Lakeside School of the New Theology" this week; meanwhile he has been resting and sending an occasional breezy note for the friends at the office to decipher. He is expected here for a flying visit about the 15th, after which he will spend a short time in Wisconsin.

—Outside of the office, affairs are equally quiet. Mr. Sunderland has moved the office of the Unitarian to Ann Arbor. Mr. Utter has returned from a pleasant bicycle tour in Indiana and Ohio, and was a guest at All Souls church last Sunday. Mr. Blake is also here this week, but will probably go east between now and September 1.

—Our churches are all closed except All Souls, which is delighted with the experiment of giving its minister a vacation and running alone for six weeks. On July 24 Mr. Stewart of the congregation occupied the platform; on July 31, Judge J. A. Jameson; last Sunday Rev. E. I. Galvin, who has for a long time counted himself a member of the congregation, preached. To-morrow (Aug. 14) Charles H. Kerr will speak; August 21 Mrs. Ellen T. Leonard, and August 28 Mrs. S. C. Ll. Jones. The attendance, while not so large as the winter congregations, has been encouraging and gratifying, particularly in that it includes many strangers in the city and friends from other city churches who take this opportunity for a fraternal visit.

—The ladies' parlors of the Church of the Messiah are being renovated, re-papered, a fireplace added, and a new carpet. The church and Sunday-school are to re-open September 4.

Geneva, Ill.—Next Sunday is the last of Mr. West's pastorate. We regret sincerely the termination and trust that both parish and minister will continue to do good work for the cause separately since it can not be together.

Boston Notes.—Now that the shadows of August begin to fall on tourists' trips and the vacation visits of school children—the business eye and the vision of autumn pleasures and enterprises are forecast into September work. With the peach crop come theater openings and newspaper advertisements of school openings, dancing instruction and halls and houses and furnished rooms to rent, and meetings of church committees on winter courses of sermons and lists of lecturers. We hear of early preparations for continuing our people's services and young folks' meetings and Christian work so well carried on here for several years past.

—Rev. J. F. Clarke really advances in strength and spirits and in hopes of working with caution among his people in October. His favorite summer pleasures, bathing and sailing off the seashore, have once more come to the rescue of his health.

—It is settled at out-door religious services may legally be held on our common, and on some other public squares under permission of the police commissioner.

"Practical Piety."—This little book, by Jenkin Lloyd Jones, contains four short sermons: "The Economies of Religion," "Bread versus Ideas," "Present Sanctities," and "The Claims of the Children." It is bound in limp cloth, 64 pages, and is mailed to any address for 30 cents. A few comments upon it may be of interest. New York Evangelist, orthodox: "From the humanitarian point of view, these four discourses, delivered in the Central Music Hall, Chicago, contain a good deal of truth. The texts are mere mottoes for naturalistic talk, though now and then the talk is very good."

The Unitarian: "The sermons are short, bright, earnest, graphic in expression, often poetical in their thought, and altogether among Mr. Jones's best."

Daily Mercury, New Bedford, Mass.: The sermons are intended for the bustling American, who thinks he has little time to devote to the consideration of religious matters."

The Interior, Presbyterian: "No exception can, of course, be taken to the moral precepts of the volume, when they are disconnected with attacks upon Christian orthodoxy. As such cases are rare, the volume may as well be given a wide berth."

Daily Enquirer, Oakland, Cal.: "The author has an epigrammatic habit of speech, coupled with a facility of illustration and a quickness of fancy not often found in sermon-writers, and his views of the relation of religion to modern conditions and every-day needs appeal to the average lay mind as remarkably sensible. . . . 'Practical Piety' is a book which is more than ordinarily readable, with the wholesomest of morals."

Send 30 cents in stamps for a copy of "Practical Piety" by mail, or send us the name of a new subscriber to UNITY with 50 cents to pay for four months, and we will send you the book free.

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

EDITORIAL.

THE senior editor of UNITY was expected to return from the east early in the present week, but was unexpectedly delayed, and arrives just as the paper is going to press.

"RELIGION," says the Jewish Messenger, is not to be merely worn as a garment for illness and a comfort for death. If it be of a genuine stamp, it will be our companion in sunshine as well as in storm. It should be a kind of sobered joy, a tempered cheerfulness, a buoyant sentiment that impels us to right thinking and action."

THE sermon, "Blessed by Drudgery," by W. C. Gannett, is entering on its twenty-first thousand in tract form, not to speak of a circulation of 2500 in UNITY, and of 2000 in "The Faith that makes Faithful." Every week brings a letter of thanks from some one helped by it, or of earnest inquiry from some one who has seen only its name. This letter, from one of whom we know nothing more than the letter itself tells, carries a possible story of pathos that none can ever guess:

It is a matter for surprise that the religious press has been left almost alone in crying out against the recent act of the Georgia legislature, making it a state's prison offence to educate white and colored children in the same school. Atlanta university is the object of attack. This is a good school, perhaps rather ambitiously named, founded by the "American Missionary Association" of the Congregationalists, and maintained by them as a philanthropic enterprise, in the interest of humanity rather than sect. The only white children taught there are the children of the professors and instructors, who are excluded by public prejudice and jealousy from the neighboring white schools. It is thus evident that the co-education is no real threat to the cherished caste system of the south, and the law looks like nothing more or less than a wanton persecution of people who are doing for Georgia a needed work that the Georgians have not the intelligence to see the need of.

AN interesting episode is the challenge of the Independent (orthodox weekly at New York) to Prof. Egbert C. Smyth of Andover to furnish a table of proof texts from the Bible for his theory of probation after death. Professor Smyth replied, offering to send instead of the texts a detailed argument to be prepared by one of his colleagues on the general teachings of scripture on eschatology. The Independent rejected this suggestion, and again demanded the texts. The professor then retired, leaving the honors of war decidedly on the Independent's side, which is hardly strange. The narrow path which the Andover professors have marked out for themselves between literalism and rationalism is so exceedingly narrow that it does not afford a really secure foot-hold. We incline to think that Professor Smyth would have compelled more respect from the Independent itself if he had answered its demand by saying frankly that his belief in a future probation rested not on any Bible text, but on his faith in the justice of God.

THE St. Louis Christian Advocate, of August 10, contains a most entertaining editorial, entitled "Hell," from which we give our readers a few choice extracts.

"Hell is a place, as heaven is a place, as earth is a place.

It is located somewhere in the wide realms of God. It has its center and its frontier, a real place, not an airy state, intangible and dreamy, but real, as earth is real. Men and women are there who used to walk the streets of earth or live in its beautiful homes; they are there, their identity felt and recognized, their citizenship in hell declared and established. It is a created place, prepared by God; he directed in the location and completing of this dark region, not with the delight with which heaven was planned and built, but as really though more sadly, he was the maker and builder of hell. . . . To live in hell is pain; its very life is torture; depression and heaviness are in its air; its clime breeds discontent, alarm and tears. The sentence which is never to be repealed and which follows them to every nook and corner of their returnless exile is, Depart from me ye accursed into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels. What a life! accursed by the place! accursed by its fire! accursed by its companions!"

"Hell was not made for a day, a year, or an age, but made for eternity, as stable as heaven and as enduring. Its existence and sad history will run parallel with the existence and history of heaven, but without interchange or sympathy, no hope, no Cross bridges the awful chasm between the two. Heaven is enduring, its foundations fixed, its walls garnished by the love of God. Music and bliss fill its homes and burden its air—thrones and crowns are the reward of its radiant inhabitants. Hell is enduring, its foundation fixed, its walls shaded by the justice of God, sighing and bitterness fill all its homes and burden its deadly air—chains bind to misery and darkness its throngs of hate and guilt."

This is not, we confess, very refreshing summer reading, but we think an occasional extract of the kind will serve to keep our readers from forgetting that there is a field still waiting for the gospel of the supremacy of character, the nobility of human nature, and the use of reason in religion.

Our Missionary Opportunity.

A striking parallel might be drawn between the missionary field now awaiting the workers for a rational religion in the west, and the field in which labored the first missionaries for the new religion of Jesus. Then, as now, the field was in the apparent possession of a dead faith. The progressive thought of the Greek philosophers, sifting down among the common people of the first century, had undermined their faith in the classic myths, without giving them a new faith in its room, and thus the people had lost, with the absurd myths, something that their fathers had known,—the feeling that man's outward material life is not all, the sense of union with the ever present and all encircling power, which, in however many ways he shows himself, under however many forms the mind of man pictures him, stands ever for the greatest realities of life. Among such a people, so impoverished in mind and spirit, were scattered the missionaries of the religion of Jesus,—missionaries who had themselves been reared in the Jewish religion, a faith that had endured for hundreds of years, yet except in its indirect influence had not spread beyond the limits of a single nation. Its enduring strength came from its hold, however relaxed and uncertain at times, on the truth that by obedience to the divine law of right men come into a covenant, so to speak, with God. Its limitations came from this very laxity and uncertainty with which this truth was held; from the Jews' imagining that the divine covenant was not with them as being obedient to God's law, but with them as the children of one righteous ancestor back in the prehistoric ages. Into this religion had come the new thought of Jesus restoring the simplicity and purity of the ancient faith, and bringing to it a new inwardness, a new enthusiasm, a new power.

Eighteen hundred years, and popular religion in America stands again almost where it stood in Corinth and Ephesus. Since Christianity came into the world with the freshness, the naturalness, the reasonableness that attest a divine revelation, it has been taking up accretions from the various minds through which it has passed. Jesus himself tried in vain to check the tendency of his followers to look for miracle instead of hearing his message. Fifty years after his death and part of the converts had already begun to forget his words in the attempt to construct theories of his function as a sacrificial lamb. Two hundred years more, and the church was divided in bitter strife over the scientific relations subsisting between him and the infinite father and the all-pervading spirit of good. Twelve hundred years more, and the records of Jesus's life and the letters of his followers, with the older Jewish literature which had helped form their ideas, were erected by a necessity of controversy into an infallible guide to all truth, and since then seekers after religion have been at the mercy of teachers with logical theories to construct and hundreds of pages of verbal inspiration to argue from, until the goodness of God has been impeached, the total depravity of man has been postulated, obedience to divine law has been classed as self-righteousness that is as filthy rags, and salvation from eternal misery has been conditioned on a weak credulity.

At last the people, the multitude, have begun to think; they have concluded for themselves that these doctrines and others taught in the name of religion are false. "But," say the teachers of current theology, "all these things are written or clearly implied in the Bible. Deny even one of them, and you deny the whole of religion, for if every word in the Bible is not true, nothing is certain, and we can not even know that there is a God." What wonder, or what shame, if the people answer that in that case they will believe neither in the Bible nor in God? And yet, how great is their loss!

These are the people, the unchurched, who make, up more than a third of America, to whom our mission is. And who are we? We are a scattered handful of people, happy in that we stand in the line of progressive thought that began slowly instead of coming with the appalling suddenness of that which has been described. From one and another orthodox camp we have gradually thought our way out and joined the band that seventy years ago found William Ellery Channing as a leader up out of the unworthy thought of God and the degrading conceptions of man that were the shame of the still glorious Congregationalism of New England.

And what is the gospel we have to preach? Every number of UNITY retells it, every word of our workers re-echoes it; and we may forbear to restate it here, since we write for those who know it as well as we.

Why should we not preach it to the orthodox rather than the unchurched? Because "they that are whole need not a physician, but they that are sick." If people truly believe in God's loving kindness, and think they furthermore believe that he is three persons in one substance; if they believe in Jesus's law of love, and wish also to think of him as a lamb sacrificed for human guilt; if they follow the precepts of the Bible, and think they are helped by the belief in the infallibility of every text,—may God be with them, for they too are working to make the world better, though they follow not with us. And it is the glory of human nature and of Christianity that beliefs utterly repugnant to us oft-times do not have on those who accept them the blighting and brutalizing effect for which we might look. So let us leave these to help in their own way those whom they can help, and let us turn to the multitude whom they can not help.

Already the multitude are beginning to hear reports of our gospel. In ever increasing numbers they are coming to hear what we have to tell, and to bring their doubts to see if we have any answer to offer. They have been living without religion, out of harmony with God and man, because religion is still indissolubly joined in their minds to doctrines that are repugnant alike to their better judgment and their better feelings. And the gospel God has given us to preach is the gospel that may be to these millions salvation, salvation from the lower life into the higher, from darkness into light, from sadness into joy. May we but realize our opportunity!

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

To Follow.

The men of bygone ages
Had not the heart to sing
Of all the joy and beauty
We know the years shall bring.

They crept amidst dense darkness,
We grope midst passing night,
But those who are to follow
Shall run in broad daylight.

Of truth they found but fragments,
Our eyes, alas! are weak,
But those who are to follow
Shall find the things we seek.

They saw love's form in outline,
We sometimes see her face,
But those who are to follow
Shall feel her fond embrace.

Their songs were wails of sorrow,
We raise a feeble voice,
But those who are to follow
With anthems shall rejoice.

We can not, dare not doubt it,
The future shall reveal
A glory far surpassing
Our dreams of the ideal!

But, progress has no limit;
Forever and forever,
Some shining goal shall call for
A yet more grand endeavor!

The Tribe of the Indifferent.

Dante found one class of beings unworthy even of hell. A place of great darkness was set apart for them, where, afflicted by mean torments, they envied every other lot. They were the tribe of the Indifferent. They were composed of two divisions; one, the angels, who when Lucifer rebelled, joined neither his forces nor those of the Almighty, being wholly regardless of either's victory; the other, spirits from earth who had never espoused any cause, but had lived immersed in self.

Living as Dante was in times of great party strife, he necessarily held disdain for the indifferent. Our own period of reforms teaches us how base that attitude must have seemed to his ardent spirit. If we stand appalled at the picture of their punishment, we yet can sympathize with the poet's detestations of the sluggishness of these souls. Have we not felt thus when seeing indifference towards great wrongs that called for the speech and act of every generous soul? A true woman-suffragist is more moved by the indifference of the woman who boasts that "she does not care" about the reform, than by the opposition of the non-suffragist. Where the non-suffragist works from real conviction, her attitude can even be respected. But nothing extenuates the torpidity of the woman who does not care. A Knight of Labor may see in the course of some capitalist pitted against the work of his organization a sincerity to command admiration, but what can stifle his contempt for the petty self-interest of a fellow-workman who "won't be bothered by any of their affairs."

Modern study is coming to see in Dante's vivid pictures the stern symbolism of results. It finds there the highest sort of teaching. In this portrayal of the mean state of the indifferent, what a truth lies hidden. They found in life nothing worth a struggle, they had no cause, no flag. Now before them is a "whirling flag," which they restlessly strive to follow, but though it forever allures them, it leads nowhere, it is only the irony of their past indifference. Now these beings who were on earth so steeped in selfishness, are forever meanly reminded of their wretched selves; they are incessantly stung by wasps and hornets, and goaded by these low pangs are a torture unto themselves in place of their once supreme satisfaction.

How grimly this sets forth the condition of those from whom has gone the noble opportunity for action. "The whirling flag" of a lost cause forever haunts their vision. Remorse stings them. They hate their selfish selves, and envy the meanest lot that would give them a chance to forget that lukewarm spirit that was their bane, and doomed them to the base condition of perpetual self-upbraidings.

But how are we startled when we learn of the number of the indifferent. "There were so many," said the poet, "I did not think that ever death had had these myriads to despoil."

The Lakeside School of New Theology.

The Lakeside School of New Theology opened at Bemus Point on Chautauqua Lake, Friday, August 5. Up to the present date there have been delivered from its platform more than twenty-five lectures and sermons by speakers of various denominational affiliations, as well as by independents. Doctor Thomas, of Chicago, spoke on Saturday and Sunday, August 6 and 7. His earnestness and spirituality gained the complete sympathy of his hearers. The church that disfellowships such noble spirits as he, is committing slow but certain suicide. It may protect and preserve its creed, but at the expense of its intellectual and spiritual life. When a church cuts off such men, it becomes a girdled tree. The trunk and limbs remain, but they are robbed of the vital sap that insures their further growth. The Lakeside School of New Theology has a platform for such men.

President O. Cone, of Buchtel college, has delivered some thoughtful lectures. He is radical and uncompromising, and from his merciless logic no superstitious dogma e'er escapes. His lecture on "Messianic Prophecies" was better adapted to the class room than to a popular assembly, but it went to the bottom of the question, and the attentive listener could perceive that the prophecies under consideration are destined to lose their traditional interpretation.

Rev. E. P. Adams, of Dunkirk, an independent, is a quiet but thoughtful man, who is doing a good work without the assistance of dogmatic theology. He lectured August 9, to excellent acceptance. Prof. George L. Cary, of Meadville Theological School, gave a scholarly lecture on "How to Study the Scriptures." Those who know him need not be assured that people studying the scriptures after his method will fall into no serious error of doctrine.

Rev. M. L. Williston, of Davenport, Iowa, a Congregationalist, and a personal friend of Doctor Townsend, gave two highly interesting lectures on European travel, illustrated with stereopticon views. Doctor Rexford, of Detroit, has been stirring up the dust on the shelves of old theology. He is a most eloquent and forcible speaker, and carries his audience by storm. His lectures on "Clement of Alexandria," and "The Heathen as a Factor in Modern Theology," were scholarly, and full of the broadest sympathy. Doctor Rexford is a tree standing in a denominational garden, but extending its limbs far outside the boundary fence, and dropping its fruit into the hands of the passer by.

Wednesday, August 10, was "Unity Club Day," and a day looked forward to with the greatest of interest by friends of a broad and genuine culture. The speakers of the day were Doctor Townsend, Dr. O. Cone, Arthur Stearns, and one with whom UNITY's readers are probably not acquainted,—Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones. Education, co-education, and other topics were discoursed upon. The western brother presented the aims and methods of the Unity Club, and gave us a lecture on Browning, which made everybody hungry for more of the poet to whom we were introduced in such an interesting manner. Brother Jones recited the selections from his favorite poet in a manner which suggested a possible field of success, in case he is ever excommunicated and driven into secular work. Miln should look to his laurels.

In spite of his reputation as an arch heretic, Mr. Jones was earnestly requested to preach to the people; and so on Thursday he again occupied the platform. He gave his sermon on "Religion from the Near End." The echoes of that sermon have not yet ceased to reverberate among the trees and along the shores of the quiet lake. Whether they will touch distant Chautauqua and disturb its conservatism can not yet be told. To say that the sermon made an impression is to use mild language. The earnestness of the speaker, the broad catholicity of the sermon, carried the people by storm. Tears stole down the cheeks of warm hearted Doctor Townsend, as his soul was stirred by the religious fervor of the speaker. There was not any trace of dogmatic theology in that sermon, but it was of thought and spirit all compact. People stare in utter amazement when they are told that Mr. Jones is one of the men who are so persistently accused of denuding Unitarianism of its religious elements.

Dr. Thomas Hill has lectured on "The Crucifixion Historically Considered," and on "Toads,"—the latter lecture being amusing and instructive. The programme thus far has been a good one, and representative of many phases of theologic thought. The amphitheater has no sign out, with a creed in black letters, but there is the warmest fellowship among the various ministers.

Doctor Townsend, the founder of the institution, is broad and sympathetic in his spirit. He is laboring to build, on an enduring basis, a spiritual home for the unchurched. He has great power as a preacher, and his work since coming out of the Methodist church has been remarkably successful. His sermons are lofty and spiritual, full of beautiful imagery and noble sentiment. By allying himself with men who are working broadly for the advancement of humanity, he hopes to see this institution become permanently and widely useful.

The location of the school is a beautiful spot, on the shore of the now famous Lake Chautauqua. Steamers pass almost continually, and small craft of every kind dot the lake. The atmosphere is fresh and bracing, and the breezes that sweep over the water and through the trees are symbolic of the currents of fresh thought which here prevent the intellectual air from becoming stagnant. The New Theology is not a new atmosphere, but a fresh and new current in the old. UNITY will hear more of the Lakeside School of New Theology.

Wait for the Heart.

Wait for the heart—
Yea, patiently stand,
E'er won to its behests.
What is life, apart
From days the heart makes grand?
The mountain-crests
Of their own love have led
Men, as from land to land,
With faith unspent and star-calm speed,
From deed to deed,
Till life was fled!

"Ohrst Before Pilate."

Munkacsy's painting of Christ before Pilate is great in both its realism and its idealism. It is the realism that first impresses you. The picture is magnificently painted, the figures seem to be living men. You look into the prætorium, or judgment hall, where on your right sits Pilate on his raised and richly carved seat. On his right is Caiaphas pleading vehemently for the death of Jesus, who stands with bound wrists before Pilate, and is the central figure of the wonderful scene. The hall is filled with men of all conditions. The artist must have studied historical accuracy. He has represented Christ without any of the conventional attributes of divinity. He does not look at him in the light of to-day or of the eighteen centuries during which he has been worshipped, but he sees him, and makes us see him, as he appeared to the people about him, a Jewish peasant, who preached strange doctrines, and lived according to a standard unknown to his fellows. They hated and feared him because they could not understand him. In the crowd that watch the trial, the faces express every shade of curiosity, malice, insolence, and contempt, every phase of shallowness, self-conceit and worldliness. There is not much violence, only one rough man is shouting for a death-sentence; but there is no friendliness in all the crowd. A young woman, holding a child on her arm, gazes with a sympathetic look at Jesus, but it is the sympathy that a tender nature would feel for any prisoner, and shows no comprehension of his character. One man only, sitting below Pilate, leans forward with an expression of interest so intense, and so free from hostility, that one feels that for him it might have been possible to understand the mission of Christ. Pilate himself is repulsive. The face is mean as well as troubled. He looks as if he might have that moment received the message from his wife "Have thou nothing to do with that just man." The figure of Christ is slender, and rather tall. The face is pale, there is no weakness in his look, but there are traces of suffering. It is the face of a man who does not heed the things of this world. He stands erect, apparently unconscious even of the rope that binds his wrists together; his auburn hair falls lightly over his shoulders; his white robe hangs in straight folds to his feet. His whole expression is that of one who "answered nothing," and yet it is not an expression of defiance; there is no consciousness of self in it.

As one goes again and again to study this wonderful painting, the sense of its realism is gradually lost in the great lesson which it teaches, in its pure idealism. This is the trial of the spiritual by the worldly. The young prisoner is the type of all noble aspirations, of holy life, of spirituality, of self-sacrifice, of the comprehension of and the striving after the divine, and of that great love for humanity that counts death as nothing, if by death humanity can be lifted nearer to the eternal truth. And this soul comes in contact with a world that has nothing in common with it, but that has power over the body which enshrines it. Brutality howls at it, malice jeers at it, insolence mocks it; self-conceit and worldly prosperity look askance and think it better to have this teacher of a truth that they will not understand put out of the way; official power is troubled, it feels to some extent the beauty and the force of the new teaching, but it feels also its danger to existing institutions, and so the governor silences his conscience, and his intelligence, and gives himself wholly to the baser part of his nature, by condemning to death the troublesome Jewish prophet. In the young woman, in the one earnest man, lies the hope for the future. They will not forget. The woman will feel, the man will think that the prisoner was unjustly sentenced. And yet one feels that the triumph is with Christ, with the spiritual nature. That is beyond the reach of the world's punishment. His silence is not defiance, nor doubt, nor fear; it is simply that he is so apart from all this baseness and prejudice and ignorance and cruelty, that he has no words in common with it. He touches the deepest places in one's heart. His silence, his dignity, his withdrawal from all the tumult and clamor into the peace of God within him, are indescribably impressive. There is more in the picture than Christ before Pilate; there is the trial of every soul before Christ. Each one must answer whether he has taken part with Pilate and the mob, or with Jesus; whether he has loved best the things of this world or the things that are not of this world; whether he has been ignorant and cruel, blinding his eyes from the light, and scoffing and jeering at truth because it came in a new form, or from an humble source. Christ is still tried before Pilate. Let us see to it that we are not of the scoffing, howling mob, or the indifferent skeptics who sit silent at the trial, and are careless while the crucifixion is accomplished.

In this great religious picture the victory is not with Pilate on his seat of honor, not with the mob in their strength and fury, but with the condemned Jewish peasant, bound and led to his death.

Before the picture came to America millions of people had visited it in the different cities of Europe. It is a pity to have it put in any private gallery; it should belong to some great city museum of fine arts, where the people could see it often, and where above all they could go on Sundays, without cost, and learn its lessons of spirituality, learn the beauty of holiness, and the baseness of ignorance, injustice and cruelty.

Fine as the etchings of the painting are, they lack necessarily the beauty and richness of the coloring, which is so harmonious in the picture. The figure of Christ loses especially in this way. The black and white of the etching and the photographs, interesting as these reproductions are, intensify the suffering in the face, and fail to give the beauty and humanness (if one may use the word) that are in the delicate flesh tints, the eyes, and the auburn hair.

Helping the Minister.

If you have a minister you ought to help him in his work, and try to make it pleasant for him in his pastorate. He often needs your material and personal assistance. He has come to town with his goods, and is moving into his house. Did you see that the parsonage, if you had one, was put in good repair, and was cleanly and ready for the moving in of the goods? Or, if it was a hired house, did you, or will you,—for ministers are moving in all the time,—see that everything is done, that can be, to make the removal easy for him? If he should find a good new carpet down in the parlor, or a nice book-case in the study, all the better. Perhaps he would not find fault if some one had found out that he was coming, and had opened the house, and kindled up a fire, and set the table, so that the family coming should be greeted in a hospitable way. And then, when his goods come, you might go to the house and offer your services, although for most things you could not do as well as the parson himself. But kind attentions and thoughtfulness are worth everything. Even when the pastor's family have been on a vacation, and the house has been shut up, how nice to find out when they are to return, and open it, light it, load the table with food and flowers, and fill the rooms with friends. I speak here from delightful experience, many a time.

Or, sadder even than moving into a house, is moving out of it, after a long and happy stay with a delightful people. Did you let the family pack up and go away without going over to see them, and say good-bye, and to sympathize with and help them, or offer to do so? Give them a pleasant send-off, at least. Give them a home while they are breaking up, and a formal reception before finally leaving. No matter if everything hasn't been pleasant; no matter if all can not join heartily in this last act of courtesy and love. Do it; make them a little present of your good feelings, your good will, if nothing else. Forget, forgive, be large and noble, and ever welcome these people to your homes in after days. They have given many an hour, thought, act of love for what no money was paid or could pay for. Or, if it is all regret, all around, still try to make the pastor's exit as easy as possible by not unduly emphasizing the character of the separation.

Then, not only at the beginning and the end of the pastorate should you be as helpful and as kind and sympathetic as possible; but between these dates show the friendly spirit and the loving act. I will tell you what to do: Make it a point to call and see the pastor and his family. Do not wait for them to call to see you; go and see them. The ladies, probably, will do so; the gentlemen, also, ought to do it. The people, all, should call, and not put it off, and not be too ceremonious,—the very rich, and the very poor, and all others.

The pastor wants to know you all, and see you all at his home. Probably one-third of the people of a parish call on the minister—two-thirds of the ladies call on his wife. There are usually some poor families who do not call, for various reasons; but he would be just as glad to see you as the rich. Sometimes it really seems as though some people felt too good to make a call of that kind; as though it was a condescension—and within a stone's throw of the parsonage. That is not right; it is not Christian. There may be good reasons why you do not do it; but make them known, or call; show them your interest in them as neighbors if not as spiritual teachers and officers of the church. It is a duty to do this. Do not think it makes no difference; do not show any indifference you may feel toward the minister, in any act of that kind. Be frequent in your calls; let there be some leading, efficient ladies who make free to call on the pastor's wife, not formally, but as a friend, and with a desire to encourage her, and help on all the affairs of the church. The men should call at the pastor's study, and talk over the affairs of the church; the officers of the church should frequently do this. He wants to know how things are getting on, and what is on the committee's mind, and to talk over the affairs of the church. Do not keep your minister at arms' length, and look upon him as though he cared nothing about anything but his salary. There should be the freest intercourse between pastor and board of directors of the church possible. And his advice, if not followed, should be asked about a great many things.

Then, too, there are little things it is not possible for a pastor to suggest, or to come at in any way properly; and since my lot in this respect has been all and more than I could desire, or expect, I can speak freely, and definitely. Now since you wish to be kind, and are thoughtful, do not think that you can offend by doing little kindnesses you could not expect or care to do for your gardener, or your grocer, or your hatter or barber. Let me specify: Now you have a good team; your pastor has none. He has a wife and children who have no opportunity to ride out in the country or the suburbs of the city to take the air or see the flowers, or the autumn tints. It would do them all good, and it would be a nice thing for you occasionally,—not too often, for it would give the pastor too deep a taste of the luxury of such things,—to send word that he could take your team for a drive, or that John would drive for him. I know of some who are constantly doing this. I know of two or three ministers who never pay for a team to go on an exchange, and who always have a driver, and usually the owner of the team; and, besides doing a financial favor, the parishioner has a chance to get a little nearer to his pastor. The horse, too, is all the better for driving off a few miles every day. And yet, how many people are saying—it may be to the minister—that the family horse don't get half enough exercise. O, if he only knew how three or four children would like to ride out and enjoy nature, who never get out of sight of the parsonage yard, he would never need to have said that!

Then, you have fruit and flowers in abundance; your minister buys his fruit and dispenses with flowers. Not always, for last week I had any quantity of fruit and flowers sent in. Your currants drop to the ground, your pears are not eaten before they spoil. Your green corn, half ripened before it could be used. Your flower garden shed its blossoms on the ground; but the pastor's parlor or study had no blossoms; and the fruit and vegetables, wasted in your garden, would have been acceptable, and more than all, it would have seemed so friendly, and would have helped to make his stay with you more pleasant. You went to the conference, to Saratoga, to all important religious gatherings; he was delegate, and went, too, for the benefit it would be to him, and to prevent complaint of his people should he stay away; but he was not able to do this. He represented your church, and did all this for its benefit. You, the church, should have paid his bills; or if some private member of the parish were to do it, as was my case, not long since,—receiving a twenty dollar bill to spend in going to Saratoga conference,—it would be a pleasant thing to do. Do not put your minister upon the level of your washerwoman, and say, take your wages and be gone; no favors here; we pay you for your work, let that end all obligations. That has a look of magnanimity, and of justice, in it; but the ministry is based on sympathy, and love, and the pastor's meagre wages must be used for his family, and he needs books and has outgoes no one of you knows anything about. Be generous; be thoughtful, be kind and appreciative; do not treat your pastor as a pauper,—and the true minister is no beggar,—but as a man; but as a man with a heart, and he will be able to do all the more for you and your church.

Superstition.

There is no influence so powerful, nothing has so influenced history, nothing has caused such sacrifices of life and treasure, as belief in supernatural agencies. One can scarcely conceive what crimes have been committed, what suffering and misery have been brought upon the world through this source. During the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries there were over thirty thousand human beings sacrificed in the old world upon the altars of superstition. If only a few lost their lives in New England "it was due more to sparse population than to want of zeal or moderation,"—seventeen were killed during the excitement of the Salem witchcraft—more would have been sacrificed only the judges becoming appalled, applied a little common sense to their dealings with the accused,—“set some of the prisoners free, and declined to arrest others, when suddenly there was an end to these grievances.” No more accounts of enchantment and witchcraft were heard of, and soon the evil disappeared entirely. There have doubtless been bright spots in history where superstition has lingered and which she has even aided to create. No greater power ever nerved the arm of the hero or the brain of the philosopher than this. It has doubtless supported and sustained millions of worshippers.

But it is all passing away. The days of the Inquisition are for the most part over. The wild fantasies of witchcraft are known only in the pages of the past.

Ghost stories are only told now to frighten little children. They are seldom believed except by the very ignorant and credulous. It is well, and perhaps it is well that they existed in the past. They serve now as landmarks to show the progress that has been made.

It is sometimes asked wherein we are superior to our ancestors; in this we are superior if in nothing else—we are less superstitious.

If one is found occasionally who believes in luck, or in omens, or if at times departed spirits are disquieted, no great harm is done, for it seldom interferes with any real interest, and never endangers human life.

This change has doubtless been brought about through education. We may be told there were educated men in the past, and this is true, but not as we educate to-day. The study of the world in which we live, its laws, and their operations is of recent date. Such men as Darwin, Huxley and Spencer were not known a few generations ago. Education in the past meant, for the most part, memorizing the pages of history, learning the technicalities of language, studying dates and names. To-day it consists in teaching “how plants grow,” the origin of the thunderstorms, what makes the lightning, whence the wind and the rain. A knowledge of these things to-day makes cultivated and learned men.

Let us then give to the study of science all due encouragement. We shall need no better remedy for quackery and humbuggery than this. We need have no fears that religion will suffer even if we do unlock all the mysteries of nature. We can not find out too much. Let us keep on.

"From year to year in loftier flight
On mightier wing let knowledge soar,
For as it soars, religious light
Shall onward grow to more and more.

More glorious still, as centuries roll,
New regions blest, new powers unfurled,
Expanding with the expanding soul
Its waters shall o'erflow the world,—

Flow to restore and not destroy,
As when the cloudless lamp of day
Pours out its floods of light and joy,
And sweeps each lingering mist away."

The Mission of the New Theology.

The words which we have adopted as our motto, to stand at the head of our paper, represent the spirit of the New Theology. The movement is not destructive, but constructive. It is not a tempest of wind to upturn the grand old tree of Christian theology; but a refreshing breath of new inspiration, which, though it may cause some dry and withered leaves to fall, will quicken the sap of spiritual life and strengthen the tissue of the tree.

It is not a killing frost of doubt or negation, but a burst of warm sunshine, which shall cause all the buds of thought and feeling to swell and open. Its purpose is not to destroy, but to save the great truths which have found expression, more or less complete, in the Christian theology of the past.

It would reconcile scientific and Christian thought. For the difference between them, both are partially to blame. There has been narrowness and bigotry on both sides. Theologians have soared too much in the clouds of speculation; scientists have grubbed too exclusively in the mire of materiality. The theologian has danced after the ignis fatuus of superstition. The scientist has gazed too fixedly upon the Gorgon of materialism, until his heart has been almost turned to stone. There is a fixedness of thought in both science and theology. There is the antithesis of orthodoxy and heresy in each. We would plead for a larger outlook and a greater tolerance in both.

We would kindle anew the fires upon the altar of the church. There is a spiritual dearth in all the churches. On every side we hear ministers bewailing the lack of interest among their people. Here and there a Talmage or Jones can attract large numbers, but in most of our churches there are too many empty pews. We believe that the broader faith of the New Theology, reconciling the brain and heart of men, will lead them to a deeper spiritual life. The New Theology is by no means wholly doctrinal. It means not only better thought, but better life; not only a better conception of God and things divine, but a drawing nearer unto God and the divine life. It is useless to study time and tune, the relation of note to note, if the soul is never to be bathed in the sweet harmony of a Beethoven. It is useless to study the laws of perspective, of light and shade, of harmony of color, if the eye of the spirit is never to be opened to perceive the beauty in the world. The fact that water is composed of oxygen and hydrogen is of no value to him who is dying of thirst upon the desert sands. A knowledge of the chemical properties of certain foods is of no service to him in whose vitals the worm of hunger is fiercely gnawing. An exposition of the laws and processes of combustion would be cruel mockery to one who was perishing in the winter's cold. While the New Theology would present a more rational statement of religious truth, it does not forget that truth is for the intellect, and that the spiritual life is reached by direct appeal of soul to soul, as one candle is lighted from another.

We would preach a religion for this world as well as for the next. The old theology gazed too much into the sky, and failed to see the beauty here on earth. The light that bathes the mountain tops of earth is as beautiful as that reflected from the pearly gates of New Jerusalem. The daisy-studded path through which we walk in the dewy morning is as beautiful as the gold-paved streets of the celestial city. The plain and homely clothes that we see upon our streets often cover as beautiful a soul as the white robes of the redeemed in heaven. We would open the eyes of men and women to the beauties of this world, and show them heaven here and now. Human life on earth is as divine as human life in any world. The pessimism of the past showed us the world as draped in mourning. The music of spheres was only a funeral dirge. The notes of the lark, upspringing in the morning sunlight, were but the echoes of a joyful past. The present held no songs of joy. The New Theology would open men's ears to hear the melodies of to-day. The world, with its countless forms of life, is but a mighty harp, whose myriad strings, breathed upon by the spirit of God, continually send forth notes of divinest melody.

We would show God in the world to-day. The Old Theology said that God once walked to Eden, but His voice is no longer heard on earth. God is in the world to-day. The Omnipotence that holds the stars of heaven in their places upholds the feeble and tottering child of earth. The wisdom that guides the wandering planet in its orbit is guiding to-day the footsteps of the trustful. God does not dwell apart upon a distant star. His spirit fills the Universe; and wherever the soul of man goes out in weakness for greater strength, goes forth in darkness for more light, goes forth in doubt and trembling, seeking faith, there it meets the soul of God, and is filled and quickened with new spiritual life. Yes, God is in human life to-day. Eden is not in the past or future. It is in the present, and God speaks to man in the midst of its many beauties.

The New Theology would interpret all the revelations of God to man. The word of God is not confined to tables of stone or rolls of musty parchment. The stones which Moses brought from Sinai were graven with the words of God; but there are other tables of stone lying hidden in the silent bosom of the earth, and these too contain the words of God, written in the hieroglyph of plant and flower, of beast and bird, fish and creeping thing; and the geologist is the Moses who brings to us these tables of stone, with their burden of Divine writing. The scrolls of parchment, stored in musty archives of medieval monastery, were closely written with God's word; but in the infinite scroll of the heavens God's fingers has traced in letters of light countless revelations of His being. Through the lips of inspired men God speaks, but also through the myriad sounds of nature. The song of bird, the ripple of the running brooks, the washing of the sad sea waves upon the beach, in all these and countless others God voices Himself to man. Science is the priestess in nature's temple. The visible Universe is the manifestation of God; in other words, a revelation of God to man. We would interpret the Scripture in the book of nature, and translate the mystic symbols of God's thoughts into human speech.—S. L. in the New Theology Herald.

My Song.

Across the hollow air there flits
A bird's wing swift and strong,
And back unto my ears is borne
A wild exultant song.

Away in space the lone bird sings;
In all the empty sky,
There is no ear to lean and list,
No heart to care save I.

For me, for me that flash of wings
Darting the clouds along,
For me the coloring of its crest,
For me its burst of song.

Oh, song in far eternity
Writ but for me, what great
And wondrous knowledge earth would gain,
Could I thy notes translate.

The mystery of life and death,
Of rapture and of pain,
Hints even of the silent spheres,
All, all, are in thy strain.

Yet it was written but for me;
I read, but woeful fate,
Although I strive and strive and strive,
The song cannot translate.

THE HOME.

Child Philosophy.

Cheerful children, who have been made happy by a warm and loving atmosphere at home, do a deal of thinking in their own way, and sometimes turn off a bit of wisdom wonderfully; for, after all, joy is the first teacher and the first learning too. There is nothing like it for quickening the young mind and showing things as they are. Happiness is a great revealer of truth; it sets things in their places; we look on them in their natural order. We were hearers, the other day, of a bit of child-philosophy which delighted us. Some little girls had constructed a couple of baby-houses in the basement, which was their play-room. Very well they had done it, too. Their materials were fruit boxes, with bits of tissue paper, old lace and other scraps, out of which they had produced some furnished, tapestried and curtained rooms, wonderful to behold, the same being inhabited by a small army of penny china dolls. Now, it so happened that the brother of the little girls was engaged intently at the same time in the construction of a scroll-saw, which he finished just as the little girls completed their baby houses. Therefore the two games, or occupations, that is, the baby-play and the use of the scroll-saw, began together. Now, the one was quiet and the other noisy—the scroll-saw being of a noisy class of tools, and this particular one uncommonly clattering by reason of being home-made; in fact, when in operation at full speed, the noise was quite astonishing and made the whole house ring like a small factory. When the family met at the tea-table, and the boy gleefully announced that his scroll-saw was “going all right,” he was told, with a spice of irony, that the tool had proclaimed its own operation loudly enough. At this one of the little girls remarked: “Yes, it makes a dreadful noise; but we have to submit to it, so we play its a mill.” There was a laugh, which quieted to a smile of approval, and then deepened into thought. Ah, blessed little children, what could one wish or hope better for you through life than that you should keep close at heart that bit of child-philosophy, and when you cannot remove a difficulty or trouble transmute it to something else by cheerful dealing with it. Yes, go on through life playing that all noises and clamorings are mills, and truly they will become so and grind good grist for you! That little child knew not her own wisdom; she touched and uttered one of the very deepest and most helpful truths of life. There is a wise saying that it is great part of the art of a good life not to try to bring things to our mind, but to bring our mind to the things. The little child could not utter it in that way, but it was just that wisdom that she meant. The child knew nothing, we suppose, of the letter to the Philippians; nevertheless she was a little Pauline, saying in her own way, “I have learned in whatsoever state I am therewith to be content.”

How many of us elders have come to that beautiful and really pious wisdom? There is a sentence of Joubert, “Children have more need of models than of critics”—which indeed is very true. Yet Jesus was not astray when he made also the childlike nature a model for the old. “A fig tree,” says an Arabian proverb, “looking on a fig tree becometh fruitful;” quoting which a writer says: “So it is with little children, their first great instructor is example.” Aye; but a big fig tree, if it be barren, may begin to bud again if it look on a little fig tree that is blossoming according to its size.

THE LEGEND OF HAMLET.

The Legend of Hamlet, Prince of Denmark, as found in the works of Saxo Grammaticus and other writers of the twelfth century. By George P. Hansen, late U. S. Consul at Elsinore, Denmark. Edited by Charlie B. Simons. Square 18mo., 57 pages. Paper, 25 cents; Cloth, 50 cents.

“Invaluable to the Shakespearean student.”—University Magazine.

“A very interesting tale of the mythical origin of the melancholy Dane.”—Saturday Evening Herald.

“A careful reading of this work would make the play even more fascinating.”—The Delphic.

“Mr. Hansen was in a position to write a valuable treatise, and he did not lose his opportunity.”—Cambridge Tribune.

“This small volume must not be judged by its size. In a vivid and charming way it gives us the legend of Hamlet—a legend which suggested Shakespeare’s immortal tragedy. * * * It is a weird, strange story, one that must interest every reader.”—Interior.

“It gives many facts not within the reach of ordinary readers in any cheap form.”—Prof. William F. Rolfe, in The Literary World.

A STUDY OF PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY.

BY LEWIS G. JAMES.

Revised Edition. 319 Pages, 8vo. Cloth, Gilt top. Price, $1.50.

Treats of the natural evolution of the Christian Religion, according to the historical method; applying the assured results of modern criticism to the question of the historical verity of Jesus, the investigation of his life and teaching, and the development of organized Christianity.

EXTRACTS FROM PRESS NOTICES:

“A thorough book, a just book, and a practical book,—that is what Dr. James has given us. * * * He has shown remarkable discrimination in what he has brought into his three hundred pages, and in what he has left out. There is nothing cumbersome, superfluous, or half explained, while a good power of compression, good imagination, quick insight into correspondences and a firm and proportionate grasp of the subject as a whole, have made possible the introduction of a remarkably large number of topics. * * * We think of no other simple and popular work so well calculated to perform the service for which this is intended, and we trust it will have a large circulation.”—Unitarian Review.

“Dr. James is evidently a thorough scholar, and one cannot fail to be impressed with the care, the honesty, the faithfulness, the impartiality, the love of truth, the conservatism exhibited throughout this admirable volume. * * * We commend the book, not only to Unitarians, but to all who are willing to trace, or to see traced in a masterly manner, the operation of natural causes, of race, politics, and social conditions generally, upon the rise and progress of Christianity.”—Popular Science Monthly.

“The temper and spirit of the book are so refined, so earnest, and so fair to all opponents, that it must impress those who are impelled to disagree with its most prominent conclusions as a model of polite and generous controversial literature.”—Brooklyn Union.

“A valuable summary on a great subject. * * * Evidently Dr. James has studied long and carefully. What is more, he judges and reports with such balanced judgment that his word weighs whether it weighs for or against one’s own opinion.”—W. C. G. in Unity.

“Calm, free from bias, intelligent, discriminating, just. * * * Mr. James has, in our opinion, done his work of elucidation remarkably well. He has put us all under a deep debt to him by his admirable presentation in one small volume of the result of years of careful study.”—The Index.

“An exceedingly creditable venture. * * * The unpretentious and lucid simplicity of style, the fullness of information, and the evident conscientiousness and painstaking for thoroughness of exposition, which is the special distinction of the book from the beginning to its close, * * * entitle this work to high praise, and render it, for popular use, and especially for Sunday-school teaching of the liberal sort, one of the best manuals of its kind with which we are acquainted.”—Christian Register.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Philadelphia.—After coping unsuccessfully with the desire of people to stay at home, Unity church, Camden, has stopped its Sunday services. It was at first intended to remain open the entire summer.

—The Germans in this city have had a very large meeting in protest against the enforcement of Sabatarian or prohibitory laws.

—The people—or some of the people—of Hammon, New Jersey, have started a sort of Sunday crusade in which the strictest observance of the day is insisted upon.

—Mr. Mangasarian, though away from the city on what is presumed to be his vacation, is not altogether inactive. I believe he has already spoken at Asbury Park, that nursing of Presbyterianism, and before the Universalist Grove meeting at Weirs, N. H.

—I had word from New England that Clifford was on a recent Sunday preparing to speak in the church at Farmington, Maine.

—The Press, of this city, speaks of Morse, who is still here, as one who made a bust of Paine, and essayed some years ago to present it to the city, but did it in such a way as to elicit a refusal. Which is all stupidly untrue, except the fact that he was the sculptor of the occasion. The formalities of presentation were entrusted to others, who did not make the best of their opportunity. —Doctor Henry T. Child spoke on the temperance movement at a week-day meeting in the Spring Garden Unitarian Church recently. While endorsing prohibition, as it seemed, the speaker was not blind to the necessities of the deeper moral influences.

—Doctor Morris Jastrow, Jr., spoke for Clifford just before the Germantown church was closed for the summer.

—There is to be a united meeting of the sections of the Society for Ethical Culture promptly in September. Sheldon will probably be there and speak. H. L. T.

Buffalo Prairie, Ill.—You stop at Reynolds—a station on the Mercer county railroad, seventeen miles south from Rock Island. There you take buggy and drive directly west some twelve miles or so to a little school house on the edge of a cornfield. This is Buffalo Prairie. The liberal friends living near the line that separates Rock Island and Mercer counties come together here, from Sunday to Sunday, to hold a Sunday school and read sermons and sing hymns for mutual edification and instruction.

—The inspiration of this earnest religious movement, in which Universalists and Unitarians are united, comes from a family, one of whose members chanced while absent from home some time ago to stray into a Unitarian church. It has been constantly fed by the post office mission at Davenport. The western secretary was cordially welcomed as only hungry souls can welcome the bringing of glad tidings, and preached twice on Sunday, 14th inst., to eager and interested audiences.

Boston Notes.—A large assortment of sermons are now at the A. U. A. Rooms, Boston, and may be had for the asking by mail or by a call.

—The Hebrew Society will dedicate on September 24th to their form of worship the edifice lately occupied by the society of Rev. E. E. Hales. The cross above the pulpit and the bronze tablet in memory of the early minister, Doctor Motte, were reserved by Mr. Hale from the sale for places in the new church when erected.

—The latest effort to evangelize the crowd is made by our Young Men's Christian Association by sending a barge with a brass band and a choir of singers and hymn leaflets to lead singing of gospel tunes at our suburban public places of resort driving to several parks in succession during the afternoon.

—The editors of the Christian Register, the "Shaybacks," have again gone into the woods of Canada to begin volume second of their delightful camp memories.

All Souls Church, Chicago.—On Sunday, August 14, the pulpit was filled by Mr. Charles H. Kerr. The services were conducted in a manner which gave great pleasure and satisfaction to the congregation. The sermon was a tender and devout expression of religious faith and a summons to the people to be up and doing, to improve the opportunities for noble work which All Souls church offered them, to break the bread of life to hungry souls standing without.

A LISTENER.

Moline, Ill.—The western secretary was detained in Moline one night last week and was taken to view the lot which the Unitarians there have purchased and on which they hope soon to build a church. They are considering plans and hope before long to get to work.

Hillside Home School.

The undersigned propose to open next September (1887) a Home School, in Helena Valley, Iowa Co., Wis., situated on the beautiful Wisconsin River Valley, forty miles west of Madison.

The aim will be to provide home comfort and guardianship with thorough training; to produce, in healthy bodies, healthy minds and self-reliant, reverent character.

A farm of a hundred acres, with its garden, farm-yard and work-shop, will give opportunity for manual and domestic training for boys and girls, indoors and outdoors.

The number of family pupils will be limited to twenty.

Terms, $350.00 per year, half in advance. Address either of the undersigned at Hillside Home School, Spring Green, Wis.

CRYING BABIES

are made

GOOD NATURED, HEALTHY, HEARTY,

by the use of

Lactated Food

Babies do not cry if they are satisfied, and they cannot be satisfied if they are not properly nourished by their food, or if it produces irritation of stomach or bowels.

Very many mothers can not properly nourish their children, and the milk of many mothers produces bad effects in the child because of constitutional disease or weakness.

For all such cases there is a remedy in

LACTATED FOOD.

Hundreds of physicians testify to its great value. It will be retained when even lime water and milk is rejected by the stomach, hence it is of great value to all invalids, in either chronic or acute cases.

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XIX.]

CHICAGO, AUGUST 27, 1887.

[NUMBER 26.]

EDITORIAL.

AN exchange, speaking of a new Presbyterian church being organized, says: "There were six husbands with their six wives among the first members." This is not strange. Given husbands, the wives are easily secured for church membership. The hard thing to do comes when you have the six wives, to secure their six husbands.

A WRITER in the Interior characterizes the Episcopalian invitation to church union in this country as a rallying cry which says: "Rally around our church and believe what you please, only so you rally!" If this be true, the pity and the shame is that there is at the core of the Episcopal church a great pretension of belief that to very many of those who do rally is unbelievable.

It is refreshing and encouraging to see the growing enthusiasm of our American Howells for the Russian Tolstoi; it supplies what has been to many a long-felt want in our American novelist and the school he represents. If these clever reporters of other people's talk could only be struck by lightning—the kind that once gave a shock to Saul of Tarsus—so that they might become dead in earnest over something, we might expect something good, aye, great. As it is, there is too much first-class ability bestowed on second or third-class subjects. Why should razors be used to whittle kindling wood?

"HAVE you ever been to Cape Cod?" asked Mr. Alcott, the Concord sage, in one of his western "conversations." "No." "Then you needn't. Go read Thoreau's book on it, and you will see much more than you would if you went there." Something like this is to be said to those who have never camped out, particularly on the banks of Lake Memphramagog. Let them read "The Shaybacks in Camp," and they'll have many of the enjoyments with none of the inconveniences and expenses. It is a good substitute for a vacation. Having made the acquaintance of Shayback, it will be all the more interesting to follow the lead of his double, Rev. Samuel J. Barrows, of the Christian Register, to spiritual pastures green and into the quietudes of the soul. The reader of Shayback will want to subscribe for the Register at once.

PROFESSOR CARY, in his lecture on "How to Study the Scriptures," before the New Theology school, insisted on the difference between reading and studying, and argued that the latter alone would discover the meaning of the Bible, because "it is a collection of ancient books by many different hands, of many widely differing dates, written in languages understood now only by scholars, and treating of things unfamiliar to men of the present time." He further showed that the Bible can only be understood by those who apply the same principles of study as they would to other historical literature, and that all other desires must be subordinated "to the simple determination of discovering what the several writers really meant to say." Alas, how rare is this attitude of mind! But among those who attain to it there is a growing consensus of opinion that the Bible is a book fertile in instruction but beset with limitations; valuable as a friend, treacherous as a master; great in its humanity but small in its divinity; earth's masterpiece of the spirit, but far too full of defects to claim a heavenly origin. When we learn that religion springs not from the Bible, then the Bible becomes a beautiful help in the religious life.

BISHOP POTTER, of New York, is making an appeal to the Protestants of America for help to build a great cathedral in that city. Of course the bishop thinks that the building would have to be controlled by the "only Protestant denomination whose ritual fits it to take charge of a cathedral," but he hopes that Methodists, Congregationalists, etc., will not hesitate on that account to lend a hand. A true cathedral is, to our mind, the most surpassing and sublime outcome of the human soul in matter. But cathedrals spring only out of living faith; they never come out of half-beliefs, make-believes or "would-like-to-believes." The faith that finds its cornerstone resting on the theory of a fallen Adam and a traditional revelation can not in the nineteenth century repeat the architectural inspirations of the fifteenth century. When the religion of character and the faith in the unities of religion begin to find embodiment in an organization and a ritual, then and not till then will the inspiration come that will paint holy pictures, compose great oratorios, and build noble buildings for religion.

DOCTOR THOMAS is reported by a Jamestown paper as having said at the New Theology school at Chautauqua: "As geology is not in the books but in the earth, so religion is not in churches, but in human souls. The trouble with the church is that it has put too much emphasis on creed, and too little on character; too much on what men believe, and too little on what they are and should be. I do not know an instance in history when at a church trial it was asked of a man 'Is he good?' What sort of man is he?' But always it has been asked 'What does he believe?' This it was that burned and hanged witches in our country, and persecuted martyrs in all times—difference of belief." How right the good Doctor is and yet how slow even liberal people are to recognize the full force of the truth. "Line upon line and precept upon precept." Let the missionary work be continued until the emphasis is shifted from words to deeds and the piety of men and of churches is measured by their life rather than by the creeds they sign or the theories of the universe which they may hold.

AT the opening of the Lakeside School of New Theology Doctor Townsend thus defined the source and meaning of the expression as he understands it:

"Religion is aspiration, trust, love, the uplift of the soul towards another higher and holier than itself.

"Theology is the attempted intellectual explanation of these feelings of religion. Thus you can see that a man may be religious without being a theologian, as he may be a theologian without being religious.

"Religion is older than theology. Before there was the Christian New Testament or the Hebrew scripture, men aspired and worshiped. In the far off twilight of human history we cannot go back so far as to find men who did not pray. But it is an intellectual-necessity of man's nature, that he must explain things. He feels and then he thinks. He admires the flower before he stops to ask how the flower grew. But he always in the end asks how. He must chain his feeling to a fact. He must explain, he will see the relation of things.

"Thus you see religion was followed by a theology, that is, an attempted intellectual explanation of its feelings.

"The New Theology then is the flower of theologic thought—the modern, the more scriptural and more natural explanation, which men are essaying to make, of the great world-old truths of religion.

"It is the latter and truer putting of theology. That which I felt with great insistence before I left the Methodist church was that Christian truth should be restated. I did not then use the expression New Theology, but afterward adopted it, as the best expression, on the whole, I could find. As far as I know, the expression was used first by the Swiss mystic, Amie.

"But you may ask wherein does the New Theology, as you teach it, differ from the Andover New Theology? In this, that it demands a restatement of all the great truths of Christianity, while that is simply the expression of a hope in the future world for those, who, in this world, had no opportunity to believe on Christ. The New Theology, as I apprehend it, demands not only the restatement of the doctrines of punishment, but of all the doctrines. But wherein does the New Theology differ from Universalism or Unitarianism? Universalism is a fixed elaborate system of theology. You can tell just what it teaches. But the New Theology is forming, not yet formed.

"Unitarianism is an elaborated system. The New Theology has just commenced its work. It demands a restatement, but does not say it is made.

"But are not you making statements of a New Theology? Yes, tentatively, but no statements of mine can be final or authoritative. But many on this side and across the ocean are gathering the materials,—this one brings a timber, this one shapes a stone, some artist is carving a statue for its prize, and by and by the Parthenon of the noble affirmation of God's great truths will rise over the fallen systems of the theologies of the past. So the New Theology is broad and inclusive enough to embrace all classes of devout and earnest souls. A Catholic, a Presbyterian, a Methodist, may be a New Theologian. The New Theology does not deny God, Christ, Atonement, Punishment, the Bible, but it does affirm that these great ideas must have a fresh and nobler expression."

Idealism.

Always it has been possible to divide men into two classes—those who test and judge the actual by the ideal, and those who try the ideal by the actual. We will not discuss now this difference, which turns on many points, and could not be treated with justice to either class without many nice but honest distinctions and careful qualifications; suffice it now to say, without giving a reason for the faith that is in us, that we like better to enthrone the ideal and bring the actual before it, than to cover the actual with ermine to judge the ideal. We say this in the sense of Lowell's saying, "To have greatly dreamed, precludes low ends;" and of George MacDonald's, "The ideal is the only absolute real;" and of Homer's,

"Thy good is prophecy
Of better still to be.
In the future thou shalt find
How far the Fact hath left behind Thy fondest Dream;"

and of Gannett's,

"For this I know,—
That our faiths are foolish by falling below,
Not coming above, what God will show;
That his commonest thing hides a wonder vast,
To whose beauty our eyes have never passed;
That his fact in the present, or in the to-be,
Outshines the best that we think we see;"

and of this, from Mrs. Woolley,—“A widening knowledge of men and things may bring diminished faith in immediate results, though it need not do that if we estimate results on the side of character and self-discipline. When enthusiasm dies it is because it has been too much engrossed in these immediate results; but it is the very essence of faith to wait the unseen and far off.”

To this same purpose is the following from a friend's letter, to which we like to give currency: “. . . I don't see how any ideal can be unattainable because of its loftiness or grandeur. You know I am an evolutionist. Our ideals grow as we grow. When we have attained the ideals of one stage of growth, another set of ideals have taken their places, so that, in fact, there are always before us unattained ideals; but that is a different thing from saying that we may have unattainable ideals. But our experience teaches us, too, that we never, or seldom, attain to our ideals in their original forms. As we approach them they take different shapes, and what we do attain to is somewhat, possibly very, different from the original conception in the mind. Yet it would scarcely be for that reason correct to say that our ideals are never attained and are not attainable. Indeed, the real often excels the ideal. The achievements of manhood may and often do excel in true heroism and grandeur and greatness and nobility the dreams and fancies of youth. Such fancies are, in fact, never realized, though they are often excelled. The reality may be higher and greater, more beautiful and more noble than that of which we dreamed.

"Now, in the various phases of existence we find about the same sort of philosophy applicable, that is to say, in matters of religion, of morals, of intellectual accomplishment, of social affairs, of government, of physical research, of commercial transactions, etc. If there were a possibility of the existence of an unattainable ideal, we should most likely, I fancy, find it in the realm of morals; yet I can scarcely believe that any man ever entertained a higher ideal than that which was, as history relates, actually exemplified in the life of Jesus. But it is possible, nay, indeed, it is probable, that history, as it comes to us, may be somewhat at fault; for while 'the good that men do lives after them, the evil is oft interred with their bones.' Of course, too, the Bishop of D—in 'Les Misérables' is a creature of Hugo's imagination. But I think I have known one man (now living) who comes very near to the attainment of these very lofty ideals. I know one man intimately, and have known him since my childhood, and have never known him to do a wrong to any human being, or to any member of the brute creation, from whose lips I never heard a word that indicated a dishonest or immoral thought. I do not claim that he never made a mistake, but I never knew him to do an act or to utter a word that impeached his morality, even though measured by the ideals furnished us in the writings of Confucius, in the New Testament, or in the imaginary characters introduced in the writings of our best modern authors. That man is my own uncle, the brother of my father. When I try to conceive a perfect man morally, I take Uncle Reuben as my model. I can scarcely conceive of a more perfect man with similar mental endowments. He comes up to my ideal. In all the years of intimate acquaintance with him I never knew him in a single instance, or for a single instant, to fall below the highest moral standard that I have been able to erect, and during many years of that time no one except his own immediate family knew him better than I did."

How it does put heart in us to meet such testimonies! How it cheers the whole world to our eyes! In the tender Bible stories the advent of Jesus was marked by a great light from heaven and angels' songs in the midst of it. So, when we meet this goodness along the common ways of life, a light breaks and the air is full of song. We always have liked the faith of that sturdy perfectionist (the good Father Taylor, of Boston, we believe it was) who, when asked if he really thought there had been ever any one so good as Jesus, cried out, "Millions, sir!"

Our friend ex'ends his idealism without hesitation from the individual to the general, from the home to the government and the race. He says,—“It is probable that your ideal and my ideal will never be realized in form, but I have faith to believe that in the matter of human governments, as in all things else, the future will bring forth realities far more grand, far more beautiful, far better than anything of which we, or the most far-seeing men that ever lived, are able faintly to conceive. I have a great deal of faith in the future of humanity in this world. I have faith to believe that the time will come when man will be not 'a little lower than the angels,' but in everything that is true and good and great, eminently higher than the gods of past ages, or the conception of the Deity which occupies the minds of many intelligent people of the present day.”

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

Unrounded Lives.

Unrounded lives, all incomplete,
The ranks of human effort fill,
While yet the heart, in mournful beat,
Preserves unbroken silence still.

A woman wears a martyr's crown,
Whose thorns have pierced but claimed no cry,
As love ne'er cast a tribute down,
To brighten life, in passing by.

Her lips are mute with songs unsung,
But speak with consolation sweet,
When other hearts, with anguish wrung,
Bring all their sorrows to her feet.

Why I Am a Heathen.

Wong Chin Foo, in an article in the North American Review, on "Why I Am a Heathen," seeks with that diplomacy which is native to foreigners to criticise our boasted Christianity, and to point out the errors and sins of our western civilization. He is impressed with the fact that the pure religion of Jesus is a farce, and that the church is more devoted to a worship of the "golden calf" than to a religion which emphasizes love to man and God. He brings to account the creeds of various churches, showing that in thought they are contradictions. He arrays some argument to show why the Chinese, as disciples of Confucius, are truer men and women than we "westernites" as followers of Jesus. He condemns our industrial system as a breeder of poverty and want, and points strongly to the disregard the Chinese government has for labor-saving machinery. He declares that the religion of Confucius has so operated on the Chinese that there is in a year less murders and less robbery among a population of 400,000,000 than are committed in the same time by the people of New York. He touches upon marriage and refers to the education of children and the treatment of criminals. He says that the Chinese possess a printed history of 3500 years and a national history of 4000 years, and that as a people they had passed through mythology, superstition, witchcraft, established religion to a philosophical one.

On finishing the article I made a few after reflections. Here is a people that is about to die from perfection. Here is a great nation who, to speak figuratively, are so pious that they have to hold on to the bushes for fear of being suddenly translated. Here is a great empire on parade, very much like the little boy who, with pantaloons rolled up, was trying to show the world his brass tipped boots. I wondered whether I had not made a mistake in embracing the Christian religion; but since he said nothing whatever about Universalists, and the flash of his eye did not scorch that denomination, I began to take breath and think that some good Universalist had spoken to him how many of us were "heathen" to the alleged established faith of the churches, and how we were conscious of their good behavior (for we never sent a missionary to the Chinese to tell them about their ancestry who were in hell, nor did we suppose that they were so bad as the ordinary missionary represented them), and especially of their advanced civilization.

This celebrated Chinese reddens our face by his bold insinuations. He forgets that we are passing through crises more terrible than those which ever threatened the Chinese empire, and that as a civilization we are rushing as a fresh born river into channels and along shores which bring woe and want to many men and women. He may condemn us for a false humanity, for industrial slavery, for the vices which grow up alongside the colleges and churches, for corrupt statesmen, for bad government and for an unpractical religion. I ask him whether the Chinese could do any better under our circumstances. We hold that life means activity—they seem to believe that it is death. We are glad that the Chinese are so compassionate, that they invite us to accept the religion of Confucius. We wonder why so many Chinese came across the Pacific to taste the fruit which grew on the tree of our western civilization—thus depreciating American labor. We ask if this is a specimen of the religion of Confucius? The point is this. The moral law is the same in China as it is in Europe or America. Jesus did not invent the moral law any more than did Newton invent the law of gravity. He discovered it. He said it should be obeyed as obediently as the law of gravity. The moral law is expressed perhaps clearly, but not completely, in the decalogue or the ten commandments. It may be condensed into love to man and God. It bids us to live righteously, and righteousness depends largely upon knowledge, education. We may, therefore, never know what absolute right is, for we hold that God has placed us here to learn how to be good by discovering the laws and conditions of goodness. Now Wong Chin Foo condemns our civilization because the mass of men live contrary to the morals of Christ. Suppose they did accept the religion of Confucius? Will confession or profession make a Chinese good? Would a change of faith make a man good who already knows what duty, what right, what truth is? This is the error of our life—we do not live as we ought. But much is to be accounted for, climate, circumstances, habits, environment, all have a warring influence on the life we try to live. We as Americans are ever ready to compare notes. But modesty forbids us sometimes in drawing up illustrations and examples of national greatness, which go far to discourage older principalities. We might say to Chin Foo that we are satisfied with our government when aware of the operation of his own, and that our civilization although largely dependent upon Christian institutions is not the result of any state religion, but is the expression of a people who know what right is, but who sacrifice in despair the good of the majority to the good of the few. We shall not boast of our charities, for we have proven that we cannot look upon misery without a tear, and on poverty without pain. We are a benevolent nation, let me say that without fear of rebuke. Our churches need reconstruction but many are beginning to see how the shining figure of Christ is again moving before the world in loving embrace with Confucius and all good teachers as the inspiration of a struggling humanity.

J. C. F. GRUMBINE.

Norway and Unitarianism.

Rev. Kristofer Janson has made a move, for which some of us have long waited and sighed. He invites us to subscribe for a monthly Unitarian paper or magazine in our own Norwegian language. Hurrah! And the programme goes far to satisfy even the most radical of us. It promises liberality and reform-advocacy in all things. The paper is not to act the blind mole to the great social questions, problems and sorely needed reforms of our day. That is good. We are nauseated with theology separated from practical morality and social life. It seems our first (lasting,—for two or three attempts to start such a paper have already been made with more enthusiasm than money, and solely by Norwegian money) Unitarian organ means to make its religion something more than selfish piety or selfish culture,—a real working force of good will to all men and faith in the All-Father. Our heartiest welcome to it; and down with the sighs that keep rising, because we have had to wait so long for this "Voice in the Wilderness." The first Norwegian paper, that will try to be at once reasonable and religious! What joy the thought gives us who well remember the years when the Old Faith tore our being in two by the conflicting demands of reason and of heart upon us. The first paper that will try to make us good, without commanding us to be stupid first; the first so to speak the great words of religion that the stars and flowers and waves and winds will not seem to laugh over them! For again we remember how ridiculously small the old religion appeared to us, how nature denied it with an annihilating smile, when, having in agony of heart sought light within the dear old church walls, we again came out into the bright sunshine or mild starlight, when again we heard the waves speak, or felt the breeze caressing us. Yes, all the heartstrings within us do sing with more of joy and hope to-day than for long times past, because a banner is to be lifted up on our mountains, around which our people can gather heart and mind. Oh, speak loudly, strongly, Mr. Jansen, that all who now feel and suffer as we once did, may hear and be saved—saved from unbelief and a life of cold, despairing defiance!

Thank God! it is thus to be done, the great work. Not forever shall darkness rule over our fair and beloved land; not forever shall it make our people walk in gloom and sadness, with minds clouded and befogged, with hearts chilled by fears and doubts and the impossibility of believing and hoping. No, the first light of dawn is here. We too are to have an organized might working to give our people the infinitely precious blessing of a rational faith. God be thanked! Yes, rejoice freely within us, Norwegian hearts, the long, long, sad waiting gives you a right to rejoice "beyond measure;" rejoice that at last the golden light is beginning to play on our hilltops. Our people will awake at last to the glory of life, to the love of God and man, and be happy; sunshine will come over the minds; warm winds will melt the coldness,—and thus will be beautified love and faith and hope in our valleys!

Ah, Mr. Janson, there is not a Norwegian who knows a rational faith but must envy you the power placed in your hands,—of introducing that faith amongst our people,—of religionizing our much rationalism and rationalizing our much religion. A Norwegian could have received no larger blessing than what is yours; may you have wisdom and grace to make the very most of it. Strike hard, and build like an able master builder and our envy shall all run into love and praise.

To understand our feelings you Americans would have to feel your heart clinging to some part of this earth, where nature seemed doubly beautiful, and tender as a mother, and all common things had a sacred, tender meaning, and to see an old faith hung like a damp, chilling mist over it, and to know of a new faith which could replace that mist with warm, beautiful sunshine; you would have to remember the agony that old faith cost you, as we remember it, the groaning prayers for blind faith at which our mind scornfully laughed and mused the next minute; the prayers for "light," which were answered, though the answers but made the agony worse; the vain, fruitless search from church to church for "light" to live by; the beggings of the heart to be allowed to trust and be at rest, the protests of reason seeing no honorable way of so doing. Oh, yes, even "theology" and "doctrine" have saving power.

How we have longed, longed for this preaching of a rational faith amongst the people we love with all our heart and soul and strength, and believe in in spite of all faults and sins, and feel able to do and to live greatly, as soon as it is able to believe. Its curse is skepticism developed even into quiet, resigned unbelief. The educated classes of our people have largely long ago ceased to have any faith, being too well educated mentally to accept the only faith they ever hear preached—the Lutheran. And that lack of faith (the fact has its "moral" and lesson for you this side the water, also,) results in a dearth of nobler motives, of higher living, in a dreadful conservatism, indifference, and satisfaction with whatever circumstances make for them or of them, in a deadened conscience, in a sort of spiritual laziness; in ignorance of all laws or motives but those of ancient custom. The blood is good and keeps alive a sort of instinctive reverence for right and truth, instinctive uprightness,—our best inheritance from the days when the old faith was really believed. And great mental activity has kept us in the front rank of civilized nations in all outward respects. We pride ourselves in one of the very best of public school systems developed in spite of poverty and other extraordinary difficulties. We pride ourselves in the freest and most democratic constitution of any monarchy in the world,—of being in fact as free and democratic a nation as there is anywhere. We pride ourselves in a material development for our small natural resources as marvelous as that of the United States, and we pride ourselves in having no aristocracy of any kind, nor any class of politicians, in having effectively abolished all aristocratic titles and privileges over 60 years ago. And we pride ourselves in a people which cannot be proved to stand behind any in physical, mental or moral build.

But that skepticism has checked all forward moral activity; and works every day more and more to deaden the people, it has allowed vices to flourish and grow strong amongst us, growing daily stronger and more widespread.

It is that skepticism in which we see the danger and drawback to our country. We have had no Channing; if we had—there would have been little Norwegian immigration in this country; we should have had a little paradise at home. But he was sent to you, and you have kept him and his word to yourselves alone. You had a missionary work to do; for some reason it was not done. We have had no Channing; we may still have him; if so his audience will be enormous; thousands groan in spirit for him.

But our liberalism, our rational religion and preaching happened to set up their pulpit in literature and not in the church, and we have reaped both the advantages and disadvantages thereof. The advantage has been a peerless, widespread, almost universal liberalism and radicalism in all matters of thought; the disadvantages have been the conception of religion and righteousness as poetic dreams and dramatic themes rather than as life and reality,—a wide breach between the ideal and the real,—a feeling that the ideal is for poetry and stage only,—that reality is not to be and cannot be idealized. We have had no pulpit-mediation between poet and people, such as you have. And our liberalism, our rationalism has lost the simplicity, directness, naturalness and reverence only a liberal pulpit could have given it. We possess all the best elements of Unitarianism, but they are to us as yet only a rainbow of hope and prophecy in the sky,—only poetry; we need a liberal pulpit to draw them down to earth and daily life and make them appear real, possible and necessary. If Americans ever think of sending missionaries to us let them remember this, that we have less need of new thought than of men who can make clear, and real, and to seem practicable our own best thoughts. Our literature is full of "liberal scripture," our poets have already done much to furnish a "Unitarian hymn book." We need men to clear our thoughts and convert them into principles, men who can give us faith in our own best ideas, men whose own lives move on higher levels, propelled by nobler motives and with wider orbits. We need the idealistic actor more than the idealistic thinker; and for the idealistic talker—we don't need him and don't want him. But we do need an idealism with faith and thought enough to make it a religion, a reverence, a moral leaven in real life, a builder of real churches and not merely of "temples in the air."

Our educated classes do largely look upon our established and almost only church as a merely preventive police organization,—something to frighten and charm the poor, the masses, into submission to their lot, and fear of doing too much evil or harm. They themselves expect no help from it, and receive none. Amongst the most ignorant the old faith is but a gross superstition, with some ennobling elements in it. And it loses ground more and more everywhere,—loses even its restraining influence over the ignorant, even its police utility. As a moral leaven it was long, long ago "hors de combat;" as a spiritual institution it is as dead as a mummy. Its best friends rest their hopes only in radical reforms within it, and such church reforms are to-day foremost in our public life. Would it not have been wise and well had Unitarians long ago endeavored to sow a few good seeds here,—if nothing more than translations of some of the best Unitarian writings? "Are we our brother's guardian?" you ask. Certainly not; not ours at least. I trust we can, and shall, work out our own salvation with our own hands, heads and pockets.

Janson's paper, allow a ray of the light given it to fall over amongst us. And surely none could be better equipped for such a work by nature than Mr. Janson. Himself a poet, he ought to be able to absorb all that is good and strong in American Unitarianism, and in his Norwegian poet-heart melt it, and rid it of its peculiar Americanisms and bring it forth to us a Norwegian Unitarianism. For American Unitarianism needs that transformation to be able to strike roots into our hearts and national life. We don't want any "foreign mission" amongst us, and we cannot quite feel at home with American Unitarianism. If you will not too grossly misunderstand me, we do need something a little softer, a little more tender-hearted, "sentimental;" we do have some "weak" spots in our hearts which must be touched, or our allegiance is but partial,—then we need something a little more of the "glory-shouting" kind, and something which will "go to the hands and muscles" as well as to the head and heart. We have our peculiar needs and sentiments, and even our own peculiar "heads." And Unitarianism is able to fit them all by a little national transmutation.

The problems a Norwegian rational church has to solve are many and great. It must be to us all, or it will be to us nothing. It must be able to inspire new motives and life into weary and empty souls, reorganize a nation disunited, disorganized by superstition and skepticism—into a true church, in that word's noblest sense. It must be able to inaugurate great and sweeping moral reforms under its banner, and raise individual character to higher levels.

That is what we need; and our faith and hope in Unitarianism are caused by our belief that it contains the needed elements.

We need inspiring motives rather than beautiful doctrines. Theology, however liberal, can no more move us than poetry will stop the cholera. Yet we will be glad to borrow (take or steal) whatever great thoughts we find anywhere. We have a wealth of them, and so have you, and yours shall be ours as well as our own. That is our "mission" we have already established. Since you did not send your good seed to us we have come here to take it, and send it back. And you will not be angry to know that we have our eyes on many ship-loads of precious things amongst you which we mean to take without asking permission. We don't care much for your "broad acres" and "miles and miles of fruitful land;" our own rocks and narrow valleys suit us better. But we do care for your wealth of noble and vivifying thoughts, and mean to make them ours. We will gladly give you our own in return, if you care for them; if not, still yours shall be ours, and no doubt Mr. Janson's paper will be a sort of spiritual telegraph between your country and ours, along which the best in English and American literature will perpetually pass over into our mental atmosphere and enrich us.

Such are our reasons for rejoicing in Mr. Janson's undertaking. It is to us the greatest task to be done for Norway. But should we have been overestimating his proposed paper and its work; should our hopes therein fail, still the work, the work of Norway's moral and mental upbuilding and enriching; of its organization into a true, a living church, will go on, for many minds and hearts are now at work on that great task in different ways. The needs and spiritual disorganization of our country are producing a hungering, loving search after truth and right; a warm and righteous patriotism.

"And our love shall be the seed
To bear the fruit we need."

* * * * *

My land will I defend,
My land will I befriend,
And my son, to help its fortunes and be faithful, will I train;
Its weal shall be my prayer,
And its want shall be my care,
From the rugged old snow-mountains to the cabins by the main."

H. TAMBS LYCHE.

P. S.—Just as this article is concluded, I am in receipt of the fourth number of a well-filled, good-looking Swedish monthly, published in Minneapolis by two Swedes, and evidently without foreign help. It seems to have come to stay, and thus to have the honor of being our first Scandinavian organ for rational religiousness.

At the Grave of Emerson.

Spirit serene and sweet, farewell!
The cold earth mourns for thee;
Winds chant thy threnody;
A thousand hearts throb with the knell,—
Farewell! Farewell!

Master of life and death, farewell!
The awful sphinx once more
Sits brooding as of yore;
The secret on her lips, oh tell,
And then farewell!

Prophet beloved of men, farewell!
From what far sun-lit height,
In grander, loftier flight,
Does the freed soul its rapture tell,
And breathe farewell?

Poet and Seer of truth, farewell!
The inner silence thrills;
We see the star-crowned hills;
Thy voice like an exultant bell
Repeats,—Farewell!

"Brothers, the soul knows no farewell!
It is nor here, nor there;
Illimitable and fair,
Its ebb and flow, life's ocean swell,
No secrets tell.

"The soul is its own oracle;
And hearts that love and bleed
The sphinx's lesson read;
O'er heights of heaven and depths of hell
Stand sentinel.

"All-Being's holy calm to tell
Those silent lips are set;
The ages plod and fret;
Still glows within decay's dark cell
Soul's miracle."

Slow dies the voice from glen and dell;
The inner silence thrills,
But o'er the star-crowned hills
Gray mists descend; broken the spell!
Farewell! Farewell!

SARAH E. BURTON.

CONCORD SUMMER SCHOOL OF PHILOSOPHY.

No Time to Think.

We live in a perpetual whirl. Every moment here is a fresh distraction, every hour a new excitement. We rush hither and thither, receiving at every turn a fresh current of some electric emotion, until at last we become little better than mere tennis balls, driven backward and forward by the racket of circumstance. We bolt our books as savages bolt their food. The thoughts of others stream through our minds as water through the sieve. In place of thought there is substituted the perpetual titillation of the mind by the printed record of the thoughts or the acts of others. We have not time to do anything. Science is perpetually lengthening our day and shortening the inevitable waste of time. The railway and the telegraph have enormously economized time, and the more we save the less we seem to have. Yet the day is as long as it was when Eliphaz, the Temanite, discoursed on the eternities to Job among his potsherders, and the twenty-four hours are told out with the same precision as when they sufficed to the Romans to conquer the world.

Why is it? Why have we no time to think? Because we don't think it worth while to think. Take, for instance, the case of Mr. G. He thinks, no doubt, a good deal. But he is often at a loss for a time to think out the problems with which he is concerned. We do not say this because he so often seems to have no time in which to make up his mind, but because his observations on the subject show the familiarity that can alone be born of fellow feeling and sad experience. Yet Mr. G. constantly does things which he need not do, which take up time that might be spared for thinking. Take shaving, for instance. Kirke White is said to have learned Greek by devoting to its study the quarter of an hour which would otherwise have been sacrificed every day in reaping the worthless stubble of the chin. If all the shaved men of London were to devote a quarter of an hour every morning to sober serious reflection, to thinking over the solution of the social questions, what a different world it would be! But if a man comes down unshaved he falls at once under the scourge of a social lash, wielded in the first case by his women-folk, and afterwards by his friends, whereas no immediate penalty is prescribed for neglecting the study of the gravest problems of society. Life, according to all the moralists, is too precious a thing to be frittered away in exchanging a black tie for a white one, or a brown coat for the regulation swallow tail. Yet the most necessary thinking will be left unthought rather than that a great social convention should be neglected. And as it is with shaving and dressing for dinner, so it is with all the numberless fetters which society has forged for the individual. We lose our life in the endless multiplicity of trivialities, and we fritter away our minds over the endless tittle-tattle of the world. Newspapers, no doubt, are largely responsible for this. The newspaper is the great gossipmonger of the day, and gossip is not innocuous because it is printed—however much it may lack the "inspiration of personality."—English Paper.

THE STUDY TABLE.

Drone's Honey. A Novel. By Sophie May. Boston: Lee & Shepard.

Standing as Sophie May does, in the first ranks of juvenile writers, not a little pleasure is found in the perusal of her first effort in the novel line, which she calls "Drone's Honey." There are fine dashes of humor and conventional pictures of distress; and while the story itself is laid among New England hills, breezy and beautiful, and always dear to those who know them, the writer possesses in no small degree a gift for description which never becomes tiresome to the most indifferent reader,—together with somewhat fine handling of widely diversified characters. If one may detect here and there a subtle lack of finish, and possibly a suggestion of triteness, it is readily excusable and more than balanced by the delicate weaving of fine thoughts and artistic fancies. For the true heroine, Theodate, the story ends à la mode, i. e., unsatisfactorily, and leaves ample room for an interesting sequel.

THE Literary World closes its notice of the Rolfe-Hersey edition of Browning's "A Blot on the 'Scutcheon," and other dramas, as follows:

"The fact that Shakespeare is the only name suggested as we try to deal with Browning's dramatic quality, is itself a testimony to the grade of his work. If the first drama in this book does not convince the reader of Browning's right to be judged as seriously as Shakespeare, then we much overrate "A Blot on the 'Scutcheon."

"Such a remark as that, coming from so warm-hearted a Shakesperian as Doctor Rolfe, carries weight, and we commend it to the notice of those who are in the habit of sneering at the name of Browning."

Sunday Lessons for Infants at School and at Home. By Aunt Amy. London: Sunday-school Association. Chicago: Western Unitarian Sunday-school Society. Cloth, pp. 136. Price, 75 cents.

A charming little volume has just been published by the Sunday-school Association of London, as a guide to mothers and teachers of infant schools. Nothing could be better or more entirely opposed to the old-fashioned way of imparting religious truth—far above the heads of the little ones.

The authoress (Aunt Amy) takes a simple hymn which the children can perfectly understand, and emphasizes the important words by pictures, stories and lessons from life.

The works of God referred to are made to draw out thoughts of His love and care, and lessons of trust and obedience are taught simply and naturally. Would that all our little ones had such wise instruction, satisfying their wondering minds and impelling them onward toward truth and goodness!

THE HOME.

A Doorway Picture.

Close by the open door she stands,
Tall and slender, erect and fair;
Her baby climbs, with dimpled hands,
And mounts beside her a stately chair.

Grasping her garment's silken fold,
He laughs, with wild-rose lips apart;
His head, all crowned with curling gold,
Comes just as high as his mother's heart.

Beautiful boy! though you win through life
Wisdom and honor, wealth and art,
You will never reach, in this world of strife,
To a higher place than your mother's heart.

—Mrs. L. G. McVean, in Sunday School Times.

Miss Greene's Way.

BY MISS IDA M. GARDNER, PROVIDENCE, R. I.

When the bell rang for recess, Christie and Arnold presented themselves at Miss Greene's desk. With drooping heads and flushed countenances from which the smiles had not wholly departed, they managed to say, in a shamefaced manner—

"Miss Allen sent us to you."

"Sent you to me?" asked Miss Greene, in a grave, surprised tone. Lowering her voice, she added, "For what?"

The smiles had all gone now. "For laughing in the class."

"Had Miss Allen asked you not to laugh?"

"Yes'm."

"And you refused to grant her request?"

"Yes'm." The heads were lower now.

"What would you think, boys, of a gentleman who refused to grant a lady's request, provided the request was a proper one?"

A long pause. Silence was a very effective weapon in Miss Greene's hands. She never hurried her pupils for an answer, when conscience was working within. Still, the boys knew she was waiting for an answer. At last Christie ventured to speak.

"Shouldn't think he was very gentlemanly."

"You did not think of that, I presume, when you refused to grant Miss Allen's request."

Another silence.

"Boys, I am ashamed of you!"

The little faces were very serious now. The amusing incident was forgotten. Toes squirmed in shoes in a way toes have when boys feel uncomfortable. At last Arnold looked up, with an earnest, troubled look on his dear face.

"What can we do about it, Miss Greene?"

"What ought you to do about it? What would any gentleman, who had offended a lady, do?"

After some thought, Christie answered:

"He'd say, 'Scuse me.'" Arnold added, "He'd 'polergize.'"

"Yes, he would, and he ought to; that is, if he did not intend to offend again. If he did, it would be adding insult to injury."

"May we 'polergize to Miss Allen?"

"Certainly you may, if you do not intend to offend her again. That is just what a gentleman would do; and I know, boys, that down deep in your hearts you mean to be gentlemen.

The quick, glad look of relief from their shame passed over both faces.

"But, boys,"—Miss Greene's voice was very impressive in those firm, low tones,—“boys, remember this: either you must govern yourselves, or I must do it for you. If you can take care of yourselves, I would so much rather you would; but if you cannot, then I must.”

The lesson was not soon forgotten, and Miss Allen never again had occasion to send those boys to the principal. If ever they began to grow restless, she had only to say quietly, “Boys, must I send you to Miss Greene?”

The assistants in Miss Greene's building used to say, “I do not know how she does it, but the goodness that comes to a boy after he has been to Miss Greene always seems to come to stay.”

Months after the incident described above, Arnold gave, unconsciously, the clew to Miss Greene's success with her boys. His little brother George was fractious and giving his mother much trouble. The following dialogue was reported by the mother:

“George, I wish you went to Miss Greene's school!”

“Why?”

“'Cause then you'd have to mind!”

“What'd she do to me if I didn't?”

“Do! She wouldn't do anything, but she'd make you feel as if you must!”—The American Teacher.

Fred and the Mice.

Fred was a little five-year old boy. Everybody loved him, or he was a contented and happy child. He thought himself a little hero, and often, armed with a stick, made war on the chickens and geese. Although Fred thought himself so brave, there was one animal of which he was much afraid. What do you think it was? Well, it was a mouse! Such a little animal could make our young hero tremble and cry.

In the evening, when Fred went to bed, he was obliged to go through an unused room, where the mice seemed to hold possession. When he saw them running over the floor or heard them gnawing, he would cry, in a cowardly way, for his mamma to come to him.

One evening his mamma was sick, and his nurse was away from home. There was no one there but his papa, who was in the sitting-room reading his paper. He told Fred it was time to go to bed.

“O papa, will you not take me to bed? I do not like to go through that room alone.”

“What do you fear?” asked his father.

“I am afraid of the mice; and I believe there are rats, too.”

“If that is all,” answered his father, “I can soon help you.”

He took pen, ink and paper and quickly wrote the following:

“To all rats and mice in this house: I hereby command you to let my little son go through all the rooms of this house unmolested. Any rat or mouse that does not obey will be dealt with according to law.”

The father signed and then read the paper to his son. Fred took it, thanked him, said “good night” very prettily, and went to bed. He was no longer afraid. He had often seen his father give passes to people who wished to make a railroad journey, so he had a high opinion of passes written by his father.

When he came to the door of the room, he stopped and said in a loud voice, “Rats and mice, you can not hurt me, for here is my pass.” And so he did every night afterward, until he became a large boy, and was no longer afraid of rats and mice.—From the German.

MANY people take no care of their money till they have come nearly to the end of it, and others do the same with their time.—Goethe.

THE LEGEND OF HAMLET.

The Legend of Hamlet, Prince of Denmark, as found in the works of Saxo Grammaticus and other writers of the twelfth century. By George P. Hansen, late U. S. Consul at Elsinore, Denmark. Edited by Charlie B. Simons. Square 18mo, 57 pages. Paper, 25 cents; Cloth, 50 cents.

“Invaluable to the Shakespearean student.”—University Magazine.

“A very interesting tale of the mythical origin of the melancholy Dane.”—Saturday Evening Herald.

“A careful reading of this work would make the play even more fascinating.”—The Delphic.

“Mr Hansen was in a position to write a valuable treatise, and he did not lose his opportunity.”—Cambridge Tribune.

“This small volume must not be judged by its size. In a vivid and charming way it gives us the legend of Hamlet—a legend which suggested Shakespeare's immortal tragedy. * * * It is a weird, strange story, one that must interest every reader.”—Interior.

“It gives many facts not within the reach of ordinary readers in any cheap form.”—Prof. William F. Rolfe, in The Literary World.

A STUDY OF PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY.

BY LEWIS G. JAMES.

Revised Edition. 319 Pages, 8vo. Cloth, Gilt top. Price, $1.50.

Treats of the natural evolution of the Christian Religion, according to the historical method; applying the assured results of modern criticism to the question of the historical verity of Jesus, the investigation of his life and teaching, and the development of organized Christianity.

EXTRACTS FROM PRESS NOTICES:

“A thorough book, a just book, and a practical book,—that is what Dr. James has given us. * * * He has shown remarkable discrimination in what he has brought into his three hundred pages, and in what he has left out. There is nothing cumbrous, superfluous, or half explained, while a good power of compression, good imagination, quick insight into correspondences and a firm and proportionate grasp of the subject as a whole, have made possible the introduction of a remarkably large number of topics. * * * We think of no other simple and popular work so well calculated to perform the service for which this is intended, and we trust it will have a large circulation.”—Unitarian Review.

“Dr. James is evidently a thorough scholar, and one cannot fail to be impressed with the care, the honesty, the faithfulness, the impartiality, the love of truth, the conservatism exhibited throughout this admirable volume. * * * We commend the book, not only to Unitarians, but to all who are willing to trace, or to see traced in a masterly manner, the operation of natural causes, of race, politics, and social conditions generally, upon the rise and progress of Christianity.”—Popular Science Monthly.

“The temper and spirit of the book are so refined, so earnest, and so fair to all opponents, that it must impress those who are impelled to disagree with its most prominent conclusions as a model of polite and generous controversial literature.”—Brooklyn Union.

“A valuable summary on a great subject. * * * Evidently Dr. James has studied long and carefully. What is more, he judges and reports with such balanced judgment that his word weighs whether it weighs for or against one's own opinion.”—W. C. G. in Unity.

“Calm, free from bias, intelligent, discriminating, just. * * * Mr. James has, in our opinion, done his work of elucidation remarkably well. He has put us all under a deep debt to him by his admirable presentation in one small volume of the result of years of careful study.”—The Index.

“An exceedingly creditable venture. * * * The unpretentious and lucid simplicity of style, the fullness of information, and the evident conscientiousness and painstaking for thoroughness of exposition, which is the special distinction of the book from the beginning to its close, * * * entitle this work to high praise, and render it, for popular use, and especially for Sunday-school teaching of the liberal sort, one of the best manuals of its kind with which we are acquainted.”—Christian Register.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Profit Sharing.—We are glad to learn from Work and Wages that Rev. N. P. Gilman, well known as the associate editor on the Unitarian Review, is studying the problem of profit sharing, and is to give us the result one of these days in a book on the subject. This seems to us the only rational solution of the labor perplexities, and we will look with interest for the book from so judicious and diligent a mind as Mr. Gilman's. We are also glad to commend the paper from which we glean this item of news. It seems to be a paper conducted with ability and fairness. It is such a paper as the non-partisan, he who is neither capitalist nor laborer as technically interpreted, ought to read. It is edited by F. H. Giddings, and published monthly at Springfield, Mass., the annual subscription price being one dollar.

Hobart, Ind.—The Unitarians of Hobart are alive. The western secretary spent Sunday, August 21, with them. They have bought a new organ and repainted and recarpeted the interior of the church at a cost of some two hundred dollars. A literary entertainment is announced for one evening this week, and a temperance meeting for another evening. The Sunday-school and social meetings are largely attended. A fine illustration here of what can be accomplished without a resident minister. For preaching they have been depending on the monthly visits of Rev. A. G. Jennings. Much is due to the devotion and energy of W. H. Rifenburg, an interested layman of the village.

Where is the Line between radicalism and conservatism? The Interior in noticing James Freeman Clarke's "Thomas Didymus" says the author has "literary abilities of a high order and theological views of the loosest kind. The work is so colored with Unitarianism and rationalism as to be practically worthless as a life of Christ."

The Rising Race.—The graduating class at Oberlin this year contained seven colored people; that at Ann Arbor contained three. Allenville, Georgia, is named after a colored man who is the leading capitalist of the town.

Princeton, Ill.—The Unity Sunday Circle at this place is getting along most encouragingly. Rev. Mr. Fisher, of Sheffield, recently preached there, and a Universalist minister spoke morning and evening last Sunday.

Union City, Pa.—Rev. L. W. Mason, of the Unitarian church of Union City, made us a call this week. He has been recuperating in Nebraska, and is taking in Chicago on his return to his field of work.

LESSONS ON LUKE.

BY DAVID UTTER.

The Chicago Union Course for 1887-8. Price 25c.; weekly leaflets, 35c. per hundred.

These lessons are arranged under a Graded system of Union work. The questions are adapted to the primary, intermediate and adult grades, each grade having two leading questions suited to the ages it would naturally include, upon the one lesson in hand. The memory verse is the same for all. Brief but suggestive notes on the lessons are also connected with each.

This form of instruction is an effort toward combining the best qualities of the two methods in Sunday-schools—Union and Graded lessons. It has been used for four years in Chicago Sunday-schools, and with each year improvements are made in the working of the system. This course is now offered as an advance, therefore, upon anything yet reached in this direction. The Union teachers' meetings will be held each Monday noon, as heretofore, at the headquarters, and it is intended that the short review of the hour's conversation, which has appeared regularly in UNITY, shall be more complete this year than in the past.

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XX.]

[NUMBER 1.]

EDITORIAL.

POOR Ireland has suffered and is suffering many cruel wrongs from without. But how much more cruelly she stabs herself is seen in the item that says she spends annually $55,000,000 for drink.

The South-Western Methodist, commenting on the costliness of war, says: "A Christian church is the best fort ever built." Very likely, but we like it best when it is dismantled. Our churches do altogether too much fighting.

AND now it is the Silk Workers that are on a strike in New York city, because a woman has been hired to work at the loom. Perhaps if the women would only boycott these weavers at the dinner table, they might bring them to terms soon.

GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS says that Mr. Cleveland's re-election will be greatly imperiled if "he renounces the reform principles which he honestly cherishes." His right to the respect of all decent people will be forfeited by such action, however it may be with his election. Let no one apply for the next presidency that is not of clean hands, an independent spirit, and by divine appointment a civil service reformer.

E. B. POWELL, in the Independent, recommends farmers to go into partnership with the birds rather than try to exterminate them. He plants an extra amount of raspberries, strawberries, etc., and gives the birds their share. By thus following the scripture injunction to feed his enemies he converts them into friends. This is a suggestion that might be of value in other fields of labor. Mr. Powell was once a Unitarian minister, and we doubt not but that his gardens and the birds are the better for it.

ADMINISTER your own estate! Why should you, O man of means and of sense, wait until you have no power to help the world before you begin to think of the good your wealth can do? If you have no time or means to spare now, at least order your household in such a way that when your house is left without a holder, it will give as little annoyance and confusion to your successors as possible. While you are in health and sanity, cheerfully and carefully adjust your affairs for death. Shame on the man or woman who dies without even a "will" to show the way their willingness tends.

DR. EDWARD JUDSON, son of the great Baptist missionary, Dr. Adoniram Judson, is pastor of one of the real churches in New York city—a church that exists to do good, with its cold water fountains for the public in summer, its cozy corner for the houseless in winter. He has recently said, "I would put the best churches right down in the swampy spots of our cities—the finest architecture, the best preaching and the sweetest music. If the rich and the poor are to come together, the rich have got to come almost the whole way, in the nature of things."

ON Monday of next week the usual noon meetings for the Sunday-school teachers of the Union course of study will be resumed. The series for this winter is called "Lessons on Luke." Mr. Utter, who has prepared the course, will lead the first meeting. These lessons, as advertised in another column of this issue, seek to combine the advantages of the union and graded system of study. After following for four years a similar plan of work in these schools, it is believed that this course offers advantages for both teachers and scholars over any of the others, and we wish it might be adopted by other schools in companion churches of the west. UNITY's review of the noon meetings will be as full as possible, but it is especially desirable that each school using the lessons should hold separate weekly meetings of its own, that individual demands may be more fully met.

THE New Theology Herald, which with this issue becomes a part of UNITY, is the twelfth journal founded on the promulgation of liberal ideas in the west that has given of its life to this paper since its establishment in 1878. The Liberal Worker, the Spectroscope, the Church of the Unity, the Unitarian Advocate, the Liberal and the Church-Door Pulpit were separately and successively merged in UNITY, while the Alliance, the Weekly Magazine, the Fortnightly Index and the Educational News had united their strength with that of The University, which joined forces with us in March, 1886.

"WE have more than once referred to a kind of a reviva of modern Hinduism. It is the fashion of the hour to profess allegiance to the forms of current Hinduism, although it is a well known fact that most of these adherents are secret disbelievers in all the superstitions of current Hinduism. . . . A new moral impetus requires to be imported that would lead our men to look upon hypocrisy as a defilement of the soul of man and the dishonoring of God."

The above quotation is from a Calcutta paper, and is meant for India; but we leave our readers to change a few words and adapt it to American latitude.

"MASTER, my six brethren are all asleep, and I alone have remained awake to worship Allah."

"And you, too, had better been asleep, if your worship of Allah consists in accusations of your brethren."

A writer in the Independent quotes the above good story from the east, and in his comment upon the same occurs the following ever timely truth. Let all our readers note and take heed:

"It is better for a man to hold an untruth in the spirit of righteousness than the truth in unrighteousness. The former is standing in the porch of the temple, the night about him, and he still in the darkness; but he is moving toward the door, and he will come into the light. The other may be nearer the light than he; but his back is toward it; and he is moving out of the door into the darkness."

IN the middle of a June letter, framed in between kind messages and eager hopes about the Western Conference, came these quiet words: "My call from Dr. R— this week quite unsettles me. He told my husband his mind about my disease four months since, but has withheld it from me till now. . . . There is no hope for me, and the brain will show more and more its fracture and disease. . . . I don't let it worry me. What 'Daily Strength' said the morning following the doctor's call was a great help to me—found in Wednesday's lesson." (May 25. The words were echoes of the cry of Jesus facing his "no hope": "O, my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless not as I will, but as Thou wilt.") Bravely done, to copy out and forward one's death-sentence so simply to a friend! The creeping doom that first had blinded her and then was sealing sense after sense, has at last finished its work. Her own word shall be the notice of her death. Reverently we record her name in the little paper to which she was so friendly ("J— reads it completely to me"), her broad, bright evangelical faith serving as interpreter of any alien thought. She bore her blindness in such happy wise, and so much as if some inward heaven were lit for her, that its memory will be to those who knew her a memory of richness rather than of deprivation, like the memory of a night magnificent with stars. A trial nobly borne is no slight bequest to leave a world.

"What keeps Mr. — from kirk, James?" said a worthy minister; "I hope it is not Methodism?" "No!" responded the verger, "its something worse." "What then is it, Calvinism?" "Worse, your reverence, worse." "Surely, James, its not Deism?" "Much worse, an' it please your reverence, than that." "Can it be Athelism which deprives us of the best churchwarden that ever shook a box?" "Truly," responded James, "tis a much more serious matter—it is rheumatism."

We clip the above from the "funny column" of an English exchange. We reprint it, not because it is humorous, but because it suggests a very serious and important truth. Truly disease is worse than heresy. Rheumatism of the soul is a much more serious matter than peculiarities of thought. Religion has little to fear from the results of honest thinking, whether it leads to Calvinism or Agnosticism; but it has everything to fear from strictures of the heart, a paralysis of the affections or a rheumatism of the conscience. These spiritual diseases are very prevalent in our churches, and they sometimes assail pulpits that are very sound in their theology.

ARCHDEACON FARRAR, of the Episcopal church, in a recent address to some college students, distinguishes the old from the new theology with a clearness which many Unitarians might well emulate. He says:

"There is a theology which confuses a knowledge of words with a knowledge of things; it is a theology which offers to the yearning hunger of mankind the dry husks of a terminology instead of the living manna of a revelation. This kind of theology has kindled the fires of persecution and inflamed the bitterest spirit of ecclesiastical controversy. But there is another kind of theology that is humble, deeply convinced that what we know is little, and what we are ignorant of is immense. Test your theology by its fruits. Suspect the theology when it carries in its hand the crude, bitter apples of discord. Reverence the theology that brings forth the fruits of the spirit, which are pure, peaceable and full of mercy and truth."

Aye, thou hast spoken well, good canon. The world has had too much of that Christian theology that arouses unchristian feelings and draws unchristian lines; too much of that thought of God, even, that leaves out of its pale some of the works of God. The theology that is ever new and ever coming is the theology that inspires God-likeness and Christ-likeness.

THE thanks of all lovers of humanity are due to President Cleveland for his recognition of Miss Alice C. Fletcher's heroic work among the Indians. He has appointed her Indian agent to allot lands in severalty to the Winnebagoes under the Dawes bill. Miss Fletcher has already rendered such a service to the Omahas, the bill securing the same was drafted by herself. Her labors in this direction were so arduous that they nearly cost her her life and have left her a cripple. And still she persists in her labors for a people whom she knows, from intimate living with them for many years. Her missionary zeal led her to exchange the cultivated society of Cambridge for the wigwam.

And yet Harvard college has no place for a woman on her benches, and the Divinity school at Cambridge, progressive and rational as it claims to be, has no helping hand to offer in the training of women even to the Unitarian pulpit. The world must still wait for the conquering faith that is both scientific, zealous, rational and devout. It will come only through woman's help. When it does come the Cambridge Divinity school, or a greater school than Cambridge, will have wide open doors to receive those who belong to the Fletcher sisterhood.

A DOCTOR of Divinity, in a Methodist exchange, puts in a good word for Adam. We are glad to encourage this tardy attempt to do justice to a much abused character by making room for the following:

"Adam seems to have been born an orphan and of full age. He never knew the pleasures of childhood, never tasted a mother's love, never enjoyed the training of her gentle, loving hand. He entered upon life with all his uncultured inexperience, and this may largely account for his unfortunate conduct. His bachelorhood was of brief duration. From his own side, by careful, skillful surgery, a rib was extracted, and he was introduced to the first woman he saw as his bride. Certainly his gallantry in yielding to the wish of Eve to partake of the forbidden fruit was under the probably common idea that thus knowledge would be increased and, perhaps, facility afforded to better service of their God, in their lovely Eden home. We regret the early exhibition of human weakness on the part of our great ancestor, when, in unmanly excuse, he directly laid his fault on his wife, and indirectly on God who gave her.

What a wonder was Adam—a grown man without the introduction of childhood. He escaped all the pains and penalties of his descendants in teeth-cutting, measles, whooping cough and the dreaded "second summer." What a loss! Adam never played marbles, chased butterflies, and flew kites. What an escape he had! Never one of childhood's most touching memories, the eating of green apples, attended by the inward affliction of castor oil, and the external affliction of the birch—as preventives of injury. He was not called to tread the earlier paths of literary ascent, in the mysteries of primer and spelling book, and the intricacies of grammar and arithmetic."

The New Theology Herald.

It will be a surprise to many and a delight to all of our readers to learn that the strength of the paper bearing the above name, published at Jamestown, N. Y., is hereafter to be united with the strength of UNITY. Both the editors and the readers of that paper, we trust, will find more room and delight in this larger combination. The reasons which led to this union on the part of our Jamestown friends are fully set forth by themselves below. Speaking for UNITY, we would say that, while this new acquisition of strength was unexpected and wholly unsolicited on our part, we hail it with hearty delight and hasten on behalf of our readers and associates to bid earnest welcome to these fellow workers; it is an opportunity exactly in the line of the entire history and aim of UNITY. It enables us to demonstrate in practice what we have always claimed in theory, viz., that we stand for a non-doctrinal and a non-sectarian fellowship in the religious life. Our fellowship is for those to whom fellowship is denied, and our co-operation is for all those who seek to help humanity. We continue to be Unitarian so far as that emphasizes the unity of humanity, the universality of religion, and the community of aspiration. We are Independent, so far as we recognize the right of each individual and each society to formulate their own thoughts and to choose their own phraseology. We believe that this movement of our Jamestown friends is a significant hint of what is moving everywhere, and what some of these days will come to the surface and prove to be a great religious tide that will represent the Unity Alliance of the non-creedal churches of America. This alliance will appeal to the unchurched, and lift them into the joys of spiritual communion and touch them with the tenderness of worship and the awe of reverence. To this end we gladly add to-day to the list of our editorial contributors the names of James G. Townsend, D. D., and Solon Lauer, of Jamestown, N. Y.; and Rev. A. J. Rich, of Fall River, Mass. Doctor Townsend is already well known. Mr. Lauer, who was the managing editor of the Herald, is a young man with an enthusiasm for journalism, and has consecrated his entire energies to the work which the press can do for the cause of a religion that makes character the supreme end, and will give special attention to the note and news department of UNITY. How much of his time and energy can be given to this paper is to be determined by our resources. Mr. Rich, whose words are very familiar to our readers, is the corresponding secretary of the National Bureau of Unity Clubs. He will use as much of our space as we can afford to give him to the development of this important interest. More of this anon. With a welcome to our new brothers and sisters, we introduce them to our old readers by letting them speak for themselves, as follows:

TRANSMIGRATION AND RE-INCARNATION.

Last fall the New Theology Herald was born into the great world of religious journalism. Its mission, as stated in the initial number, was to advocate a broad and reasonable theology and to make religion beautiful and loveable. For ten months it has gone forth regularly on this mission—how successfully its readers must judge—and it has made its way into twenty-five states and into Canada, receiving many words of earnest commendation. It has been the organ of the Lakeside School of the New Theology, and in every way has labored to build up an institution of the largest usefulness.

The L. S. N. T. was organized on a broad basis. Its mission was not theological alone, but efforts have been made to bring together upon its platform various phases of thought and work looking to the elevation and salvation of the people.

There has recently come to the school an accretion of power which promises to give it a decided impetus. On Wednesday, Aug. 10, Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, of Chicago, representing the National Bureau of Unity Clubs, of which Edward Everett Hale is president, gave a lecture, and explained the purpose and plan of the Unity Club. These clubs are for study and general culture, and take up lines of practical reform and charitable work. It is of western origin, and has been organized thus far chiefly in churches of the Unitarian denomination—of which denomination Edward Everett Hale is a clergyman. Efforts have been begun, however, to organize these clubs in Universalist and Independent churches generally, and as the clubs, while broad in their theological policy, are not sectarian, they will doubtless very soon be found in most churches that sympathize with a progressive theology.

The official organ of the National Bureau of Unity Clubs is UNITY, a weekly paper published in Chicago, edited by Rev. J. Lloyd Jones and a number of associates. This paper finds its chief support among Unitarians, but is not a sectarian paper. It represents the advanced phases of religious thought, and is supported by many who do not belong to the Unitarian church.

To unite the L. S. N. T. with these Unity clubs, and make it, if possible, the great Chautauqua of the progressive churches—a center for the growing thought of our times, in theology, science, and social reforms, the Herald has been combined with UNITY, and its editors placed upon the editorial staff of that paper. In this marriage of the two papers, the Herald will be the bride, and adopt the name of the stronger party to the contract. The result of the alliance will be UNITY, in name, and we trust, in aim and spirit.

The editors of the Herald will contribute regularly to the columns of UNITY, and about once a month a full sermon by Doctor Townsend will be published.

This union of forces compels no surrender on either side. The individuality of all concerned is preserved intact. The editors of the Herald will stand for the New Theology as before, and serve in every possible way the interests of the L. S. N. T. The body of the Herald dies but its soul goes into another form. It is a case of journalistic re-incarnation. As to whether the seven spirits with whom we have joined forces are more wicked than ourselves, opinions may differ.

And so we bid our readers a short farewell, while we are changing our base of operations. We drop the curtain to shift the scenery. We will set the stage with "Chicago" instead of "Jamestown," and when the curtain rises will resume our respective parts, with additional "support," and much better stage furniture. We make our bow and ring down the curtain. When it rises again, we hope to find all the audience in their seats.—From New Theology Herald for August.

A GREETING AND A HAND SHAKE.

With this issue of UNITY three names are added to the editorial staff. One of these names is that of "a youth to fortune and to fame unknown."

Doubtless the senior editor of UNITY will speak of the recently consummated arrangement whereby the New Theology Herald joins forces with its elder brother in a common cause. While there are several minor reasons for this fusion of interests, the strongest reason on my own part—and the reason without which all other reasons would be vain and meaningless—is a deep and earnest sympathy with the work which UNITY has so long and so bravely carried on.

Brought into being as the exponent of a local cause, but with aspirations and sympathies expanding to the horizon line of universality, the New Theology Herald last fall began its work. This work it has carried on for ten months, as successfully as the limited resources, intellectual and financial, of its editors would permit. It has carried its message of a broader faith and a larger hope into more than twenty-five States and Canada, and has met everywhere with words of sympathy and encouragement. But its aspirations have outgrown the possibilities of its physical environment. The ripple of its influence, expanding from its geographical center, touched the expansive wave-circle of another influence, whose motive lay at Chicago. The two waves have been united. Henceforth, in common rhythm, they will issue from one center, and proceed in one undulation. May this expand more and more, until the wave-circle, impelled by earnest and united effort, shall reach and kiss the sands upon the farther shores of thought.

To the editors and readers of UNITY I extend the hand of cordial greeting. May it be grasped in the spirit of the broadest fellowship, so that men may say: "How good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in UNITY." Heretofore our aims and ideals have been identical. Hereafter our lot and interests shall be common.

In thus joining hands with UNITY I maintain individual FREEDOM, acquire a sympathetic FELLOWSHIP, and with my older and wiser brothers will labor for CHARACTER IN RELIGION with all that it implies.

Fraternally and heartily yours,

SOLON LAUER.

TO MY FRIENDS.

I want to say to my friends who read the Herald that they will not lose but gain by the alliance with UNITY. My sermons will be published often in that paper, and I will write for its columns as I did for the Herald. I believe UNITY to be a safe and helpful paper to put in the hands of my friends. It is so completely undenominational, so truly Christian in spirit that I am sure it will gain and hold the sympathy of my friends as it has my own. It will I think prove a real teacher and inspirer to them, as it has been and is to me.

UNITY will come weekly instead of monthly, and will not only contain the best words of myself and Mr. Lauer, but the best words of some of the wisest and best men in the world of spiritual thought.

My relation to UNITY will relieve me of many cares and responsibilities which came upon me in my work with the Herald. I will have more time for my pastoral work among my people.

UNITY is well established and we are relieved from any responsibilities of a financial nature. The paper has been established ten years, and has taken into itself at various times the strength of other publications, among which were the University, and the Alliance, of which latter Prof. Swing, of Chicago, was editor.

So UNITY, representing various elements of thought, will now represent also the work which the Herald inaugurated and carried on. I hope my friends will extend the hand of cordial welcome to the noble men whose words will now come to them weekly, in company with my own.—J. G. T.—From the New Theology Herald for August.

GREETING: TO UNITY READERS.

It may, perhaps, be well that in assuming editorial connection with UNITY I should make a personal statement.

I was cradled in the bosom of a strong Methodist influence—Pittsburg Methodism. My father and mother, my maternal and paternal grandparents, were devoted Methodists. My grandfather's and my father's home ever gave a warm welcome to the Methodist itinerant, and there the most honored preachers of American Methodism were frequent guests. From my earliest recollection the names of Wesley, Coke, Asbury, and many others were household words. I went to the love-feast when so small I would whisper to my mother and ask why they passed around the bread and water. Methodism was to me the ideal church. The saints of the church were my heroes. I read their lives with the tears streaming down my cheeks.

It was natural that, reared in these influences, I should become a Methodist preacher; and to the work of the preacher I gave myself with ardent and full consecration. When the bishop's hands were placed in ordination upon my head, I felt the warmth of them to the very depths of my soul. I brought no undivided heart to the work to which I gave myself. Every seed I had, of promise and of hope, I cast into the furrows of the church.

And in every church over which I became pastor, I found a few of my ideal saints, those who taught me the way to God, the deep meaning of a spiritual life. They fed my manhood, they inspired my prayers. Touched by the mystic influence of the Infinite, I knew that their souls had found the experience of the divine fellowship. If these were in the Catholic church I am sure they would be accounted worthy of canonization. I never can forget what I owe personally to them.

But I found, after a few years, that their saintly souls did not represent the tendency of the church. The worldly was the dominant spirit. I knew personally a number of the men who had their hands on the whole Methodist church. I met them in private, heard them discuss their plans. I felt their spirit. These men were not immoral or dishonest, but the most of them were thoroughly worldly, and loved the church for what it could do for them, and not for what they could do for her. As far as I could see in general and annual conference, they used the same methods, and were possessed of the same spirit, that the political bosses had in the political parties. I saw the church was growing strong in members and wealth, drifting toward ecclesiasticism rather than Christianity. Methodism was fast becoming the Catholicism of the Protestant church. I began to lose faith in her future. My revolt against the church was at first not intellectual, but moral.

I began some ten or twelve years ago to dimly see that the inflexible orthodoxy demanded by the leaders of the church did not satisfy thoughtful men and women. I saw that the explanation of sin, that is, total depravity; the explanation of punishment, eternal hell; the explanation of the atonement, the sword of an angry God quenched in the blood of His Son, no longer satisfied the intellectual demands of our nature. It did not seem to me that the great truths of religion, those cathedral truths which have housed the devotions of the ages, would pass away; but I did see that they must have a re-statement, must be put in new and nobler form. I saw a New Theology, the moral basis of which was the Sermon on the Mount.

Coming finally to both an intellectual and a moral revolt against the church of my childhood and of my manhood, I two years ago withdrew therefrom. Perhaps I lingered longer than I should have done, but the pressure to keep me was great, and then it is not easy to break the strands of association and of friendship. I was pastor of the Asbury church of Buffalo when I withdrew from the ministry and membership of the Methodist Episcopal church.

I came to Jamestown, N. Y., with this idea: It is possible to build a Christian church which shall have the devotion and fire of the early Methodists, with a New Theology, that is, a full intellectual freedom. I did not believe that energy of spiritual life must be associated with narrowness of thought. To me the ground of salvation was belief in the Lord Jesus Christ, that is, when rightly interpreted, the possession of the same mind with him. The Christ-like character saves.

These ideas I began to preach in the opera house in Jamestown in the fall of 1885. The enthusiasm was unparalleled in this part of the state. For months the opera house was crowded. Men unaccustomed to go to church became, with their families, constant attendants. There was a genuine revival of religion. Men were lifted to a nobler life and truer thought. One result of these services was the formation of a vigorous church and society, of which I am now pastor. We have our own church property, hold two services and a Sunday-school each Sabbath. There is no more earnest or influential congregation in the city. Ever since I came here my sermons have been published and widely circulated. A number of churches similar to the one in Jamestown have been organized, and the interest in the work seems not to abate.

Another result of the movement was the formation of the Lakeside School of New Theology, located on Chautauqua lake, with the progress of which the readers of UNITY are well acquainted.

But the feeling has been growing upon me, that I must join myself with other workers in the same field. Three months ago it would not have been possible to me to have formed an alliance with UNITY, but my prejudices have all melted away; I recognize the intellectual and spiritual genius of its editors; and see that UNITY stands as perhaps no other paper, for non-dogmatic and non-sectarian religion. In coming to UNITY I surrender nothing of my individuality or cherished life-purposes. I believe that the divinest thing one man can do for another is to bring him to God and to himself, to a brave, true, and happy life. For this purpose I give my hand to UNITY and UNITY's friends.

JAMES G. TOWNSEND.

Editorial Wanderings.

On the 23d of July the senior editor released an obstreperous ankle from a plaster cast, threw away his crutches and began his vacation. On Sunday, the 24th, he refreshed himself by preaching to the hopeful little band at Hinsdale, which, notwithstanding the hot weather, was alert and devoutly in earnest. In the afternoon of the same day he started for the orient; went by the way of Canada. One long and lovely day in "foreign parts," a night plunge through the Green Mountain country, and early Tuesday morning he was at Weirs, almost the first on hand, but later trains soon brought others, and the week's work began with the Unity Club day. The story of this week has been already told in these columns and need not be repeated.

The editor expected to fulfill an engagement, discharge a duty in a couple of days, and then flee for rest and retirement; but these two days changed the dread of a crowd into the strength of fellowship, duty was transformed to a privilege, an obligation melted into an opportunity, so the two days became a week, which ended in a great night on Mt. Washington.

The sun in its coming and going behaved pretty well on the mountain top, but the moon did gloriously. The subtle shadows, the mystic sense of remoteness and lightness that comes with the night on a mountain top, relaxes the human soul and makes it strangely communicative and familiar in the presence of kindred souls, as the experience of that Unitarian party of sixteen on Mt. Washington proved.

A high judicial dignitary from Maine and the Unitarian missionary from the west were ameliorated, and they unreeled themselves into stories that reached into midnight. The next day the editor was in a hurry for Boston, but must take one last look at Lake Winnepesaukee; that look unwittingly prolonged itself into another week; the strength that came the week before from human nature came this week from nature. "The smile of the Great Spirit" was palpable upon the face of the waters that week; around it, over it and in it the editor found life. The beauty and joy was fringed with many memorable touches of human nature, words of kindness and looks of cheer that will abide with him through the fatigues of many a working day. It was the Universalists' week at the lake. The editor found them an earnest, truth-seeking people, with a laity, and, in the main, a clergy that was hospitable to the latest thought; expectant of greater and broader things. Here the editor met for the first time the Philadelphia oriental, Mangasarian, and found him the shy, sensitive soul that has traveled all the way from the banks of the Euphrates, where he was born, to the highlands of the Unity faith in America. To know him is to love him. And what was the gain of the editor in his acquaintance will in due time we trust prove a gain to the readers of UNITY also.

Just a day for Boston, if that city of crooked streets can be called Boston when most of the Unitarians are away. But there was enough of it left for a cordial grip of the strong hand of publisher Ellis, through whose business sagacity the Register has become such a missionary of the growing faith, and to find Mr. Batchelor looking so much better than in the sad, sick Chicago days, carrying the brevet honors of editorship, while Shayback was away canning smiles for winter use under canvas on Lake Memphremagog, and indulging his carnal tastes in a flaming red necktie, his one worldly dissipation in all the year.

UNITY's representative was next to be heard from at the New Theology School at Chautauqua. In the crowd that sought the boats at the Jamestown wharf it was cheering to him to be called back to his identity with the "Come in this boat, Mr. Jones," of one of his faithful Sunday-school boys. The charms of Chautauqua lake were put to a severe test by coming after the high witchery of Winnepesaukee. They ought to be taken the other way, but even in this order it was delightful. Of this meeting our readers have already heard, and are to hear more. Dr. Townsend is a man who has planted his roots deep in that soil. His sincerity, gentleness, warmth of heart and ability of head have made themselves felt where he is, and through the help of UNITY will endear him to a much wider circle.

Three days at Meadville, two long days in camp on the banks of the beautiful Venango. Three days in Chicago, en route, if indeed it was Chicago with the UNITY team all away except the faithful "C. H. K.," who was conscripted into editorial responsibilities that the editors might play. August 21 to 29 the editor touched that spot without reaching which a vacation is scarcely possible, the spot that thrills with memories tender and tearful, that quickens with loving ties and holy expectations, the spot where his first sermon was preached so long ago that the thought of it suggests a patriarchal feeling.

The awful drought of the summer had been broken with plenteous rains, ravaging rains, that carried away bridges and mill dams. Helena valley, on that account, was beautiful with the tender green of May. Three times did the editor preach in the little chapel—prettier than it was in its first newness of a year ago. It stands there to challenge with confident emphasis the claim of Brother Powell in the last Register, that "The Topeka church is the most perfect of the elegant utilities of the west—for its cost." It certainly is one of the two most perfect—for its cost!

The drought makes it a very hard year for the farmers, particularly for the dairy farmers, as these Helena farmers are; for the total failure of the hay crop will necessitate the disposal of fine herds, which it has taken years of breeding to produce, for a very doleful song; but still things are hopeful in the valley. The dear old homestead has been moved aside to make room for the large new building, which is to be the Hillside Home School, and for the first time for twenty years the two school-teaching sisters do not go out of the valley with the preacher at the close of the summer vacation, but they remain to give the benefit of their experience to the development of the boys and girls of the neighborhood, to the making of an economic, energetic home school for the city boys and girls who may be fortunate enough to have parents or guardians who appreciate the value for a time of country surroundings, personal attention and practical activities in the education of the child. These sisters, with their associate teachers, will remain to make more vital the Sunday uses of the little chapel. Regular preaching services will be conducted every Sunday morning; sometimes it will be the reading of a printed sermon, sometimes it will be the home-made thought of different members of the congregation, more times it will probably be the manuscript sermon of the non-resident pastor, which, after it has done duty in the pulpit of All Souls church, Chicago, will be passed along through the post-office for another hearing. This is a big undertaking for the valley. The school building and equipments demand not only the accumulated capital but the accumulated courage of many years. Many things are needed. The little chapel has yet no musical instrument, and every Sunday some farm-house sends its organ with the family to church. The library, both of the church and the school, needs books of reading and books of reference, and if those who might only knew the opportunity, some helps in this direction would be forthcoming. But without help the necessities will be reached in due time, and the Hillside Home School is yet to be a modest but important factor in the success of some things in which UNITY readers have much interest.

And now the editor is at home. Tuesday morning, August 30th, he mounts the tripod, and hopes to be on duty until about the first of July, 1888. During his vacation of six weeks he preached and lectured seven times, made four speeches, been on top of a mountain, rowed on two lakes and a river, never tried to hook or shoot anything, attended three grove meetings, and had a good time all the way through. Now for work!

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

Patience.

Upon the earliest shore
The earliest life is found—
That nearer touch of the Divine—
What silence breathes around!

A small and simple form,
Yet the first miracle
Of life, life that in ages hence
To subtlest phase would thrill.

What ages! then the man,
Through that low form to rise,
Gifted by Thought and Love to speak
The mystery of the skies.

He only of all life
Back to reflect the source,
To utter from the heart the thanks
Of a dumb universe.

His purposes so long
Waited that patient Power;
What thou would'st fain become, O soul,
Wait thy one little hour!

Closing Week of the Lakeside School of New Theology.

The closing week of the L. S. N. T. was one of great interest. We had lectures and sermons by Dr. Thomas Hill, Dr. E. L. Rexford, John R. Clarke, Theodore W. Haven, Ph. D., F. N. Thorpe, Ph. D., Rev. A. N. Somers, Dr. A. A. Miner and Doctor Townsend. Doctor Rexford was one of the most popular of the ministers. He is well known in this section, as he was born and raised in Chautauqua county. Prof. J. B. Roberts, of Philadelphia, added very much to the interest of the meetings. With the assistance of others he gave us readings from the "Merchant of Venice" on Tuesday evening, taking the part of Shylock with remarkable power. He gave us many highly interesting readings, presenting us Friday with an hour's reading from Hamlet. It is understood that next year Professor Roberts will conduct a school of elocution in connection with the L. S. N. T. Dr. F. N. Thorpe gave three lectures on the labor question, presenting many facts and figures. Doctor Haven, son of Bishop Haven, of the Methodist Episcopal church, gave a thoughtful sermon Tuesday on "Morals and Religion."

Doctor Townsend addressed the people several times. He gave us a lecture Wednesday on "The New Theology," which was eloquent, spiritual and elevating. He gave on Thursday a lecture entitled "Utopia," which was a dream of an ideal social state. It was full of lofty ideals, gems of wisdom, poetry and pathos, and showed that the doctor is a thinker in other fields than theology.

Friends of the L. S. N. T. feel highly encouraged at its fine prospects. While the attendance was not as large as could be wished, it was as large as might reasonably be expected for the second season of the institution. The amphitheater was comfortably well filled at the concerts and special lectures, while those who attended the theological lectures showed a deep interest and earnestness. The association is now on a solid and permanent basis. It owns a fine piece of ground fronting on the lake, and a substantial and spacious amphitheater. The property is valued at $5000, and stock has been sold sufficient to meet all indebtedness. The gate receipts covered the running expenses of the present season.

The outlook for the school is most promising. Friends and helpers are daily rising up, and large lines of work are being laid out for the coming year. The institution promises to become the great Chautauqua of the liberal churches.

REMUS POINT, August 22.

THE STUDY TABLE.

Selected Gems and Modern Themes for Church or Parlor Organ. Edited by James C. Macy. Published by Oliver Ditson & Co., Boston, Mass. 112 pp. Price

This is an excellent collection of short voluntaries, preludes, postludes, and hymn tunes, so arranged that the least possible turning of leaves is required to complete a selection. Marches, wedding, festival and requiem music are also included. The selections are from the music of the first composers, but so adapted in simplicity of rendering as to be quite within the command of any average player. A particularly satisfactory book for young church societies using a cabinet organ.

THE UNITY CLUB.

The National Bureau of Unity Clubs.

NAME.

The name of the unit, Unity Club, has its justification in the fact that the majority of literary clubs in our denomination are called Unity Clubs, and all, or nearly all, might fittingly take that name, since it implies unity of purpose and work, unity of spirit and of action, and a close alliance with every interest of the church and its work. The aggregation of units, Unity Clubs, gives us our Bureau, all for each and each for all. As the housekeeper has a place for her bureau, and her bureau full of drawers for the holding of various things, in daily use, for convenience, so the Bureau of Unity Clubs has, or is supposed to have, and shortly will have, its drawers and pigeon holes full of helps for the individual clubs about to organize or to start a season's work, or plan for pleasure. At present the Bureau has one plan at Chicago and another at Boston Unitarian headquarters, where the Bureau is kept.

SCOPE.

The scope is broad both as to territory and to the variety of clubs eligible to membership in the Bureau. It would be more convenient to call them all by one name, and that chosen for the national organization, Unity Club, but unity may as properly mean the binding together of differently named, as differently constituted clubs. The work done by the clubs is about the same, whether they have one name or another. And the advantages of having it national is that the benefits and helps to be found in one become the property of all. Some one prepares—is preparing a plan of study in art for eight months, with references to the best books to read, and the finest available pictures or prints to be seen. It will be printed and had for sale in Chicago and Boston. Twenty clubs may have been in doubt as to the best way to study art; here is a little pamphlet which tells all about it, and can set the club to work at once. Any club in the entire country can get this help. No matter what the topic or the course of study decided upon or thought of, suggestions can be had at the bureau headquarters. There is an advantage in uniformity of topic in the fact that lecturers can be had at greatly reduced cost where many engagements can be made. A literary or dramatic entertainment may be given by the club getting it up in half a dozen cities or towns near by. If history or astronomy is the subject chosen for study, mutual advantages come or may come by correspondence as to method and work.

WORK.

Shall it be work or play, study or amusement? That depends upon the material out of which the club is made. Some clubs have their "eating crowd" and their "literary crowd." One wants to exercise the brain, another, for the most part, the feet. There are the dramatical and the musical elements. All these obtain in one and the same club. The bureau says, decide those matters among yourselves, and when you are ready for work or play—for dramatic or musicale, call upon us, and we will give you points; we will help you to the best thing there is to be had in the line pursued. True, what would be best for one club might be the worst thing for another. For instance, I know of a club which is already organized for the study of the Iliad, and for Sunday evenings, too, and not so unsuitable for Sunday evenings as might be supposed, since the central idea is religious; but that club has a leader who is an expert in that line of study. But this is true, that every club should attempt something a little harder than an easy mood might suggest; and to know what others are doing of an enterprising character has a tendency to lift club study a peg higher. A club that tends to amusement would do well to do something literary, while one settled down to some abstruse subject, as philology or philosophy, would do well to bring in the element of amusement, or to organize with the intent of giving, say, every fourth meeting to pleasure. And whether it shall be one thing or the other, it must mean culture, help in some way to training the mind, the taste, the manhood or the womanhood qualities into finer fiber. The club must work for its own individual culture, for the benefit of the church, with which it should always feel itself to be a branch and a feeder, for general culture and charity, and to give tone and turn to thought among young people, setting them upon an upward way in finding out what they are good for, and ought to be doing for themselves and the world.

READING.

The one thing all clubs can do is to select a course of reading, and to meet weekly for an evening to read and be read to, as, for example, the works of George Eliot, Doctor Holmes, or the history of Spain, or of the United States. To this could be added the asking and the answering of questions; or the reading might be done at home, and the meeting in the club to compare views and discuss ideas growing out of the reading. Short essays might follow, read by one or two previously appointed for the work. In this way interest might easily be begotten. The course of reading might be wholly religious, or denominational, or for the study of the different religions, or creeds, or sects. The evening might be spent in reading and discussing the Bible, a sort of conference meeting, and partly for the purpose of religious culture, and spiritual quickening. I have been giving no fancy or impossible pictures, but what has actually been done in different clubs and churches of which I know and am hearing of every day.

FEASIBILITY.

There is a backwardness with some pastors about undertaking anything out of the ordinary course of church work and church life. A pastor said to me not long since: "My church is very old, and its ways are all settled, and they are very shy of innovations. I don't believe we can do anything in the Unity club line. It would seem to be an intrusion, a secularizing the church, or a turning it into a playhouse." But really, that is the very church where combined tact, wisdom and perseverance in the pastor, could accomplish much, and be the thing to give new life and nobler purpose to its activities. The feasibility of organizing a club in a church will be made clear the moment a serious, earnest attempt is made in that direction. I know of a little church which, at my suggestion, started a "Unitarian Club," since Unity Club seemed so hightoned, and it has been a grand success. Another club has a reading circle, with "Clarke's Book on Prayer," and a discussion of points all along while the chapters are being read. In one case a lady got some boys together and started a club, which proved to be a solid affair in the end. A whole church is benefited by one little literary ripple among the young people. Since there is such a dearth of ideas, and a deluge of nonsense among the average of young people, where nothing literary enters into their lives, it ought to be the aim of the church to have a way of interesting and occupying the thought of such people; and when they leave school to help them still to keep up habits of study and of select reading. Why will not our pastors, why will not our laymen and laywomen of literary tastes, and interest in young people and the church, take up this matter of literary or social culture, or both, and supplement pulpit, Sunday, and day school, with that which shall be a constant source of culture? And if they have such a club, would it not be well to come into the Bureau, and see what can be done to enlarge and elevate the work, and make the club a nobler evangelist of good? It is feasible. Let it be a fact! Then it will mean

EDUCATION.

Religion tends more and more to education, and the church is more and more a school for culture. The modern church is becoming a sort of religious university. Its aim is to give knowledge, to develop the entire life, to train all the faculties, to seek wholeness, and so holiness, salvation. People more and more go to church, when they go at all, to learn something, to be instructed in things worth knowing, to get glimpses of science, to have thought quickened by thought. The time is coming when preaching will be the impartation of knowledge which applies to life, and the stimulus to set people thinking and studying for themselves. Guesses must have the go-by, and the supernatural and the miraculous must give place to what may be known of nature, and of life, and of duty. And that church is the wisest which aims at culture in the people of the congregation and of the community. We want to know and to teach something about this great and wonderful world where we dwell, and so about the Infinite in and through all, and in and by this knowledge enter into the true kingdom of light and love. This is why we need the Unity Club and study classes in every church, and in every community.

THE HOME.

In Quiet Places.

It is Sunday morning. From the church towers, a mile away, comes the sound of church bells, and yonder, climbing the hill, I see our faithful deacon and his family on their way thither. No, we shall not go this morning. We miss the liberal thoughts of the religion to which we are accustomed, and believe that nature speaks best for us to-day. It is as cool as September. There has been very little uncomfortable weather here this season, while the fields in the west have been parched and suffering for want of rain. We have gladly welcomed every fair, warm day. No nights without a cool breeze. Since May 15, rain has fallen thirty-six days. Crops are suffering. Trees and foliage of every description are looking fresh and green as in the springtime. Every little wood stream is full to overflowing, and comes rushing down the hillsides, over moss-grown rocks, like a frolicsome child. The woods are full of beauty. Hemlock trees droop low over cool, mossy spots, and the ferns seem to dip their delicate heads in friendly converse. It seems wicked to step foot into their midst; they are so like a heavenly breath.

I carry a large book in our carriage, that I may be prepared to glean roadside treasures, for making glad the hearts of western friends and beautifying some nook in their far away homes.

All about this homestead door grow the tansy, spearmint, caraway seed and southernwort. Buttercups and daisies have faded; everlasting, goldenrod and purple asters have taken their place, each beautiful in its season. The fall cricket chirps dimly in the lowland.

We have often spoken of our Chicago friends, when the daily papers announced the intense heat, and wished they might rest in this quiet spot, where the air is so fresh and pure, right from noble Kearsarge mountain, only seventeen miles away. Through the window of our "spare bedroom," in the northeast corner, comes the early morning song of the robins. Doesn't that suggest rest?

Canary "Clover" hangs in a bower of morning-glories and hops outside the south porch. Being a Chicago bird he eats his fresh plantain and chickweed seed, and picks at the wealth of blossoms about him in wonder.

There is much to be gained by a life among many, but a mellow New Hampshire sunset can be enjoyed at one's own broad doorstep, and leave us better than it found us.

Youthful Old Age.

An aged and good lady mourned recently that she should recover from a long sickness. "So near home," she said; "and then I had to turn back. But I shall go to my God shortly, nevertheless." I know of another aged person who had no fear of death, who lived a tranquil, busy life on to her ninety-third year. She never conversed on the subject of death. She never was weary of this life. If friends were anxious, she put them aside. "It is well to live; it is well to die." This was her creed. She lived it so completely, it gave her no concern. She was not "going home." She was never absent from home. She did not long to "go" to her God. She imagined nothing more of him than she met with here and every day. She dreamed of no heavenly place beyond. She sat peaceably in her high-backed chair at night, when her little duties of the day were done, and heaven was there. Others were busy with their prayer-books and their church-going, and fain would associate her in their devotions. But how to introduce their errand. It was a puzzle. They were baffled. She was more than their books, than their clergyman and his church. She was a fountain of love and light. She tainted no atmosphere: she purified it wherever she moved. A short time before her death, she walked on her cane out on the bright hill-side near the house, and filled her checked apron with ripe apples, knocking them off with a stick. She carried them in, happy as a child. "What a good tree it is." These words were the text of her whole life. She loved a clean kitchen, and delighted to make good bread. She rejoiced when the cherries were ripe; she could eat them with the same relish as when a girl. She was proud of the colts and the calves. She yearly tended a brood of chickens. She hunted the hen's-eggs, mousing through the hay. What more she did need not be added. This is enough to show the peaceful flow of her life. Her conversation was not of the books, nor made up of quotations from the Bible. It was the natural utterance of a simple, pure mind. Did she lack wisdom? For the sphere in which she moved, none need be more wise. Did she fail as an example? Then was her failure a rich blessing. Would that we all might fail thus forever! Did she go to heaven? She went with heaven. Heaven went with her. I know no more.—Selected.

Woman and Artist.

I thought to win me a name
Should ring in the ear of the world!—
How can I work with small pink fists
About my fingers curled?

Then adieu to name and fame!
They scarce are worth at the best
One touch of this wet little, warm little mouth,
With its lips against my breast.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Princeton, Ill.—Rev. H. C. McDougall, of Rockland, Mass., preached before the Unitarian society of this place last Sunday.

Egypt.—The Mohammedan college at Cairo has 5000 students, and the course of study covers eight years.

Prosperous Jews.—An English exchange says that the average income of the London Jews is two and a half times greater than that of the Gentiles. They average $410 per head, per annum for 47,000. If thrift is an element of piety, these people have at least started towards the kingdom.

The Chinese in New York city are building a joss house at a cost of $16,500. We commend these devotees to the foreign missionary societies that have a passion to save the souls of the Chinese. When they have saved the New York heathen then let them go abroad.

Demoralizing Christians.—Under native rule Upper Burmah, in India, has been kept free from the ravages of alcohol and opium, but now under British rule, a general "licensing system is being discussed and perfected." Yet they were pagan and these are Christian!

Little Boston Boy—(who, with his mamma, is visiting New York): "Oh, mamma, what a little silver of a moon they have here. Why, in Boston it's a great big round moon!"

Mamma (complacently): "Yes, Waldo; but you must remember that New York is a very different place from Boston."—Exchange.
It is possible to have too much moonshine.

Kristofer Janson's Paper.—A correspondent of the Woman's Journal, speaking of this new paper, has the following allusion to Mr. Janson's accomplished helpmeet: "Mrs. Drude Krog Janson, his wife, has also written a good deal concerning woman's rights and temperance. She is now in Norway visiting relations and friends. Her cousin, Miss Gina Krog, is the editor of the Norwegian Ladies' Review, published in Christiania, Norway, since last January, which paper also has done very well.

Hydrophobia.—The remedy for this fearful malady suggested by Pasteur, the French chemist, is still a disputed one. It is at least beyond the reach of man at the present time. But Doctor Buisson, a French physician, suggested a remedy quite within the reach of all. It is simply the prompt use of the Turkish or vapor baths. The doctor cured himself by seven baths in seven days, exposing himself to a heat of from 126 to 140 degrees Fahrenheit. A recent number of The Lancet gives high medical indorsement to this treatment from London physicians.

"See Ourselves as Others See Us."—A correspondent of the Indian Mirror, published at Calcutta, thus writes of his impression of our Saratoga. "Money is spent lavishly by the rich fools who resort to this place. One man's hotel bill for a month footed fifteen thousand rupees, and another was known to expend ten thousand rupees a week. Thus tens of thousands isolate themselves from a sorrowing, sinning and suffering world, and squander money, time, talents and opportunities as thoughtlessly as if no parable of Dives and Lazarus had ever been uttered."

Frankness at the Altar.—An English vicar, describing the marriage customs in the Yorkshire country, as quoted by the Unitarian Herald, says, "When they come to that important part of the marriage service where the minister asks the man if he will have this woman to be his wedded wife, the man will not infrequently turn to the woman and say, 'Will tho' black m' boots?' and the woman will invariably say 'I will;' and the man then rejoins 'Now, tha'st said it' and he holds her to her word.

Let neither the American men nor women who laugh at this be too complacent. Husbands in this country often exercise an authority not less brutal than this and; there are things which wives in polite society do for their husbands more servile and grinding than blacking boots.

Boston Notes.—Church and school house repairs are mostly finished. Vacation schools are over, after proving their great value, parish sextons are busy renovating and dusting pew cushions and pulpit trimmings. The last children are gone on the "country week." Our store sidewalks down town are covered with outgoing merchandise. One more union Sunday meeting will be held, and then gradually all our pulpits will again assert themselves. Some new clerical and lay work is already getting planned for next winter. Some new temperance tracts and other pamphlets are already upon the table of the A. U. A. Our minister for Japan, Rev. Arthur M. Knapp, is studiously, but quietly, searching shelves of libraries and book stores for new information about his intended home, and is trying to grasp a little of the vernacular. His familiarity with European capitals and our Pacific shores, as well as his long experience as preacher and pastor in New England, will help him adapt his thoughts to the peculiar ways of Japanese civilization and acute religious inquiry. He will leave Boston in November.

England.—That was a great thing to say of any one that the chairman said at a recent reception given to Rev. W. Burns on his retirement from the pulpit of the Unitarian church of Charing Cross, at Birkenhead: "For nearly thirty years our friend Mr. Burns has been the intellectual leaven of Birkenhead." A Unitarian minister must be much else, but an intellectual leaven he must be if he is a true Unitarian minister. Mr. Burns is to take charge of the Unitarian church at Plymouth, England.

"The Hibbert Trust" is the name of a fund which in London secures an annual course of scholarly lectures bearing upon the history, growth and character of religion. From an abstract of the last biennial report of its trustees we infer that it has one student at work from its scholarship in Harvard College, America, two at the University of Jena, in Germany, and three at the Manchester New College, London. Last year its course of lectures was by Prof. Rhys, of Oxford, on "The Religion and Mythology of the Celtic Nations," soon to be published. This year it was by Prof. Soyce, of Cambridge, on "The Babylonian Religion," soon to be published. Next year it is to be on the "Greek Influence upon Christianity," by Rev. E. E. Hatch, D. D., of Oxford.

The next biennial meeting of the Ministers' Institute will be held at Princeton, Mass., Sept. 27th, 28th and 29th. The sermon will be given by Rev. Francis Tiffany. The essayists and subjects will be as follows: Rev. T. R. Slicer, "The Study of Church History for Its Own Sake." Rev. J. H. Allen, "The Effect of Canon Law upon Christian Civilization." Rev. E. H. Hall, "How Far Can Our Liberal Theology be Drawn from the New Testament." Prof. J. H. Thayer, "What Documents are in Evidence as to the Earliest Christian Faith?" Rev. J. C. Learned, "Capitalism and Communism." Prof. D. G. Lyon, "The Bearing of Assyriology upon the Old Testament." Prof. C. C. Everett, "The Ultimate Facts in Ethics." Rev. C. F. Dole, "An Experiment in Ethics."

The sessions will be held in the new town hall. The hotels offer reduced rates ($1.50 per day) and the railroads also promise lower fares.

Those who attended the meeting at Princeton six years ago will recall the delightful air and views, and the comfortable hotels. An unusually large meeting is hoped for. Further details will be given later. W. H. LYON, Sec.

Books Slightly Damaged and Greatly Reduced in Price.

We still have on hand about 60 copies of James H. West's "UPLIFTS OF HEART AND WILL," equal to the regular 50 cent edition in every respect, except as to the press work, which is defective, but not so bad as to make the book difficult to read. These copies we will mail singly for 25 cents, or will sell to any church wishing to introduce the "Uplifts" as a service book for 20 cents. The regular edition of this book we will sell to any church in quantities of not less than 50 at $30 per hundred.

We have on hand a few copies of Francis Tiffany's "Bird-Bolts," slightly shelf worn as to the cover, but otherwise in perfect condition. The book is a collection of short bright essays, most of them first printed in the Boston Herald. A few titles taken at random are "How to Kindle Fires," "Vicious Virtues," "Routing Inertia," "Enlarging one's Horizon," "The Ugliness of the Individual." The publisher's price for the book is 75 cents. We offer for sale the copies now on hand at 50 cents each, post-paid.

Charles T. Brooks's "WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING; A CENTENNIAL MEMORY," is a work of permanent historical value. It contains 259 pages, with nine full page illustrations, and is published at $1.50. We have on hand a very few copies, slightly shelf worn but in almost perfect condition, which we offer at 75 cents, post-paid. When these are sold no others can be had at less than the regular price.

Sir John Bowring's religious poems, with a memoir, make up a handsomely printed gilt edged volume of 256 pages. It is published in England and is not regularly on the American market. We have lately come into the possession of a few copies, which we offer at 60 cents each, post-paid. We can not supply the book after these copies are closed out.

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XX.]

CHICAGO, SEPTEMBER 10, 1887.

EDITORIAL.

Good Housekeeping among its family recipes gives the following: "It is a well established truth that an ounce of keep your mouth shut is better than a pound of explanation after you have said it."

E. P. POWELL closes his essay on immortality, recently written for the Christian Register, with the following suggestive sentence: He that lives with God, in God, lives as God lives.

FOUR and a half per cent. of the population of Hungary is Jewish, but thirty-three per cent. of the students of the University of Pesth, the leading Hungarian school, is Jewish. It is hard to exterminate brains even with religious bigotry.

THE Liquor Dealer's Association at their recent annual meeting resolved that they would work for a "readjustment of the laws, so that the poor man can get his spirituous liquors just as the rich man gets his at his hotel." We suspect that they did not discuss the question as to how much they would do in creating the patrons that would support these philanthropic places for the poor.

DOCTOR THOMAS in his first sermon after vacation told his people that the "religious thought of the present time was slowly but surely gravitating towards the old Greek theology which taught the immanency of God and that there was a tie between man and his Creator. His remarks also included an exposition of the Latin theology, which taught that God was to be localized, that man was a fallen and depraved creature, and that there was no tie between him and his Creator."

THE Northwestern Christian Advocate for the 31st ult. bristles with protests against the Glenn bill in Georgia, which it characterizes as a "proposition to send to the chain-gang a teacher who presumes to teach a colored and a white child in the same class." A ringing editorial closes with the following words, which we heartily indorse: "If the Glenn bill does not become a law, the republic may thank Glenn for the good he has unintentionally done by causing this debate. If it does become law, common sense will come all the faster to belated Georgia."

LET other women go and do likewise. Why not? Do they not also labor? And is not a laborer worthy of his hire? "Lucretia Mott recognized her husband as the treasurer of the family firm, but she did not hesitate to draw 'orders.' Miss Anthony tells how Lucretia once said to her: 'Sister, I am going to give thee $50 to carry on the work.' Then turning to James Mott, she said: 'Out of that corner of thy pocket-book where thee put my pay for keeping thy house, mending thy clothes, etc., please hand Susan the money.' James was too just a man to withhold his hand."—Home Weekly. Let the husbands go and do likewise also, echoes a voice at our elbow.

A "TRYPHENA" who has been accustomed to minister "to the necessity of the saints" tells in The Christian-at-Work all about how to treat a minister. She has "given him hot water, applied court plaster to his wounds, dosed him with hot lemonade and troches before going to bed, commended his sermons." But the line had to be drawn somewhere, and she has put it in the place where we wish many, nay all "Tryphenas" who "esteem them very highly in love for their work's sake" would draw it. We let her speak for herself: "I have never yet been guilty of the duplicity of begging him to smoke a cigar in my presence, or assured him that it was 'not disagreeable to me,' and in fact I 'rather liked' it, when, like most women who have any noses worth speaking of, it is to me a noxious offense. The moral quality of it is something for him to settle, but the odor settles itself everywhere, and I cannot include it in the hospitable thought and intent with which I would meet a possibly angelic visitant. A smoking angel would be a queer thing, wouldn't it, now? I do like to entertain ministers, and they are usually very pleasant guests, when they do not discuss the Andover controversy."

AN effort is being made to secure pardon for one of our Chicago commissioners convicted of giving and taking bribes, on the score of valiant services during the war. We honor the loyal soldier, but we see no reason why because a man did his duty once he should not do it again. If the verdict was too severe a one upon this commissioner, let it be palliated because he is a man, not because he was a soldier. The Northwestern Christian Advocate states the truth concerning the soldier: "If soldiering has any further relation to the issue, we would suggest that the pardon ought not to be given to a man who disgraces his uniform. It is said that some grand army men are circulating the petitions. If so, we are sorry."

THE Jewish Messenger predicts one of these days an International Religious Conference, and suggests that two planks will suffice, viz.: "One God and one humanity." Aye, verily, but this international conference will come together not to frame planks, even such high ones as these, but to ex-emplify them. It will come together to demonstrate that "love is the fulfilling of the law." The time is quite ripe in America for a Pan-Heretical Council where the untrammelled spirits in all denominations, the sincere and devout who sit on the "ragged edge" of every sect will come together to exchange sympathies and to devise plans, to reach the great unchurched with a religion that will sanctify their lives, humanize their interests and make of duty a religious inspiration. UNITY awaits such a council by humbly but persistently working for it.

THE Inquirer of London quotes some good things concerning preaching from Pastor Puaux, a Paris professor of theology. Speaking of the old style of Geneva preaching he says: "Indeed, at that period the pile was the regular thing. That is, each pastor had a pile of sermons which he preached in turn, and over and over again to his people. And the story is told of one pastor who had only three sermons in his pile, and when asked by one of his parishioners if he was not going to make a new one, he replied, 'I will do so when you have learned to attend to the three which I am wont to preach to you.'" The pile has its dangers, but it has its uses also. We once heard Edward Everett Hale say that upon a certain time he received a direct revelation from the Lord. It ran thus, "Edward, a good old sermon is better for thy people than a poor new one. Go and do that which is best for thy people."

THE man who, in his rugged strength of near contact with nature, can wrest from her the secrets which actuate mankind, and reveal them first-hand through the workings of his own flesh and blood, is often tempted to believe the throes of anguish by which he accomplishes this are the real burden of the work accomplished,—that all the rest is but a minor part of the actual labor, struggle, agony of the result finally wrought out; that whoever takes up the task of furthering, finishing, adapting what he has brought forth, has but the play part of it, and exerts but little individual effort in shaping that result. But again, the man who, having high ideals of the perfection of work, the nicety of adaptation, finds that the chief business which falls to him is to continually put the finishing touches to the incomplete labor of others, is equally tempted to believe it is he who is really bearing the burden of the work;—that his counterpart co-laborer who is forever generating plans, piling up rough, valuable but uncompleted material, is an irresponsible, burdenless sort of creature; that acting “only” from impulse, he, therefore, is free from such painful personal application as is necessary to careful adaptation for high results; that the one through whom this valuable material must pass, in order to become more finely readjusted to the wants of mankind, endures the more intense pressure. Each is right in realizing that his own is a primarily important responsibility. Each is wrong in considering his own as the greater burden. The two kinds of labor are like two members of one body. Each is equally essential for a given result. As an individual has two hands, two feet, etc., for complete physical being, so mankind, for complete spiritual being, requires co-acting members; must progress by alternation of motive power. Counterpart forces, by twos and twos, are forever readjusting themselves the one to the other and bearing humanity onward. L.

THE following extract from a private letter reaches a great truth: “There are obstinate, because misunderstanding, forces which array themselves against the progress of liberal thought. We are so made that we can express clearly and adequately only that which is clear to our mental sight. We can not put into word or picture that which is not open to vision. We must first be that which we would express. Therefore is it that the mind which conceives of the Great and Eternal as not to be measured by terms of time, would not put his thought of it into adequate words. He simply feels the power,—the time has not come for expression. He feels it because ‘the provision is allied unto the thing so signified.’ This is why the Unitarians, standing for character in religion, should not require affirmation of God. He is the All-pervading, the All-including. In so far as man tends toward the good, he tends God-ward; he becomes himself the expression of the thought of God in him. It is thus ‘the glory of the One that breaks in everywhere.’

“We can not ignore our Ideal, but we need not degrade it by the expression of its limitation in any direction where we feel limitation to be degradation. Silence in matters of great importance does not necessarily mean unbelief. There is a reverence that can not speak; that feels ‘the shudder of shudder of restraining awe.’ Such silence is not irreverence, but rather seems to contain within it the highest sort of reverence, and typifies the recognition of an Ideal too mighty to be translated into finite phrase. If we can not write a larger meaning into our words to-day, we must wait until the universal dictionary can more completely define them before we try to express our more important items of belief. Only by means of silence, now, can we leave a margin for the new thought to grow in. The laws that we have as yet discovered can be applied only to things made visible to the intellect. The application of such laws to the things as yet only felt,—apprehended,—may produce a dwarfing effect upon the truth behind the dim phenomenon. The veil stiffens into rigidity; it stays fluent only so long as our insight remains pure and patient.”

The New Year of the Churches.

The new year in most of our American churches begins the first of September rather than the first of January. Now is the time in which parish plans are formed. Parishoners make large resolves concerning their service to the cause; ministers are plotting courses of sermons and lectures; Unity Clubs are perfecting plans of study. Our observation and experience goes to show that the efficiency and excellency of the year's work in our churches depends largely upon the definiteness and thoroughness of the plans made in September and October. Work so definitely laid out as to be capable of printing is more than half done. We say then to our contributors, Plan large things, make high resolves; even though it be the fate of human nature to fail to realize some of them, remember that the earnest purpose earnestly pursued,

“That weighed not as his work, yet swelled the man's amount.”

In this season of good resolves and fresh energies our readers will pardon us if we modestly suggest the claims of UNITY. Not for our sake or for its own sake; during its nine years of living it has succeeded in adjusting itself to its environments, so that, such as it is, it can continue to remain comfortably for an indefinite time; but for the greater good it can do. We want it improved greatly. With the growing opportunity it has among Unity Club workers and the independent believers in religion throughout the country, it has need of more room, more variety and better workmanship. These improvements will take place as fast as our constituency increases. We would like to publish a sermon in every number. We can do this only by adding our Church-Door Pulpit extra, and this means increasing our Church-Door Pulpit fund. Fifteen dollars adds the four pages and the living sermons. Now is the time for our parishes to plan for such a fund that will print two, four or six of their minister's best sermons during the year, or for those of our readers who have no parishes, who now look to UNITY for their preaching, to send directly to this office contributions, large or small, for our pulpit fund. Six hundred dollars would give forty sermons in the year.

We would like also to give full four pages space each time to the development of the Unity Club interests, than which there is no more important movement stirring our churches. When the National Bureau is strong enough, it will secure this weekly connection with its members. Meanwhile we can grant these interests such space only when special provision is made. If forty Unity Clubs in the country would appropriate for our use $15 apiece it would secure this weekly organ during their working year. Under the immediate editorial management of Mr. Rich, the corresponding secretary of the Bureau, this department could be made of great power in the intellectual life of our churches. Few clubs have treasuries that would not yield this sum if their attention was properly directed to it, but failing to find the money for direct appropriation, our publishers authorize us to say that any Unity Club sending us twelve new yearly subscribers or their equivalent, will be counted as one of the forty.

Once more, the accumulating testimony of our P. O. Mission workers goes to show that UNITY is a valuable missionary tract. As it is, our missionary list is very large. We would be glad to greatly increase it. Within a few months a sum of about $2500, we believe, has been donated to our eastern contemporary, the Christian Register, the interest of which is to be used in the missionary distribution of that paper. We wish the sum were ten times as large, and expect it will yet reach that basis. Meanwhile, why can not we have a Unity Distribution Fund? From the income of $1000, perhaps 100 copies of UNITY could be sent out each year, 5200 numbers in all. What a tract distribution agency this would be. Who will be the first to start the “Unity Distribution Fund?” These are a few of the many possibilities that crowd upon us at this, the beginning of our new year.

Christ as a Factor in Theology.

Christianity as a theological system turns upon the definition of Christ. In the old theology Christ was made a God, none less than the Eternal One who overlaps time and space. According to the old theology the Infinite One became finite, left the universal throne to walk upon this little earth. Descending voluntarily into the limitations of sense, to perform a work for the accomplishment of which the boundless potencies of limitless Being had proved inadequate, He walked and taught among men, sought to reach, through the avenues of sense, the souls to which He hitherto had spiritual access, and to convince through juggling marvels the minds which had looked unmoved upon the daily miracles of the world and life.

This was the purpose of His life. The purpose of His death was more mysterious. Enslaved by His own law of justice, the Infinite Ruler of all worlds must have satisfaction for human sin. Unsatisfied by the consequences which His own laws of cause and effect bring upon every soul that sins, He must have a satisfaction adequate to the wrong done to an Infinite Being by a finite sinner. The wrong was infinite, His satisfaction should be no less. An infinite wrong can be satisfied only by an infinite penalty. An infinite penalty could come only from infinite punishment of a finite being, or finite punishment of an infinite being. And so, from love of humanity, the Infinite God was crucified in the person of Jesus of Nazareth, to satisfy the Justice which sat sternly above the Universal throne.

Such a puzzle is the atonement of Christ in the old theology. For centuries it was sacredly guarded against rational invasion. Its mystery was proof sufficient of its divinity. To question or doubt was to commit the unpardonable sin. It was taught not to be understood, but simply to be believed. But gradually men came to see that the God who gave us our reason would not condemn us for using it. The torch of reason was lighted at the altar fires of heaven; and when its radiance shows us a dark form of superstition lurking by our path, it is doing what God intended it to do, and it shall not be extinguished. Men came to listen to the voice of reason, and to follow it, even when opposed by the harsh and scolding voices of their priests; and following that divine voice, they came to the conclusion that the old dogma of Atonement, and the dogma of the deity of Christ, were false and foolish.

The majority of earnest thinkers to-day have abandoned these forms of theology, and have adopted more rational ones in their place. They see in Christ a man God-filled, as other men may be; a mouthpiece of the Eternal One, as other men may be; a divine prophet and teacher, as other men may be who themselves walk in the paths of God. They see in the Atonement a work of reconciliation, a work of redemption; not the reconciliation of an angry God to sinful man, but the reconciliation of sinful and imperfect man to a God who is the ideal of Righteousness and Perfection. In this work Jesus stood as teacher and revealer of truth. He pointed the path of safety, and invited men to walk therein. His was the way, the truth, the life. He bore no guilty creatures' sin, he received in his own heart no arrows from the quiver of God's wrath, barbed for other men. He suffered for his fellowmen, as must one who essays to teach or lead. Humanity too often snatches with its angry jaws the hand that gives it food. Jesus died the death of a savior of his fellow men, but it was his life, and not his death, that saves.

Hundreds of clergymen are teaching this conception of Christ and the Atonement. They have left behind them, on the barren shores of their intellectual life, those wrecks which once floated on the waters of their thought. There they lie, rotting in the sunlight of larger truth, washed by the lapping waves of nobler thought. And soon the sands of time will hide the wrecks in forgetfulness.

But while these advance thinkers have abandoned the old conceptions, too many of them still cling to the phraseology with which the old ideas were dressed; they still speak of Jesus in terms which were invented to express the old conceptions of His nature and His office; they still perceive or pretend to perceive in Him some element radically different from the elements of which our common humanity is composed; they still give to his words, real or reported, an authority different not simply in degree, but essentially in kind, from the words of other teachers; they rightly look to His soul for a revelation of God, but fail to perceive in every human soul a revelation of God; they still believe that he worked miracles, but can see no miracles in the daily life of common men; they call Him Savior, and rightly so; but they do not see that the name belongs to the office and not to the man,—that many have filled this noble station; they call Him Son of God, and rightly so, but they do not perceive that we are all sons of God, each justifying his right to the title in proportion to the nobleness of his life.

And so, while these men have abandoned the old dogmas, they are not yet freed from their pernicious influence. The old sun has set, but its red rays are still reflected from faces turned toward the west.

We must open our souls to the dawning light of the new day. Let us recognize the good that shone forth from the God-illuminated soul of Jesus, but let not that light blind our eyes to rays from other men. Let us give to Jesus the homage due to a savior of His fellowmen; but let us not withhold our homage from other souls worthy, even if not so worthy, of our sincere regard. Let us see God in Jesus, but let us also see Him in living men about us. Let us feel His love pulsing through the hearts of reformer and philanthropist. Let us perceive His justice in the laws of right which dominate the human soul. Let us perceive our God not through one, but many lives. When we do this, Humanity shall be the Son of God, revealing in its manifold life the Being and Attributes of God the Father.

A Unity Club Summer School.

The September number of the Unitarian Review contains a very interesting and clear statement of the work known as the Chautauqua Reading Circle, written by Edward Everett Hale, one of the councilors of the Chautauqua University. No one can read this exhibit without being thrilled with a prophetic vision of what is yet to be realized when the animosities of sects and believers in parties are sufficiently ameliorated that large numbers of men and women, far removed in space and social station, can unite in co-operation for the things of the higher life. Chautauqua has done wonderful things, and greater things will it yet do. But it possesses certain limitations which necessarily limit its usefulness in some directions, and will ultimately defeat its highest aims, unless its managers anticipate and amend. Its ambitious comprehensiveness, its spectacular, almost sensational features, and chiefly its strong theological bias, its orthodox predilections, will always make its study of certain topics halting and unsatisfactory. Recognizing these limitations, the Unity Club seeks to supplement, and, so far as it can, copy the excellencies of the Chautauqua system and adopt methods of social study and of co-operative culture to the non-orthodox. Of course the Unity Club Bureau will have the disadvantages that go with the minority. Those who work with it will miss the enthusiasm of numbers. It will have a greater independency to contend with. Military methods will not obtain so readily. It will be harder, perhaps impossible, to induce any great number of our people to take the lock-step. The Unity Club also has great advantages; it has the Chautauqua triumphs to stimulate and encourage it. It can fearlessly face all questions; study highest authorities without fear of theological damage. There is much of prophecy in this movement, to our mind. However much tired preachers and fagged professors may regret it, the Summer School has come to stay. Thousands who seek relief from the routine of life in a few weeks' outing by lake shore or on mountain side, will find that time also favorable to mental renewing and for a certain kind of intellectual activity. This fact gives an opportunity to the helper of humanity. We must prepare for it, even though it compel a few of us to seek rest at some other time than in July and August.

The alliance just consummated between UNITY and the Lakeside School of New Theology presents to our minds an unexpected and great possibility to us. There is the substantial and commodious pavilion that will seat 2000 people in the beautiful grove, inclosed and equipped, on the shores of the lake, that by the labor of Vincent and his associates has already been dedicated to culture. There is all the machinery of reduced railroad rates, steamboat transportation, etc., which has been perfected for the large assembly, at the service of those who would gather at the humbler assemblage at Bemus Point. All this is at our disposal, already secured and paid for. There only remains the need of a suitable caravansary, a summer hotel that will secure plain living for those who seek high thinking, at minimum rates, to make the equipments complete. There is no lack of material for an interesting programme. We trust immediate plans will be made for an encampment at Bemus Point next summer, two weeks in duration. Let, so far as possible, the winter's study be a preparation for the summer's encampment; or, what is more feasible for this year, at least, let the summer school reflect and emphasize some of the best work done in the Unity Clubs this winter. Let it be a high review. We throw out this suggestion thus early in the season, hoping that the directors of the Unity Club Bureau and the representatives of the L. S. N. T. will take prompt steps to secure this result.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

Pride in Littleness.

Professor Swing lately contributed an article to one of our city papers bearing the significant title "I." It was written in a vein of quiet irony, its purpose being to call attention to that class of people who seize every occasion, no matter how small and inopportune, to give voice to their pet hobbies and ideas. The writer found illustrations for his text in the prejudiced dietarian, and other small-sized reformers of that ilk, who, whenever asked to take a cup of coffee or thing of that kind, couch their refusal in terms intended to convey a withering rebuke to the friend or host making the offer. We are all familiar with the type. The persistent emphasis which such people place on the personal pronoun in such declarations as "I never smoke," "I never eat ice cream," discloses a principle which owns a wide application, and gives rise to that "pride in littleness," as I choose to call it, which mars many a character that otherwise might be very pleasing.

Just now I desire to call attention to the existence of this trait in women. Balzac, that profound student of human deed and motive, says, "A good woman has either a fiber more or less than other women, and is stupid or sublime;" a severe saying, but one which serves to point out the petty and meaningless character of much of our boasted womanly goodness. Custom and tradition have combined to make woman at once the smallest and the noblest of created existences, a necessary result of an education that aims to develop sentiment at the expense of reason. The main fault in woman's education, which the improved methods of to-day are striving to correct, has been the failure to impart any consciousness of individual worth or power. She was taught that for her the sum of happiness and duty lay in the fulfillment of certain relations which she sustained to others, and was told that to be a good wife and mother was to be a sufficiently good woman. Lately we have awakened to the knowledge that such instruction has the fault of beginning at the wrong end, and the fault, as I have said, is a radical one. This secondary consideration which has been given to the development of woman's powers in her own behalf has given rise to a host of weaknesses, once termed graces. Among these is the widespread indifference on the part of women, not to say the inability to discern the meaning of principle. The lives of most women are absorbed in details, crowding out all regard for principles and ideas, and leaving little room for high, careful thinking of any kind. And this, though the saying may have a harsh sound, happens as much through choice as necessity. Now the mind wholly occupied with little things—no matter if they be necessary and important—becomes little itself, little in its estimate of life and the relative values of things, little in its outlook and general judgments. Hence arises that pride in littleness of which I have spoken.

Take in illustration the work and care of the family household. There is no field where the temptation to immolate oneself on the shrine of small, fleeting cares is so great as in the housekeeper's. How many women contentedly excuse their failing interest in art, literature, and the living questions of the day with the plea that they have a house to keep. But the woman who can do nothing but keep house is the poorest kind of housekeeper. If her thoughts are continually revolving about her pans and kettles she has only herself to blame that she has become a fitter companion for her cook than for the guests who assemble to eat her elaborate cooking. Yet the infantine trust and complacency with which this sort of woman looks out on the world, and prescribes her own little laws for its government, measuring everything by her inch-high standard, is both laughable and sad. Unfailingly correct in the little things which make up her own life, she comes to believe herself equally infallible in the settlement of questions of larger concern, and decides the affairs of a falling empire with as much confidence as she tests a new recipe for cake-making. But more often there are for her no larger questions, and cake-making is the real business of life. Her rule for pickling is as accurate as the sun, and her opinion on the question of broom handles known far and wide. She never uses anything but a porcelain lined kettle to cook fruit in, she will tell you, with that same emphasis on the pronoun employed by the professor's vegetarian friend when he haughtily declines a piece of beefsteak, and with an air of conscious integrity fit to bespeak the possession of a hundred real virtues. She always sweeps on Fridays, and trims the pantry shelves with triple-scalloped paper. She has her opinion of the woman who uses single-scalloped.

Well, heaven bless her, but it must be quick about it, for her time is short. The world has already learned that a woman may have the most correct opinions on the subject of porcelain kettles and yet be a poor creature. It is a small mind wherever found, whether in workshop or kitchen, that thus continually mistakes the means of orderly, comfortable living for the end. "The best housekeeping is that where results only, and not processes, are visible," said a friend of mine. "I am a Unitarian and something besides," I once heard a minister of that faith say, in explaining his religious views, and he added a similar definition of his political views,—"I am a republican and something besides." I would have women keep this "something besides" in mind, and not define life and the whole of womanly duty in the terms of a single task or vocation.

The "model housekeeper," as she is often called, is in reality no model at all if she makes a fetish of the task given her to execute, forgetting the end of a happy progressive existence which it should alone be made to serve. The housekeeper who thinks because she has three meals to get she is excused from finding out who Tolstoi is; the mother who thinks the tucking of Mary's skirt or the mending of Johnny's stockings precludes the necessity of attending to the minds and morals of either; the wife who conducts her married life on the principle that a man is to be kept good natured through his stomach, instead of helping keep alive a few ideas in the household—these and all like them will go on repeating their feeble pleas and protests, and will greatly commiserate and believe in themselves as they do so, though no one else will. For the truth is, there is time in this world to do whatever we sincerely desire and choose to do. It is the burden of choice that lies so heavily on us, and mental sloth and cowardice hinder us a thousand times where opportunity fails us once. Pride in littleness is nowhere more plainly seen than in the habit of making excuses, and we should remember Ben Franklin's words, that the man who is good at making excuses is good for very little else.

CELIA P. WOOLLEY.

Henry George and the United Labor Party.

The most important convention which has met in recent years was held in Syracuse, N. Y., August 17, 18, 19. It was characterized by the absence of the spirit of aristocracy. Trouble in the convention was manifest when it was generally understood that contestant delegates from a district in New York city had seats in the convention who were of socialistic doctrine. A digression at this point may not be out of place. A socialist may be either a state or democratic socialist. He may believe and teach that the state should control all labor and production, railroads, etc., or he may teach that the people at large should make all the laws, thus doing away with what may be termed a representative form of government. This I hope will clearly define the two positions or schools of socialists. The socialists in city and rural districts were expelled by the prevalence of the majority report on credentials because it was discovered, first, that some of the New York socialistic delegates received their seats by fraud, and second, that no one could be a delegate who belonged to any other political organization. The report was received with loud applause.

Conspicuous among the delegates was the venerable Mr. Redpath, assistant editor of the North American Review, Dr. McGlynn, the excommunicated priest and president of the Anti-Poverty Society, Rev. Hugh O. Pentecost, formerly of the Baptist denomination but now of the Congregationalist church, and the pastor of an independent Congregationalist organization in Newark, N. J.; Mr. Croasdale, formerly of the New York Star but now of the Standard, and last, but not least, rather the greatest of all, Mr. Henry George, the author of "Progress and Poverty," the founder of the United Labor Party and the foremost political economist of the day. What a wonderful group these men are! What a power they wield! How in earnest they seem to be! I met Henry George on the steps leading up to the Alhambra rink, where the convention was being held, and we chatted together on the great issue which is before the people. The New York World, in a recent editorial, warns the people to beware of a man with one remedy. Any one conversing with Henry George, genial and modest as he is, could not believe that he would "tweak" the public by the nose or impose upon society a political economy which he knows and all who think must know is a compromise to capitalists and a libel on justice. Mr. Redpath explained the theory of Henry George, when in a conversation he said to me, in his usual vigor of statement, that the political and social movement which Henry George has inaugurated is an effort not to bring about a feudalism of aristocracy but a feudalism of democracy—a government where the people will own the land. And Hugh O. Pentecost stated it in even plainer language when he said in an address before the convention, that we want the earth—not in the sense that we wish to confiscate the land—that has already been done—but rather to restore it to the people for whom God made it. He affirmed that although Jesus said "the poor ye have with you always"—he did not say "the poor ye ought to have with you always." And if the bible should say the sinful we have with us always, would we therefore feed our children on rum and teach them to steal in order to fulfill the scripture? This same thought was recently reasserted by Father Huntington, who wrote for the Forum that able article on "Tenement House Morality," in which he showed that there is something to be done for the vicious besides giving them a "change of heart," that to reform a man and then bid him get a living where the earth and all that is therein is monopolized is to keep him a criminal and perpetuate the use of jails. The question of civilization is a momentous one, and on reflection and re-reflection I think that the remedy which Mr. George offers is by far the most practical and the most benevolent, the most righteous that could be conceived. A tax on land to the full rental value will put an end to the taxes on personal property, one-third of which, as has been shown by Thomas G. Shearman, goes uncollected and favors the rich rather than the poor. It would check that vandalism which drives men now under our present system of taxation to adopt rascality in every conceivable form, to extort from their neighbor what they must yield to another, and thus rob and plunder, even under the sanction of the church. Start from any point we choose—an abstract principle of justice and truth or from the present condition of things, where we seek to know first what is possible rather than what is desirable, and we shall see the folly of our present system of taxation. Man, as Henry George has said, is a land animal. Two factors enter into the question of poverty and progress—the active factor—life—and the passive factor—the land. Chattel slavery, which was a wrong appropriation of life, the active factor, has been abolished. Industrial slavery, which is the result of a wrong appropriation of the land, the passive factor, will yet be abolished. To do away with industrial slavery is the object of the United Labor Party. I must refrain from argument, but not without saying that Henry George and his followers have aroused the fury of those who labor under the delusion that they are benefactors of their country by upholding the present form of taxation, while oblivious of the fact which no sophistry can repudiate or deny, that men and women perish of hunger who can not obtain work, and we claim them to be brothers and fellowmen.

What the United Labor Party may do for a downtrodden humanity we may know when we understand what it intends to do. The world is looking anxiously upon this movement, and the New York press had as many as twenty representatives busy recording the deliberations of these reformers, telegraphing full reports all over the globe. That party in politics or religion will ultimately succeed whose principles are one with justice and truth.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.

"I have just received the third installment of liberal tracts, for which I tender you and your society my hearty thanks. I find many things in them that coincide exactly with my own thought and feeling. I think your society is doing a good work in distributing a literature that teaches each one to think for himself and not fear to do so."

"I knew nothing of this belief until I received and read your tracts, and feel much interested to find out more. Please send me the address of the best weekly Unitarian paper in the United States."

"Besides translating three pamphlets by Reverend Janson, I have had to translate a somewhat malicious article by Rev. J. Bjornason, the Lutheran minister here, in order to enable Janson to defend himself, and afterwards I translated his reply into Icelandic. I have distributed two thousand copies of our pamphlets among the various Icelandic settlements in Canada and Minnesota, and the remainder I intend to distribute on my lecture trip through the settlements in Dakota."

"Let me thank you for the reading matter you have sent, it has nurtured thirsty souls, it has been like dew distilled on the parched earth. 'Blessed be Drudgery' and 'Wrestling and Blessing' ought to be read by all the toiling ones of earth. I never personally knew a Unitarian, but years ago I read Channing's works, and somehow he has been my staff, as it were, ever since."

"I wish I could tell you on paper how thoroughly I enjoyed the poem and essays you sent me. Mrs. Brotherton's beautiful picture, 'Beyond the Veil,' thrills my whole nature with new love. I have read it again and again. I ever feel as if UNITY was a gift from you, as it was through you that I gained a desire to take it. I am none the less pleased with it than I was at first. I think it gains in interest all the time, or I appreciate its progressive thought more every time it comes."

"Inclosed please find $1 in payment for the book you sent me, 'The Man Jesus,' by Chadwick; I want that book to lend to my friends, for I think it will convince many and help to break their orthodox fetters."

"I will send you the price of Channing's works if you can sell it. So many of my friends want to read it, besides I find it more interesting every time I take it up. I must have it."

"The Unitarian belief, as I see it from the reading matter you have sent me, comes nearer what I would like to believe than anything else I have ever known. Whatever you send me I will read carefully and send to others, believing much good can be done in that way. I can not understand how the feeling came to be that Unitarians were a people to be shunned; I heard so much against them that I determined if possible to find out what they did believe, and I only wish that more believed and practiced as they do."

"I am becoming so much of a Unitarian that I enjoy their publications more than any other, and it has all come about through the Post-office Mission, for I had a prejudice against them at first, so that I should hardly have been willing to go into one of their churches. Now, I do not see how any fair-minded person can help being convinced by their arguments."

THE UNITY CLUB.

Yr Eisteddfod.

A correspondent in the Christian Register rails savagely over the "pestilence of study clubs that have swept over the country." He, or she, talks about "the nonsense and bald-erdash and monumental egotism vented in Browning clubs, etc., etc." We know something of the inside of quite a number of "study clubs" in different places, and of their effect upon those who take part in them, and confess we have seen nothing produced by them or in them that equals in "monumental conceit" that which is seen through the lines of this high toned classical, who would "discount all enthusiasm for the poet that does not date back at least ten years." What is this "study club" that so disturbs this correspondent, but a co-operative society in the things of the spirit, a joint stock mining company in mental fields? It is a humble people's college, it is an attempt to find social communion around the perennial things of letters rather than transient gossips. The absurd and sensational ridicule which newspaper writers have tried to generate at the cost of these study classes have for the most part, so far as our observation goes, sprung from those who know but little about the inside workings of such classes. Everybody can not go to Harvard college, and there are many young men and women who have not the elegant leisure, the libraries, the inherited or acquired aptitude for study, which will make it possible for them to reach the strengths and delights of literature alone, which by co-operation and the help of a leader they may know something of. The Unity club, as it is now being evolved in many of our liberal churches, is the nearest analogue we have in this country to the venerable institution, the name of which heads this article. "Yr Eisteddfod" dates back to pre-historic times. It sprung out of the bardic spirit of ancient Britain. It has its ramifications all through Wales, reaching from local organizations that meet in parish church or peasant cottage up through county to national organization. Musical, literary, scientific, and to a certain extent industrial compositions are studied, rendered, and, in a measure, created by it. It is emphatically an institution of the people, simple farmer girls and boys, rough handed miners represent the class most often seen upon their platforms. These bardic "sittings" (an approximate translation of the name) have two elements of power which the Unity club has not yet, although, if the National Bureau is equal to its opportunity, it may acquire much of that which is desirable in them. 1. It is backed by a national enthusiasm, the prestige of long acquired popularity; in it is centered much of the Cymric patriotism. 2. Most of its exercises are competitive. To win a prize at "Yr Eisteddfod" has been the goal of many a "mute, inglorious Milton" among the Welsh hills, and it has marked the proud moments in the life of thousands of rustic parent hearts in Wales. This year the national organization ventured beyond the sacred boundaries, and it set up its "bardic chair" in the heart of London itself. Of this experiment the Unitarian Herald speaks as follows:

"The hazardous experiment of holding the Welsh Eisteddfod in London has been thoroughly justified, and in some ways the last day was the most interesting. The singing of Welsh national melodies by Miss Mary Davies and by Miss Mary Owen was very beautiful. But the Eisteddfod has owed its success chiefly to the choral singing, which has been admirable indeed. That a little country like Wales should have sent to London six such choirs as those which took part in the competition for the £200 prize is truly remarkable. Nor is it to be forgotten that Wales has been represented at the solo competitions by a great number of really admirable voices. Meetings like that of the Eisteddfod, at which any one who has been born with a beautiful voice, and has learned, no matter how or where, to sing, can enter for a prize, have evident advantages over our Academy competitions. Wales, indeed, might be safely backed to produce in public by Eisteddfod method a greater number of good singers than as the result of any one annual examination London's three great music schools conjointly could show.

"At one of the meetings Mr. Lewis Morris, M. A., author of the 'Epic of Hades,' etc., delivered a most admirable address. As a literary composition it was certainly a model for such oratory, and was moreover delivered with a loud, sonorous voice which must have been heard throughout the hall. He asked his English hearers whether on the whole their experience of the Eisteddfod had not been favorable. Two days had been spent in listening to choral competitions in which working men and women, quarrymen, miners and peasants interpreted the masterpieces of modern music; and to-day they were to have adjudications on literary competitions. In what part of England or elsewhere could be found 130 competitors among the working classes for the best epigram on a sculptor? He then referred to the translation of Shelley's ode to a skylark, to the sacred cantata, to the wood carving and to the penillion singing, and asked whether there was any academic society in England or elsewhere which would touch a higher level of culture, and then there was the dramatic ceremony which they were about to witness. Within that modern hall came 'a ghostly presence, not vague and ghostly but living and breathing, which yet antedated the ken of history.' He asked the great and successful English people to reflect on the significance of these things, and—with an obvious reference to the Home Rule question—to draw the necessary lesson that Celtic traditions and customs were exceedingly tenacious of life, and that their national life must be left to develop itself on its own lines. To his Welsh hearers he said that the material progress shown in such a city as London conveyed a useful and a needed lesson. Had the devotion of the Welsh to music, song and poetry given quite adequate results? A wider education was wanted, and perhaps the Eisteddfod itself might be strengthened. The Welsh weakness was to look too exclusively backwards. They must remember their bardic motto, and with the memory of the past combine 'rational speculation in the future.'"

ORGANIZE early in the fall, join the Bureau, and send fee of $5 to Rev. E. R. Butler, 10 Warrenton street, Boston.

SOME seem to think that Unity Clubs should not be a minister's affair, but wholly a work of the laymen, as to management. The theory is good, but practically the clergy furnish a large amount of the organizing stimulus, and the brain power, especially in the conduct of abstruse studies.

BUT let the laymen and the laywomen come up and take the work from the shoulders of the clergy as fast and as much as possible. It should be neither exclusively of the lay or the clerical element.

THE Unity Club must never be organized as a distinct thing from the church, but as a church institution, wholly under the control of the church, and working wholly in directions that bear upon church life and work, which really cover culture, character, benevolence, social reforms, and philanthropy, I may add amusements. The church should be the lever to lift all life to loftier altitudes and diviner issues.

THE time is not far distant when we shall have Unity Club secretaries in every state, and I was going to say missionaries, but the pastor will be the wise agent to encourage the intellectual life of his people, whatever may be done by officers and through organizations.

At the next Saratoga Conference there should be a door opened to the Unity Club Bureau, and one of our best speakers appointed to give a paper on "Church Culture, or How to Utilize Mind and Culture in our Parishes." Our local conferences will be taking up the question, as they are already doing with Sunday-school and temperance work.

THE question of opening the club to citizens in general, or to literary people outside of the church, is an important one and demands treatment according to circumstances. Here is a club largely made up of outsiders, and everything is fine. Another opened its doors to outsiders, and the latter have taken control of the club and most of the church people starting it have withdrawn. Some clubs not having much literary talent, invite outsiders to give lectures, or musical entertainments, or to take part in debates. As a rule, each church has enough of its own people to fill any place of meeting it may have.

THE HOME.

The Magic of a Kiss.

"I have brought your dinner, father,"
The blacksmith's daughter said,
As she took from her arms a kettle
And lifted its shining lid;
"There's not any pie or pudding,
So I will give you this—"
And upon his toil-worn forehead
She left a childish kiss.

The blacksmith tore off his apron,
And dined in happy mood,
Wondering much at the savor
Hid in his humble food,
While all about him were visions
Full of prophetic bliss;
But he never thought of the magic
In his little daughter's kiss.

And she with her kettle swinging,
Merrily trudged away,
Stopping at sight of a squirrel,
Catching some wild bird's lay.
And I thought how many a shadow
Of life and fate we should miss,
If always our frugal dinners
Were seasoned with a kiss.

John Wesley.

BY MRS. SARAH P. BRIGHAM.

One June day, a hundred and eighty-four years ago, when the earth was covered with bloom and loveliness, a little boy was born whose name is now a household word, "John Wesley." His father was a zealous clergyman, and his mother was a woman of rare ability and piety. She taught John the entire alphabet on his fifth birthday, and easy lessons in reading and spelling followed.

The Wesley family lived in a house built of timber, with a thatched roof. One night when they were sleeping soundly, some of Mr. Wesley's parishoners who had been excited to anger by his bold, honest rebukes, determined to revenge themselves by setting fire to his house.

All the family escaped from the flames but John. His room grew light, and he awoke suddenly. He thought it was morning, and called to his nurse to take him up. No answer came, and pulling aside the bed curtains, he saw streaks of light and fire coming from the roof.

Greatly alarmed, he ran to the door and opened it, and was met by fire and blinding smoke. Frightened as he was, he did not lose his presence of mind. He clambered upon a chest which stood near the window, and shouted to the people below for help.

The stairs were half burned away; there was no time to get a ladder. His parents were in agony. Quickly one man was lifted on the shoulders of another man, and seizing John pulled him from the window. The instant the child's foot touched the ground the roof fell inside.

"Let the home go by," burst from the happy father's lips. "I am rich enough. Let us give thanks to God, for he has given me all my eight children." In the midst of the excited crowd, before the burning house, Mr. Wesley and his wife knelt down upon the green grass, and poured out their heartfelt thanks to God for the preservation of their little household.

They felt that John's life, so wonderfully saved, must henceforth be consecrated to holy purposes.

John left home, a half-grown boy, to attend school. He went through a regular course of study at Oxford, and was afterward ordained to preach. He was invited by the settlers of Georgia to become a missionary among them and the Indians, and, accompanied by his brother Charles, he came to America, full of fiery zeal, hoping to convert easily the red men to the religion of Christ. Their efforts did not meet with the success they anticipated. They returned to England and began field preaching. Open-air services became rapidly popular, and a band of twenty thousand itinerant preachers was organized, and Methodism became a powerful sect. The first Methodist church was erected in Bristol, England, in 1732, and the first Methodist meeting house built in America was erected in 1768.

John Wesley traveled on horseback one hundred thousand miles, speaking in churches and fields to great crowds of people. He endured great hardships and trials; he met often with violent abuse, and his life was at times in peril. He felt that he had received orders from his Lord, and so nothing could check his zeal and devotion to his Master's work.

He was eighty-eight years old when he died. Under one of his portraits these words are engraved: "Is not this a brand plucked from the burning?"—Every Other Sunday.

How Mothers are Sometimes Treated.

The following touching story is told by a gentleman who traveled in the West:

THE LITTLE SHEPHERD DOGS.

The best of these dogs are worth $200, or even more. One herder, whom we met at Cold Spring ranch, showed us a very pretty one that he said he would not sell for $500. She had at that time four young puppies. The night we arrived, we visited his camp, and were greatly interested in the little mother and her nursing babies. Amid those wild, vast mountains, this little nest of motherly devotion and baby trust was very beautiful. While we were exclaiming, the assistant herder came to say that there were more than twenty sheep missing. Two male dogs, both larger than the little mother, were standing about, with their hands in their breeches, doing nothing. But the herder said neither Tom nor Dick would find them; Flora must go. It was urged by the assistant that her foot was sore, that she had been hard at work all day, was nearly worn out, and must feed her puppies. The boss insisted that she must go. The sun was setting. There was no time to lose. Flora was called, and told to hunt for lost sheep, while her master pointed to a great forest, through the edge of which they had passed on their way up. She raised her head, but seemed very loth to leave her babies. The boss called sharply to her. She rose, looking tired and low spirited, with head and tail down, and trotted wearily off toward the flocks. I said:

"That is too bad."

"Oh, she'll be right back. She's lightning on stray sheep."

The next morning I went over to learn whether Flora found the strays. While we were speaking, the sheep were returning, driven by the little dog, who did not raise her head nor wag her tail, even when spoken to, but crawled to her puppies and lay down by them. She had been out all night, and while her hungry babies were tugging away, fell asleep. I have never seen anything so touching. So far as I was concerned, "there was not a dry eye in the house."

How often that scene comes back to me. The vast, gloomy forest, and that little creature, with the sore foot, and her heart crying for her babies, limping and creeping about in the wild cañons all through the long, dark hours, finding and gathering in the lost sheep.

There are other than dog-mothers who often have like fare. The dog stands for fidelity and sacrifice, and we have heard it said that the best part of a human being is the dog in him.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Chicago.—The Sunday-schools of the Church of the Messiah, Third Church and All Souls began promptly last Sunday on the course of union lessons on Luke, prepared by Mr. Utter, and on Monday noon the representatives of these schools met in the first union teachers' meeting of the season at the headquarters, Mr. Utter himself leading. The two first lesson papers were considered. The theory of the "triple tradition" was explained and the reason why Luke was selected was examined; his literary character ranging much higher than that of the writers of Matthew and Mark. His authorship of the book of Acts also indicated his Pauline attitude, his liberal spirit. The second lesson was concerning John the Baptist. His birth stories were compared with those of Isaac, Samuel and Samson, and it was found that the birth of the four was miraculously foretold to aged parents. Other indications of legendary growths were discovered. The place of Elizabeth and Zachariah in art and biblical traditions was noticed. Gabriel, the name of an angel in the Hebrew vocabulary, was the name of a God among the Babylonian traditions from which the Hebrews borrowed the word. Attention was also called to the beautiful face of Gabriel, as painted by Raphael in his "Madonna of the fish." It was noted that, according to Noyes and other later translators, Luke does not claim to be an eye witness. The time of writing was probably towards the close of the first century. Next week the relations of John the Baptist to his times and to Christianity will be discussed. An effort will be made to make these weekly notes of the meeting, in UNITY, a source of help to such teachers and students as have not the privileges of a teachers' meeting.

—The three churches above named found their pastors in the pulpit last Sunday and hearty congregations to welcome them.

—The experiment of keeping the doors of All Souls Church open, and the pulpit supplied by lay talent from the congregation, has justified itself. The audiences were invariably good and the services very acceptable. It shows how much unutilized material we have in our churches and what a debt we owe to those to whom vacation, travels and delights are impossible.

—The crowd that welcomed Doctor Thomas to McVicker's theater last Sunday was so great that he could scarcely find his way to the platform, and when there the good preacher was embowered in flowers.

—The Rev. C. F. Goss, pastor of what is still known in this city as "Moody's Church," has been compelled to tender his resignation. The immediate cause is said to have been too much plain speaking concerning the tyranny visited by employers upon "Chicago's toiling girls." The Christian at Work says: "Probably for the first time in the history of the city, a minister has been literally driven from his pulpit because he trod on the business errors of some of his influential church supporters."

Merrill, Wis.—The very interesting meetings we have been enjoying of late have awakened in one a desire to say a word or two on the subject, if you will grant me a hearing. Perhaps many of your readers do not know that away up here in northern Wisconsin, in the very center of the great mining and lumbering districts, are hearts yearning to know and study the great mysteries of the universe; are hearts anxious to know the truths that Unitarianism teaches; are hearts whose cry is the earnest call, "Come over and help us." Mr. W. H. Coffin came here a few weeks ago, and remained just long enough to hold the tempting draught to our lips. He was here just long enough to make us feel that we were no longer "poor worms of the dust," but rather believe that we were gods. He was here to teach the dignity of man and not the depravity. Every one of those kind and pleasant words found a place in every heart. Not as if by the force of a mighty blow, but as softly and steadily as a sunbeam falls. Not as if hurled at us with lightning flash, but as a feather is wafted downward, and I cannot but feel that those who listened with the right spirit were constrained to say, "It is good to be here." We have no organized society here, as there are so many shades of opinion; but it is generally believed that a Unitarian society would suit the majority. Mr. Coffin was of the most advanced school of thinkers; and a great many feel that we are not ready for such advanced views now, but that we will arrive there ere long. I feel, however, justified in saying that those who would form the nucleus of a new society are now ready to hear of something beside "Christ and him crucified," and I say it with all respect to the humble Judean. We are now ready to learn some good lesson of to-day, and we will drop the old story of 2000 years ago, and revere it for its remarkable longevity. We long to hear some kind and tender words that point our weaknesses, instead of those terrible anathemas in store for us in the hereafter. We yearn for some one to teach us how to love our neighbor aright, and by so doing we are loving God or Good. It seems to me, that right here in Merrill is the most fertile soil in America to sow the seeds of radical Unitarianism. Oh, how much those words mean. They are broader and deeper than the measure of our minds. They are as grand as the universe, for they include it. I wish I could make your readers know how anxious we are to have some husbandman come into this great garden of the north and begin with the soil, and plant the seed, and mature the young growth. Then what a bountiful harvest would there be for Unitarians.

EVALYNN E. NEWELL.

Jerusalem Redeemed.—The west is slowly paying back its debt to the orient. The gospel of soap and towel is a part of the gospel of holy living. The Unitarian Herald thus epitomizes the indications that the sacred land is being reclaimed: "The introduction of soap is doing much to civilize the people of the Holy Land. A large soap factory has been established on the site of ancient Sechem, and the people are beginning to use it on their persons instead of trying to eat it, as they did at first. Along with the introduction of soap other reforms are going on. Bethlehem has been rebuilt, and the streets are lighted with gas. Caesarea is having a building boom. Nazareth is becoming the headquarters of big olive-oil speculators. Corner lots in Joppa are going up with a rush, and real estate in Mount Carmel is largely held by speculators for an advance. The ladies of Jerusalem take all the Parisian fashion journals, and know all about the latest styles of hairdressing."

Boston Notes.—The dedication last Sunday of the new Hebrew Temple, late E. E. Hale's church, was especially interesting. In the services both the orthodox and radical rabbis of our city joined and shook hands in token of a common faith in one God. Both congregations of the Hebrews think they are advancing in religious ideas, in strength and usefulness. It was said that inspiration may come to the worshipers in the new temple from memories of the words and work of the late Unitarian body which worshiped there—a church and a minister all in the line of Hebrew faith of unity of God and trust in humanity. The new legal holiday, Labor day, was generally acquiesced in by the trades and the stores. Instead of being a provocation to disorder, as such a leisure day might be made in some European countries, it was held to use as a day of rest or festival. Last Sunday the cordial greetings began of pastor and people, Sunday scholars and teachers. On Wednesday the tanned faces of our city children appeared in the public schools.

Russia.—Once more the heavy hand of tyranny has been laid upon the poor but deathless Jew. The number of Jews allowed to attend college has been limited by law, and the Jewish lads have been expelled from the schools where they might come in contact with the son of a general.

"In Christ's crown, one more thorn we rue!
In Mary's bosom, one more sword!
O Lord, how long? How long, O Lord?"

The National Editorial Association.—This body meets next week at Denver. John C. Bundy of this city reads a paper on "Journalism in its Professional Aspects," Rufus Rhodes of Alabama, one on "The Press and its Relation to the Pulpit," and Mrs. Sally Joy White of Massachusetts, one on "Woman in Journalism."

Wales in America.—The Interior says, "Three-fourths of the Congregational churches in Pennsylvania are of Welsh origin, and the retention of the Welsh language and the strongly independent tendency of Welsh Congregationalism has stood in the way of a state organization. Recently, however, such an organization has been effected."

George W. Cable, the novelist, is conducting a Saturday afternoon Bible class at Tremont Temple, Boston. When literary men will use their literary instincts in interpreting the literature of the old Hebrew and early Christian peoples we may expect a better understanding and truer appreciation of the Bible.

Bibles.—The Chicago Bible Society circulated last year 13,529 copies of the Scriptures, of which number 1,775 volumes were by free distribution, and still there are upwards of 3,000 saloons in the city. The question is how to vitalize the words of the Bible. It is easy enough to print them.

Ireland.—The Methodists are running a mission tent in this distracted country this summer, and it is doing good business. It will do good. We hope there will be other tents pitched in the name of religion among them.

Manual Training.—It is claimed that the first technical school was established by one Abrahamson in Naas, Sweden, and that most of his teachers were Jews. And was not the greatest of Jews a carpenter's son?

London.—A conference is called of Congregationalists and Baptists looking toward closer co operation and union. Another straw to show that the stream is running towards unity.

Salem, Mass.—Mr. F. B. Mott, who graduated at Meadville in June, has accepted a call for one year to the ministry of the Barlow Square church.

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION

VOLUME XX.]

CHICAGO, SEPTEMBER 17, 1887.

[NUMBER 3.]

EDITORIAL.

A COLORED demonstrator of anatomy has been appointed at the Dartmouth medical college. We believe there has been such a position held by a colored man in Chicago for some time.

"It has now come into vogue in most religious conferences and summer grove meetings, that part of the time is given to temperance questions. Our societies should see to it that this temperance hour is provided by the conference managers." So writes an eastern friend, and so say we.

To the truly religious nature all writings that reflect the sincerity of the human soul are chapters in his Bible, all creeds are rounds in his ladder of faith, all sects contribute to his table, because like a healthy body the soul has vigorous digestion and the power of assimilation.

It was said of St. Francis of Assisi, "He listened to those to whom God himself would not listen." Aye, but when St. Francis listened to such, God was listening to them. God uses our ears to hear the plaint of the miserable, He uses our hands to alleviate the sufferings of the wretched, He uses our heads to light the lamps of knowledge in the caves of ignorance. The sympathies of the universe flow through our spiritual veins, the love of God pulses in our hearts, and in so far as we are true and noble we can say with Jesus, "I and my father are one."

THERE are different ways of going out of town for a summer vacation. Some go with a grip-sack, and some with a Saratoga trunk; but when the Czar of Russia goes, he goes with 50,000 soldiers. "When the Czar left St. Petersburg, on May 25, for his summer residence at Peterhof, the railroad track was guarded by 50,000 soldiers, scattered along a distance of 1200 kilometres. All the bridges and stations had been previously examined to see if they were not undermined by Nihilists, and for twenty-four hours all telegraphic communication was forbidden." We laugh, but it is like laughing at the leaping shadows of a shaken skeleton.

THE following rules to be observed in the school room we clip from an exchange as timely hints to pupils and teachers, but they are not bad rules for those who don't go to school. Let them be tried in the home, the church, and the Sunday-school.

1. Neatness of person and dress.
2. Purity of words and behavior.
3. Cleanliness of desks, books and room.
4. Courteous bearing to teachers and fellow students.
5. Punctuality and promptness to the minute.
6. Respect for the rights of others in all things.
7. Earnest devotion to work.
8. Quietness in all movements.
9. Obedience to the laws of love, good will and duty.

MEN talk of creeds as if mere affirmation could preserve the truth. Truth does not live in creeds, but in souls. The soul perceives before the tongue utters or the pen writes. In perception is the guarantee of persistence of truth. While souls perceive, no lack of utterance can cause any truth to be neglected. If perception is lacking, no creed can preserve a truth for men. Let us not then be too anxious to set out perceptions to words. Let us not hastily give the soul-vision a local habitation and a name. Let us be content to see, and not too often to say our faith. Dogmatism, intolerance of others, limitation, come of too great a desire to fix the divine vision in external form. Let us have a holy of holies, wherein is shrined some truth sacred from the gaze of mortal eyes. Let us have an ark of Jehovah, not to be touched by profane hands. The highest truth will not show its face to gaping crowds. Divinity ever conceals itself from public gaze. Only the garment can be touched. The spirit lives secure within. Never was the divinest truth successfully externalized. By symbol, parable, allegory, men have attempted to materialize for coarser minds those inner truths which illumined souls at once perceive. But ever has this caused degradation and misunderstanding. Ever have such efforts been pearls cast before the swine.

SEEK in teaching full recompense for the labor involved. The bird sings for no wages. The flower blooms for no hire. Money buys not the perfume of the violet. It is shed for its own sake. Let utterance repay the labor of gaining truth. Speak thy thought where and when and to whom it is fitting. The joy thou awakenest in hungry souls shall recompense thee. There is joy in revelation. The visible universe is vibrant with the melody of God's being, revealing itself to man. Let the human soul find like joy in revealing its visions to its fellows. When the soul is consecrated to the perception and revelation of truth, it becomes leader, teacher, Savior to men. This office is the noblest, the holiest, that the soul can fill.

THE recent volume "Doctor Channing's Note Book" has some searching sayings touching riches: "It is of no importance that there should be a rich man in the community, but of great importance that there should not be a poor one." This, "What right have we to anything for ourselves which would do greater good for others?" is a question which is a Bible in itself, if taken to heart. Here is another similar to it: "Is it right to make a display of wealth by which the poor are humbled in their own eyes, and by which their ideas of the happiness of higher conditions are perverted?" In this, "Nothing is so injurious as for a man to form himself on a state of society which he is called to reform," there is more than an antithetic play on words. Emerson says, "It is the uncivil man that makes the world move."

MYRON W. REED, of Denver, turned aside on his way home from his vacation to join the skeleton of his regiment in Michigan, and this is the way it seemed:

"I suppose my regiment had first and last more than 2000 men. Of these only some 200 are to-day on the earth. The war killed a great many men since the war. I do not think that the great republic can do too much for this broken regiment. It is not possible to overpay them. I had not met with them for fifteen years. I have not had so much exercise of wrist and hand in my life. I had to go off by myself and rest and pry my fingers apart. The girls sung 'Brave boys are they, gone at their country's call.' Their mothers were the girls who sang the same song twenty-five years ago. There were about 130 of us who sat down to dinner. Curious how much smaller the type is now than it used to be. All of them drew spectacles in a matter-of-course way. They looked old. It was interesting to see two of them meet in the street and look at each other. It would take a little time to see even one's 'old partner,' but the recognition came, and came violently. And then the memory worked. I noted two things: Difference of rank makes no difference now. The general walked arm in arm with the private of company I. It made a great difference once. Who cares now? To have been a good soldier is enough. Perhaps it will be so hereafter. And I noticed the beautiful contrivance of God that the memory shall hold well defined and distinct the pleasant things of the past and suffer the disagreeable to fade out. We talked of the things that made us smile. The roughness of the long road was not much remembered. Perhaps it will be so when life is done, and we meet in great encampment."

PROFESSOR SWING, in his opening sermon last Sunday, preached on "The Newness of Things," dwelling upon the newness of religion which keeps strides with the newness in politics and science. He said that when Jesus said "Let the dead bury the dead," he was simply calling for an advance onward, and such it had ever been. If any one felt with Solomon that there was "nothing new under the sun," it was caused by his own dead heart. Gladstone is a beautiful spectacle. No days are weary with him; there is no monotony; but his mind is ever filled with the newness of England and America. There has been great expansion, and in that, newness of thought. Darwin talked about the evolution of insects at first, and now scientists are speaking of the evolution of planets. From insects to worlds is a great stride.

THE Unitarian Review for September contains a noble paper by Henry Doty Maxson, on the Religious Possibilities of Agnosticism. Analyzing religion as consisting of morality and emotion, he shows that the latter is and ever has been based upon a sense of the mysterious and unknown. He holds that religious emotion cannot coexist with scientific knowledge concerning a particular fact. "Optics dissolves Iris. Jupiter Tonans disappears before electrical discovery. Medical science dethrones the Jehovah of the plague. If, then, all subjects of contemplation were capable of scientific solution, the death of religion would be only a question of time." But he well shows that increasing knowledge brings us face to face with increasing mystery. Science can never answer all the riddles of the Sphinx. Agnosticism, as Mr. Maxson shows, is simply a recognition of this fact; and so far from claiming that the groundwork of religion is exhausted, asserts that it is inexhaustible. When man can comprehend the Infinite Mystery he may cease to worship; but until that time he will worship and adore the Greater than himself.

GROSSE POINT is a village some thirteen miles north of Chicago. The basis of the town is a German Catholic settlement which, we believe, ante-dates Chicago itself; its business is represented by ten saloons and two grocery stores. Its religion is represented by a large Catholic church, well attended. The public school, if they have one, is of a very inferior quality. This place has been noted for its scenes of revelry and deeds of violence, murders innumerable have occurred there within the last twenty years. It was within a short distance of this place that the venerable couple Mr. and Mrs. Wilson of blessed memory and Unity fellowship were so cruelly murdered in their own house, a few years ago. And the morning paper lying before us records the death of a lady, wantonly shot by a drunken reveler while she was riding in a funeral procession through this place. Seventeen years ago the present writer found neighborly companionship and ministerial fellowship with the priest of the Grosse Point parish. One day he sat with the priest upon the altar steps of this Catholic church, examining the vestments and studying the rubric. The Catholic and the Unitarian in the private confidences of that week day afternoon had but one philosophy concerning the origin, sanctity and authority of book, of priest and of church; but when it was squarely put to the priest, "How can you assume all the presumptions of your office next Sunday and carry the large pretensions which your numerous communicants will humbly believe in. Why not confess your simple manhood, and stand before them as brother before brethren, stripped of sacerdotal pretensions?" The reply came in broken German, prompt with an accent of worldly shrewdness and practical confidence that almost silenced if it did not convince his questioner. "Dat vill do mit your beoples for dey dinks und reads, but these people (tapping his forehead significantly with his fore finger) deir heads be so tick you don't got at 'em only tro de eyes; dese beoples must see der religion or dey don't feel it." The history of the last seventeen years has justified the retort of his questioner, "Aye, but you will never make their heads a shaving thinner by this process, the religion they see will never build you a school-house, lay down sidewalks and make Grosse Point safe to walk in after dark." At that time the Unitarian minister thought he had spoken rather severely, his sympathies were then as now active with the church and the priest. That religion was spectacular, devout, it appealed to the imagination, it was deep rooted in the past and grasped eagerly for a future, but it ignored the present. It was piety without ethics; religion that considered morals cold and inadequate. Grosse Point is but a small dot in the great world that has been suffering from too much of this "eye religion," it waits a head and conscience piety. Nothing but the sense that is scientific and the sentiment that is practical and humanitarian can ever redeem the plague spots. Let's be done with that religion that does not insist on morality as the first, last and only door into the temple of God.

THE New York Christian Advocate is publishing a series of articles on Prayer. If any one is in doubt as to the proper manner of addressing Deity, or hesitates as to the proper subjects for prayer, he should read these articles. Numerous examples of improper prayers are given, and the reader will be surprised to learn how idiotic some men may become in their devotions. A Methodist preacher of New England is said to have asked in prayer, "Where are the members of the official board, O Lord, that they do not stand by the minister? Are they all dead?" Another Methodist preacher, whose usually meager audience was on one occasion augmented by a funeral, thus gave thanks: "O God, we thank Thee that there is something that can bring this people out; even if it is a funeral." Another minister, who wished his people to remember that he had traveled abroad, is said to have addressed these words to Deity: "O Lord, thou knowest that we saw in Europe much distress." At a certain church meeting, called to seek divine direction in the selection of a new minister, a clergyman thus besought the Lord for assistance: "O Lord, send us a minister—a man of thine own heart; not an old man in his dotage, nor a young man in his goslinghood, but a man with all the modern improvements." Another minister, seeking to console a bereaved husband, prayed earnestly for the divine blessing to rest upon him and upon "the one to come who shall fill the place made vacant by the death of our deceased sister." Many other examples of idiotic praying are referred to, and full instructions are given for constructing prayers in accordance with the laws of common sense and good taste. We are sorry for the clergy who need such instructions in the etiquette of prayer. But when prayer is made by rule, it is well that the rule be correct. True prayer is as natural as the song of a bird, and rises above all instruction. The soul that is touched with the spirit of real devotion can no more err in uttering prayer than the lark can err in singing the beauty and joy of dawn.

Frances Power Cobbe.

It was a bold as well as a beautiful thing that the publication branch of the W. C. T. U. did when they published the cheap edition of the "Duties of Women" by her whose name heads this article. The orthodox women of America publishing, printing, distributing and reading the words of this ardent theist, the friend, editor and to a certain extent biographer of Theodore Parker. We sincerely hope that this most timely book will not prove a business failure and miss the wide circulation the heroic publishers have aimed at. In the July number of the Chautauquan, Miss Frances E. Willard, president of the W. C. T. U., introduces this book, or rather the author, in a most interesting article, one which contains some original matter concerning Miss Cobbe's own line, and biographical facts not generally known. We desire to give as much room to Miss Willard's words as possible, after thanking her heartily for the breadth and insight shown in this step, and begging our UNITY readers to do everything they can to circulate this wise book among the women of America. "Boom" is a word that probably belongs to "slang" and does not represent a very ethical thought; but we do not know why a good thing should not be "boomed" as well as a bad thing. We would like to help "boom" this book of Miss Cobbe's, so that 25,000 copies of it will be sold and read by 50,000 readers between now and Christmas time. How is it to be done? By simply arousing a true sense of its importance among those who have the power of shaping public tastes and public opinion. Let the preachers, editors and women's clubs join the W. C. T. U. in introducing this woman to whom Miss Willard assigns the rank of "greatest among living Englishwomen."

Concerning this book she says, "For clearness and depth, as well as 'sweetness and light,' I know nothing of anything in our literature upon this theme that approaches this little volume. It has been fitly called a 'veritable hand-book of noble living.' It is a modern book. There is no flavor of 'twice told tales' in her 'advice to women,' and the 'sweet girl graduate' will not find the word 'sphere' between the covers of this vigorous volume."

After persistent effort, Miss Willard says she has found reliable data for the following outline of the life of this interesting woman.

Frances Power Cobbe was born in Dublin, December 4, 1822. Her father was Charles Cobbe of Newbridge House, County Dublin, "a landed gentleman of old family and good estate." In his youth, before he inherited his property, he went out to India in the 19th Light Dragoons and became a famous soldier. Returning home after a period of years, he married Frances Conroy, an Englishwoman of old descent. They had four sons and, after a long interval, their only daughter Frances. Mr. Cobbe's mother was a Trench, sister of the first Earl of Clenmarty. His grandmother was Lady Eliza Beresford, sister of the marquis of Waterford, and his great-grandfather, Charles Cobbe, was archbishop of Dublin. The archbishop was the younger son of a Hampshire family which had been seated for centuries at "The Grange," now Lord Ashburton's, and the scene of some of Mrs. Carlyle's mortifications. One of the ancestors, Richard Cobbe, represented Hampshire in Cromwell's Parliament of 1656—having Richard Cromwell for his colleague.

In her "Duties of Women" Miss Cobbe says:—

"I recollect my father telling me that in the old Mahratta wars he had scaled the walls of fortresses while the enemy were hurling stones on their assailants from the battlements above, and shooting at them on the ladders from a dozen loop-holes; and how at Assaye he charged with his regiment, a mere handful of men, against an almost numberless host, dashing up again and again to the mouths of the enemy's cannon. But these things, he said, made little demand on courage. It was when he and his troops were once ordered to halt where they had been stationed on a hill-side by a mistake within the ricochet of the enemy's balls; and for four hours they remained still, while, one after another the men fell from their horses, cut in twain or left headless corpses, as the shot struck them. This, he said, was a strain,—such a strain that, when the command to charge was given at last, the roar where with the soldiers responded revealed the tension they had undergone."

These statements concerning Miss Cobbe's ancestry and the experiences in which her father played a hero's part, throw light upon her inheritance of statesman-like qualities, her love of theological and ethical studies, and that courage which in a man might have led to a military life. In a woman's environment these traits have developed an unexcelled champion of righteousness and truth. Of her studies, Miss Cobbe once wrote me as follows:—

"I was educated by governesses at home at Newbridge House until I was fourteen, then sent for two years to a famous Brighton school. Returning, I kept my father's house from sixteen to thirty-five, when he died and my oldest brother of course succeeded. It was a very large house and we kept it in the old way with a considerable household—fourteen servants—so I had a good experience of household duties. We often had eighteen or twenty people stopping in our home for weeks. Then I had the care of our village school kept by my father for his laborers' children, and the sole supervision of two villages where nobody was ever ill, or dying, or in trouble, without being looked after by me. Amid these pleasant duties I studied a good deal, often all night long, and wrote my 'Intuitive Morals' and 'Religious Duty.'

'My father and all my people belonged to the Church of England, but when I grew up that faith became untenable to me, and by slow degrees I became a theist. The writings of Theodore Parker just met me when I had reached nearly the same point alone and gave me infinite comfort and help. We entered into correspondence then, and ten years after I stood in Florence by his death-bed and grave.

"After my father's death I traveled—alone and comparatively poor—to Rome, Egypt, Jerusalem, the Jordan, Baalbec, Smyrna, Cyprus, Hungary, Venice, Florence, and so on. Then I went to live and work with Mary Carpenter among the slums of Bristol and in her reformatory for little girl thieves." Here Miss Cobbe's health broke down again, and she went several times to Italy.

In concert with her friend Miss Eliot (daughter of the Dean of Bristol), Miss Cobbe now made two plans, one for protecting servant girls and another for affording relief and comforts to destitute incurables. This indefatigable woman labored thus for several years, also in the ragged schools and workhouse infirmaries. Then she sprained her ankle and became for four years a cripple on crutches.

On one of her trips to Italy she had, through Mrs. Somerville, become acquainted with Miss Lloyd, a grand-natured Welsh woman of about her own age, with whom she has lived in perfect concord for twenty-five years, or, as Miss Cobbe herself says, "for twenty years she lived in London to please me and now I live in Wales to please her, at Hengwrt, her beautiful old place." In this long and quiet period, Miss Cobbe has, as she writes me, "printed fourteen or fifteen books herself, about twenty-five pamphlets on theology, woman's claims, vivisection, and an enormous quantity of articles for newspapers and magazines." She has been on the staff of the Edinburgh Review and of the London Standard, and has contributed to the Quarterly Review, the Contemporary, Fortnightly, Cornhill, Macmillan's, and many more.

But a consuming pity for the brute creation led Miss Cobbe, twelve years ago, to cease almost entirely from her literary work and to set about founding "The Victoria Society for the Protection of Animals from Vivisection," of which she is honorary secretary. In this work the late Lord Shaftesbury was her great supporter. His speeches in and out of parliament, his pen, his personal influence and gifts, joined to the tireless efforts of Miss Cobbe, have made a deep impression upon the British public, and enlisted the sympathy of the truest men and women of Christendom. Our own Audubon societies, by which ladies are pledged to wear neither feathers nor birds, are an echo of this potent Englishwoman's tender pleadings for "the silent neighbors," whose day of redemption draweth nigh. There is no more convincing proof that the world grows better all the time than this mighty work of Frances Power Cobbe and her coadjutors in England, and the equally great work done in America by George T. Angell, of Boston, and Henry Bergh, of New York. Some time the public schools will universally include in their training lessons kindness to animals, and it will hardly be believed that women ever outdid savages in decorations that involved the slaughter of the innocent.

First the slave, then the wage-worker, then woman, then the animal world shall rise to freedom, in the long, sure, steady lift of Christ's resistless gospel lever, and the great Englishwoman who, though not of our faith, has a mind so saturated with Christian ideas and crowded with Scripture passages that one who reads the "Duties of Women" would suppose her to be still an orthodox Christian, has led the way in her own land to this blessed consummation. The nearest approach to Miss Cobbe, whom I hope some day to see, thus far vouchsafed to me by destiny, was in 1869, when, in her studio at Rome, I clasped the hand of Harriet Hosmer, and drank in the praise she lavished upon her friend, Frances Power Cobbe, whom she described as being of proportions ample as her intellect, and possessed of a wit as sunny as her heart.

Miss Willard's article concludes with the "Introductory Letter" which Miss Cobbe has furnished for the new edition of "The Duties of Women." It runs as follows:

HENGWRT, DOLGELLEY, N. WALES, April 5, 1887.

DEAR MRS. ANDREW;—You and Miss Willard have done me the honor to ask me to write a few lines of address to those readers to whom my little book may be introduced through your kind offices.

There is not, I imagine, any such difference in the lives of women of our Anglo-Saxon race on the two sides of the Atlantic as to make any of my remarks on our duties here inapplicable there. Nevertheless, there is in your country such a fund of fresh and free enthusiasm, and it is, naturally, so much less circumscribed by long-established customs, that I am led to believe it is even more needful with you than with us to be on our guard to keep the great onward movement of our sex within the bounds of the strictest moral discipline. Every woman who straggles off the line of march does us an injury—just as every woman who leads the van, like Miss Willard, does us all infinite service.

The old virtues of womanhood,—purity of life and lips and heart, tenderness, unselfishness, and the simplicity which is at the opposite pole from self-assertion, these qualities must not for a moment be suffered to fall into the background, while the happy women of the coming time add to them courage and learning, and eloquence and public spirit, and many other noble gifts which shall be theirs if they remain faithful to their ideal, to God, and to duty.

One "rock ahead" I will permit myself to point out before I close. I have observed in many American, as in some English books and articles, that the overbearing spirit noticeable among the leading scientists of this generation has called out an echo of dogmatism and shallow presumption in speaking of the profoundest problems of existence which is insufferably foolish. No cant of religion was ever more odious than this modern cant of science; and when I catch a note of it in the mouth of some half-trained young woman, proud of her smattering of Huxley and Spencer, and her semi-comprehended Darwin, I wish I could made her sit for one hour at the feet of Mary Somerville.

On the other hand, my heart warms to your young countrywomen such as I have met in England and all over Europe, full of high and generous enthusiasm and reverence for all that has been great and noble in the past, all that promises blessing in the future. To them, with their sweet, keen faces, their innocent humor, their fearless courage, I send forth my little book, with earnest wish and prayer that when my "six days' work is done" (as it must very shortly be), they will perform the "Duties of Women" better than I have done, —better even than I have been able to understand or depict them.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANCES POWER COBBE.

Longings.

MORNING.

Behold again the miracle of morning newly born :
As brightly shines the sun,
The mist dispelling,
My heart is longing,
So with joy to run,
That all souls may be gladdened before another morn.

NOON.

Nature is full of grandeur, and busy, throbbing life:
This movement says to me,
O do not tarry,
But bravely carry
Such message as you see;
Haste to cheer the fainting, and to lessen strife.

NIGHT.

Without, the day in perfect peace slowly ebbs away
'Mid crimson glories bright;
It will not stay,
Though much I pray
For work, before the night.
O teach me better my true work, before another day.

Apostolic Succession.*

1—Protestant View.—"It is not necessary, indeed, for the Protestant preacher's validity that he should have received grace through the unbroken priestly order of the church from the original apostles; but it is deemed necessary that he should have received it from the hands of his own faith. . . . Whatever may be said of individual societies, there is no sect—no, not the most liberal—that dares trust a minister freely with the Divine Spirit. . . . And so essentially there is no difference between the Catholic and the common Protestant doctrine of ministerial succession. . . . There is no progress, no going beyond the creed of the fathers, no getting out of the catechism.

"The Orthodox must hold to Calvin or Edwards, the Methodist must not depart from Wesley, the Quaker can not go beyond Fox and Barclay; and even in our own free denomination there are many who would draw lines each side of Channing, to pass over which in either direction should be deemed sufficient cause for non-fellowship.

2—The True View.—"As not even Omnipotence can make the blind see without first opening their eyes, so he can not reveal truth to the soul unless the soul be first opened to receive it.

"We shall see that the true apostolic succession does not lie within denominational boundaries, but overleaps them, and that, in the race of true prophets, validity is proved rather by departure from than conformity to the established order of creeds and churches. . . . Wiclif and Huss and Luther, Calvin and Zwingli, though trampling on the authority of the church and introducing new doctrines and ecclesiastical usages, were yet, by spiritual descent, more legitimate priests of Christianity than were the popes and bishops who excommunicated them. . . . The only church that can be an honest monument to his [Channing's] name and truly claim him as its great apostle is that which, with the largest freedom of religious inquiry and indefinite progress in religious truth, combines the utmost charity to opponent in opinion and love to all men.

"Finally, God's priesthood are not ordained by the laying on of ecclesiastic hands, but by the revelation of truth to the soul"

3—The Object of Unitarian Christianity.—"I believe that the mission of Unitarian Christianity is higher and larger than simply to make a new religious sect or to open new places for Sunday worship or to fill old ones,—namely: to liberalize and spiritualize all sects, to make all society religious and all life worship."

"The Christian sects do not dare to live Christ's life yet. For centuries, now, the civilized world has borne his name. It has prayed to him and through him; it has called him Son of God, nay, God himself; it has invented ingenious devices of theology by which he may save mankind; men have preached him, read him, admired him, worshiped him; but who yet dares to live as he lived, with no authority but Truth, no law but Right, no master but God?"—William J. Potter, 1860.

Architects of the New Theology.

Perhaps you ask who originated the ideas of The New Theology. The ideas of The New Theology are as old as the New Testament. But the explanation of these ideas, which is the province of theology, comes from many sources. The New Theology is a cluster growing upon an old root. Many a pearl gathered in the mystic past has found a place in the casket of its truth. Men of profound thought in all times and climes have made their contributions. Of those who in modern time have helped in its formation, I may mention Kant and Fichte among the philosophers; of the poets, Tennyson, Whittier, Longfellow and Emerson; among the theologians upon the other side of the globe I may mention the stainless F. D. Maurice and his pupils, Dean Stanley, Charles Kingsley, all of whom have passed on into the immortal life. Among living men in England I may mention Canon Farrar and Matthew Arnold, and especially James Martineau. Among those on this side of the globe I may mention among Unitarians, William Ellery Channing and Theodore Parker; among the Universalists, Thayer Ballou and the eloquent Chapin; of the Congregationalists, Bushnell, Munger and Henry Ward Beecher; of the Presbyterians, Professor Swing, and of the Methodists, Doctor Thomas, both now independent, and Heber Newton, of the Episcopal church. And if I, by the patient thought of the next ten or twenty years, may be allowed to contribute a bud or even a leaf to the beautiful wreath of this fairest truth, I will say with the old Roman, "Sat est vixisse."

Why should not all Christians unite in this great work? Let us cheer each other on in whatever fields we may work—Methodist, Presbyterian, Universalist, Catholic. We are all children of the one Father, all contestants for the same crown, the crowns of righteousness.—J. G. T.

Resistance to Evil.

There is one form of ethical culture in which a sense of its importance will compel us to take part, and that is the forcible resistance to evil. The world is not yet in a condition which will enable us to "resist not evil" under all circumstances. The law, and the conflicts which its enforcement involves, have slowly evolved the moral sense of man, so that the present century finds this faculty well developed in a great many individuals of our race. The process has been of relentless severity, and thousands, yes, millions of men have been sacrificed in accomplishing the result. Millions have learned what is ethically right, and they are in the habit of doing it more or less of the time. Other millions have not yet learned what is right in various respects, and their practice is, therefore, the less satisfactory. Under the circumstances, we cannot yet cease to "resist evil," and give up the police and the courts, as Count Tolstoi would have us do. But Christ did not hesitate on account of the condition of the world to introduce a pure ethical system. He knew that men had found the natural system a severe one, and he told them if they would all follow his method they would "find rest unto their souls," which is undoubtedly true. So we must regard the world as in a condition of transition from a "state of law" to a "state of grace;" that is, as making the passage from under a "law of conflict" to a "law of harmony." Since this growth is not yet completed, we are compelled to resist evil. This resistance, in every-day life, is to many not a pleasurable service. To others it may be the excuse for the gratification of a combative, or even a sanguinary, disposition. There is a wide ethical contrast between the conduct of a man who refuses to accept a drink of alcohol when he feels that he does not need it, and the man who joins a party of lynchers on pretence of doing justice, but in reality to commit murder without fear of consequences. It is in this field that moral courage has its opportunity, and it is here that moral cowardice is so frequently displayed. It is here, also, that the ethical critic will have to draw the line between just indignation against wrong and the indulgence of vindictive anger. If resistance to evil were more general the world would be better. Those who do not condemn themselves for omissions in this respect may feel a just satisfaction in believing that the world is better for their having lived in it.

* From "Twenty-five Sermons of Twenty-five Years."

Song of the Star-ray.

O star-ray, messenger of God to men,
Fleet-winged, darting across infinite vastnesses of space!
What dost thou bring to my soul?
What message bearest thou from out the eternities?
What singest thou to my soul, thou whose motion is music?
Art thou come to bring greeting to my soul from other souls?
Dost thou come to announce attainment of the ideal?
On that farther shore of infinity, where thou hast thy source,
Is there beauty, perfection, wholeness, truth?
Is there somewhere, however far, a divine humanity?
On the shores from which thou wast shot, O arrow of light,
Is there a humanity regenerate, born into the Spirit,
God and truth-loving, right-living, splendid in divine manhood?
Dost thou sing of a humanity that crowns, not crucifies, its saviors;
That stones not prophets, nor starves them;
That builds not altars to greed;
That tramples down wrong instead of wronged;
That uplifts not injustice, but justice;
That bows not to wealth, but worth;
That worships not any made God, but the Maker;
That strives not to bring God down, but man up;
That takes not man to heaven, but heaven to man;
That puts not man in chains for thought or worship,
But calls ever the soul up higher, out farther, and in deeper;
That sees itself as God-made and making,—
Dost thou sing such a humanity, O star-ray, flitting across the spaces to greet me?

SOLON LAUER.

THE UNITY CLUB.

OVER two hundred ladies are connected with the society to encourage studies at home as teachers; over 2000 volumes are in the lending library. It has been in operation since 1873. Miss A. E. Ticknor, No. 41 Marlborough street, Boston, is the secretary.

THE following circular, designed for the pastors of Unitarian and liberal churches, has interest to a wider constituency and may find response in some pews where the pulpit fails to move, hence we print it in these columns:

"You know of the attempt at co-operation in the intellectual things of our churches represented by the Unity Club Bureau, organized May last in Boston. Have you anything that answers to a Unity Club in your church? If so, will you not see that it is allied at once to the general work, according to enclosed circular? If not, will you not undertake to organize such an adjunct to your church as soon as possible? You see that Mrs. E. E. Maréan, Chicago, is prepared to send you such suggestions, printed or otherwise, as you may feel the need of. Mr. Charles H. Kerr, of Chicago, our publisher, already has several suggestive leaflets; and we hope to publish more. For the sake of uniformity, and that whatever our clubs may do may be made available for all clubs, it is suggested that whatever programme or other matter you may print be done by Mr. Kerr. This will enable the publishing committee oftentimes to use the composition for wider purposes; but of course this is optional. The important thing is to get to work, and as far as possible to work together.

"We hope that all our preachers will take early occasion to speak from their pulpits upon the importance of the intellectual life, and the duty of the church to utilize and to consecrate the forces of culture, particularly in relation to the young. If you do this, please report results.

"BY THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,

"A. J. RICH, Cor. Sec'y East."

THE following helps and Unity Club plans of work can be had by sending (10 cents each) to 25 Beacon street, Boston, or to 175 Dearborn street, Chicago, viz:

Outline Studies in Holmes, Bryant, Whittier; their poems.

Outline Studies in the Poetry and Prose of James Russell Lowell.

Ten Great Novels. Suggestions for Clubs and Private Reading.

Unity Clubs. Suggestions for the formation of Study Classes in Literature.

George Eliot. Suggestions for Clubs and Private Reading. The Study of Politics in Unity Clubs and Classes.

THERE are in preparation the following plans for study the coming season, together with list of books: On History (Ireland), by Prof. W. F. Allen, Wisconsin University, Madison, Wis. On Art, by Miss Ellen Hale, of Boston. On Science (astronomy), by Rev. S. R. Calthrop, of Syracuse, N. Y. A course of religious reading and study, by J. C. Learned, of St. Louis. These plans will be printed uniform with the above.

Any other person proposing to prepare a plan of work on any other subject, will please inform Mr. Rich as soon as practicable.

THE executive committee of the National Bureau decided to employ Charles H. Kerr & Co. to do its printing the current year. Their office is 175 Dearborn street, Chicago. Rev. Mr. Rich is the committee on printing; and while each section has authority to send direct to the printers to have work done, yet in the matter of plans of study, it is desirable, for various reasons, that the MSS. pass through his hands. We would also suggest to clubs who propose to print their own programmes to have their work done at this office. In that way uniformity of page may be secured and the composition be utilized for other clubs.

THERE are two great advantages in opening the club to outsiders,—in that way you can have a very select, a very literary club, and do almost anything you like; it is also a way to interest intelligent young people in Unitarian thought, and many thereby have become members of the society. To have the best culture and talent in the city or village in the Unity Club will enable it to have excellent entertainments by home talent, and to aid worthy local objects of charity. The whole people interested will turn out to aid any such good cause.

UNITY CLUBS make a mistake when they grudge voting a dollar to the choir, the Sunday-school, or the church treasury. The club can make use of all its funds for its own pleasure, but often it is better to contribute something to some interest of the church, or to some local charity, but let it never seem to be devoted to money making exclusively, and especially let it never condescend to light entertainments and flippant shows.

WILL all the churches or clubs east and west, who have not done so, report to A. J. Rich, Fall River, Mass., whether or not they have a Unity Club organized, its exact name and its work and methods. It is desirable to know these facts.

ANY one who has, or thinks he has, something to say in the line of plans for study and work, will confer a favor by forwarding the same in writing to the corresponding secretary, since possibly a similar plan may be already in print.

ANY one who knows of a good book for reading or study on any of the departments of the present season, as printed in the circular, will please make it known. Mrs. E. E. Marean, 3619 Ellis avenue, Chicago, Ill., will post you on club organization. A. J. R.

THE STUDY TABLE.

Wind Flowers. By Luella D. Smith. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co. 1887. Square 18mo., pp. 245. $1.00.

The verses in the little volume entitled "Wind Flowers" are as frail and fleeting as the anemone which the writer takes as their emblem, and are not to be judged by the same standards as the preceding book. More than one-third of the verses are translations from the German, chiefly from Geibel. They show an evident appreciation of the lyric simplicity of this poet, dear to all German readers, but whose qualities are not easily reproduced in another language. The best translations we remember from Geibel are in the little volume "Exotics," published by Rev. J. F. Clarke and his daughter. The verses are divided into twelve groups, corresponding to the months of the year. From "April" is the following extract, which is one of the best.

"Against the sky the elm has laid
Her graceful branches, unafraid.
Against the sky the maples rest,
And hold their red buds to be blest.

* * * * *

Against the sky! That is the test.
Hold up thy soul and stand confessed.
Against the sky! And all of earth
Will show at once its lowly birth.
Against the sky! And what is fair
Will join eternal beauty there.
Have fellowship with Heaven and try
To judge thy life against the sky.

Poetry and Philosophy of Goethe. Lectures and Discussions before the Milwaukee Literary School, in August, 1886. Edited by Marion V. Dudley. Chicago: S. C. Griggs & Co.

This is a volume packed full of things of value for the Goethe student and for everybody who thinks. The Milwaukee Literary School of last year, following much the same direction followed by the Concord School of Philosophy on its more literary side, seems to have been singularly successful, and it is to be regretted that an enterprise so well begun was not continued the present year. Perhaps its life is to be intermittent, and that we shall yet hear from it again. In taking up Goethe last year, it devoted itself to the same subject which was taken up at Concord the year before, and, comparing the two volumes,—for the Concord lectures on Goethe have also been published—to quite as good purpose. The list of the contents will indicate better than anything else, perhaps, the character and value of this work: Address of Welcome, by President John Johnston; Goethe's Wilhelm Meister, by W. T. Harris; Goethe as a Scientist, by James MacAlister; Goethe's Relation to English Literature, by F. B. Sanborn; the Divine Comedy and Faust, by Mrs. Caroline K. Sherman; Mythology of the Second Part of Faust, by Denton J. Snider; The Elective Affinities, by Mrs. Maria A. Shorey; What is most valuable to us in German Philosophy and Literature, by W. T. Harris; Goethe as a Man, by W. T. Hewitt; Goethe as Writer, Savant and Citizen, by Horace Rublee; A Letter from Goethe to Carlyle, translated by A. K. Linderfelt; Anniversary Ode to Goethe, by Denton J. Snider; the Erl-King, by Miss Aubertine Woodward; Goethe's Birthday, by Mrs. Hattie Tyng Griswold. In a book which contains hardly a page without real value, it is almost invidious to single out anything for special praise. We should like, however, to call attention to Doctor Harris's general lecture on German Philosophy and Literature, so full of fine insights and good generalizations, as well as to his remarks in several of the discussions which followed the lectures and which, exceptionally well reported here, contain some of the best things in the book. His remarks upon Dante, following Mrs. Sherman's lecture, are particularly thoughtful. Mrs. Sherman's lecture itself is one of the most valuable in the book, and we wish that we were writing for a big magazine instead of for a small paper, that we might say a great deal about it. The lectures are by no means in an unbroken strain of panegyric. Mr. Rublee, in his appreciative lecture, points out in a clear way many of Goethe's limitations as a man, a citizen and a political thinker. Goethe's attitude during the whole great period of the French revolution was not great; in apprehension of the true trend and spirit of the new age, he was far behind Schiller or Fichte or Kant. The fact that he was a great poet, and that the work that he was doing in poetry and science was undoubtedly much better and much more valuable for Germany than any political pamphlets that he might have written, is of no account in the matter. With other sympathies, and a more prophetic spirit, he would have written just as good poetry and just as good science—and, while the redeeming element of cosmopolitanism should never be forgotten, this should always be said. Colonial Ballads, Sonnets and Other Verse. By Margaret J. Preston. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1887.

The latest volume of Margaret J. Preston is, as the title denotes, a collection of colonial ballads, sonnets and a few single poems, most of which have been in print before. The writer has won for herself a name among the better of our minor poets, though many of her verses seem to have been made instead of born. Some of the ballads are woven around incidents so slight that they hardly repay the setting, but one or two, like "The Royal Abbess," are complete in themselves and contain lines that remain persistently in the memory. A group of poems at the close of the book, each describing some significant incident in the child-life of one of the old masters, might do good service as illustration in Art Sections of some of our Unity clubs. To these should be added the six sonnets, "Medallion Heads," each giving us a vivid glimpse at the wife or love of a great artist.

The tenderness in the sonnet "Sit, Jessica," the thought of "Horizons," the archness of "The Begging Cupid" and the heart message of "Compensation," are among the best things in the book. E. E. M.

THE HOME.

"Some Real Work."

Almost every member of the Unitarian church in C—, N. H., felt interested in the "Country Week" Work. The minister had begun to talk about it before the snow was off the ground, and reports showing the work done by members of other churches were distributed about in all the pews long before summer came. To be sure it was a new idea to most of the parish, and some of the congregation took only a lukewarm interest in it. One said frankly that nothing would induce her to take a dirty little vagrant from Boston into her pretty home; but many more, in spite of its novelty, really took hold of the project with enthusiasm, and country homes in C— were found for thirty-five little ones.

Among the first to take kindly to the plan were four earnest young girls. They were not "goody-goody" girls—the kind who despise dancing and picnics and sit sadly in the corners at "church sociables." But they were pretty, attractive, lively girls, full of fun and fond of having a "good time." The idea of having some poor children who had been "dragged up," as Charles Lamb says, in miserable homes and had found their only play ground in the streets and -alleys of a crowded city come into the country for ten days and have a "really nice time," appealed to these warm-hearted girls tremendously. After the minister's first address on the subject, these girls all crowded around him and said that if their mothers would only allow them to take the responsibility of entertaining some children they would gladly give their time and strength to the undertaking. But the next Sunday found them with their enthusiasm chilled. For some reason none of them were able to have the children come to their homes. One had an invalid father who could not bear to hear a door slam, or a child laugh. Another had a mother who was a very particular housekeeper; she could not have her house upset by strange children. A third had some younger brothers and sisters and her suggestion had been met with exclamations of horror. "Do you want your little sisters and brothers to catch all sorts of diseases and die? Of course we can't have children we know nothing about in our house." The fourth lived in the center of the town near a horse-car track and her parents told her that their house was not "country enough" for the children to come to. Discouraged with these rebuffs the girls had almost made up their minds to give up their plan when one of them had a bright idea come to her. "Suppose," said she "we get our fathers and mothers to give us a little money and take some children up to W—. I am sure we could get some rooms for them and board at Farmer B—'s." This plan was received with approbation. The girls' parents were very willing to give their daughters five or six dollars. That was a very different matter from allowing them to invite dirty little city vagabonds into their own homes. Farmer B., who had a large, old fashioned farm, eighteen miles from C—, was happy to take any number of children to board.

The arrangement made was that the first week in July the four girls should go up to W— and take charge of eight poor children from Boston for ten days. The farmer and his wife agreed to board the children for $2.00 each and the young ladies for $3.00 each. There were two large double rooms, and in each of these were put two double beds, so that four children could sleep in each room. A letter was sent to Miss Bailey, who takes charge of sending the children from Boston, inviting four boys and four girls, and in a good deal of trepidation the young hostesses awaited the arrival of their little visitors.

On the day when the children were expected, two girls went W— to make the final arrangements there, and two awaited the arrival of the children in C—. It was a very warm morning in July when the young emigrants arrived. A sweet looking lady, dressed in mourning, escorted the children from Boston. She dropped thirty-five in C—, and then went further north with the rest of the car load. It was a pathetic sight to see the little strangers step off the train. They were of all ages and sizes, and most of them had all their earthly possessions done up in newspapers. Nor were their parcels very securely fastened, for stockings, neither white nor clean, could be seen protruding from several of them. One boy left behind him a trail of neatly darned undergarments. Some of the girls had brought their dolls, and some of the boys their bats with them. All looked pale and a little frightened at the sight of so many strange faces.

Each child bore a ticket with the name of his host or hostess upon it. It took some time to distribute the children and find the ones who had tickets marked for "W—." They had to start directly in another train. The two girls who were waiting for their visitors were a little alarmed to find that a toddling boy of three was one of their prizes. There was a large, stalwart-looking girl of sixteen, with a ticket marked W—, and there was "Fritz," a saucy-looking boy of twelve, and his little sister "Nelly." Then there were two placid-looking German girls, and two pretty little girls about eight or nine. Two boys were missing. Miss Bailey had made a mistake and sent two girls in their places. Little "Billy," the baby of the party, had to be led by one of the young ladies, and the other children were soon marshalled together and settled in their seats for the short journey which was before them. Of course the smallest children had the biggest bundles, and one little girl had aimed at the dignity of having a valise, in which her wardrobe rattled about suspiciously.

When the children arrived in W— and saw the green fields, the hills and pretty rippling brook, their pleasure was unbounded. One boy had been in the country before and seen "real cows," but to most of them all the sights and sounds were new. The young hostesses were strict disciplinarians and insisted upon giving each child a bath every night. They also did their best to improve their manners, and presented them with such unknown luxuries as soap and tooth-brushes. The small urchin was so delighted with the novel amusement of brushing his teeth that, whenever missing, he was sure to be found near the washbowl. Some of the remarks which the children let fall about their homes gave glimpses of great misery. "My father used to be a carpenter, but now he is a drunkard," said one little girl. Another child said, "My father is a cook, and makes twenty dollars a week when he is sober." To most of the children drunkenness was so common an evil that they spoke of the drunkenness of their fathers with no trace of shame.

The children were not angels. What children ever were? One or two proved to be hard to manage, and "Fritz" lay down on the floor and kicked and screamed more than once. "Billy," tiny as he looked, had several fits of temper, and one of his favorite ways of showing his disapproval of his nurses was to call them names, and such names! "You dirty nigger!" was the mildest term of reproach he used toward them! The largest girl had a place in a candy shop, and had two weeks' vacation; and a smaller child was a "cash girl" in winter. How their hostesses did work to entertain them! They took them on drives and picnics, and rainy days adjourned with them to the barn. The children picked berries and flowers, and I saw the cows milked, and had plenty of good country food to eat. Perhaps they did not appreciate the good things given them to eat as much as was expected. At first they had not great appetites, and then they had all become so used to coarse food that fresh meat they did not care for. One little girl, the evening before she went home, said: "I hope my mother will have my favorite supper to-morrow—boiled cabbage."

All day the children had to be watched over and amused, and in the evening there were stockings to be mended and rents to be repaired in the little time-worn garments. There was a great difference in the clothes brought by the different children. Some had but a few things, but all were neat and clean. Others had half a dozen dresses, but nothing fit to put on. One child had a bundle of vile smelling rags for his whole wardrobe. A sewing bee was instituted among the guests, summoning in the neighboring farms, and new aprons were made for all the little girls before they went home.

One day a picnic of all the little "country weekers" in C— came up to W— for the day. The children all spent their day in the woods and had their dinners under the trees, eating all the sandwiches and gingerbread, and drinking all the lemonade they wanted.

It must be confessed that when the time came for the children to go home that their young hostesses felt relieved. It can not be denied that it is hard work entertaining children, and that all the four girls were pretty well tired out the day they reported themselves back in C— and said that their young charges had gone home. But they none of them complained of their trouble, and they all said their time and their work had been paid for by the smiling, happy, sun-burned children, whom they had sent back to Boston that day. For the first time in their lives these girls had done some real, unselfish, charitable work, and had learned the meaning of Lowell's beautiful lines:

"Not what we give, but what we share;
For the gift without the giver is bare."

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Chicago.—The life and work of John the Baptist is the subject to be taken in hand for next Sunday by our Sunday-schools, such of them, at least, as have joined in the union course of lessons on the Third Gospel. The portion of the gospel upon which the lesson is founded is the third chapter of Luke, from the beginning to the twenty-first verse; but in connection with this, what is said of John in the other gospels, particularly the account of his death in the sixth chapter of Mark, and what Jesus said of him, recorded in the seventh chapter of Luke, verses eighteen to thirty, should be studied. Luke fixes the date of John's entering upon his ministry very definitely in the first verse of the third chapter, too definitely, it would seem probable, as the time named is exactly six months before Jesus entered upon his ministry, and, from the general proportions of the entire history, it would seem probable that John had preached some years before Jesus began. This, however, is not important, except as indicating the disposition of Luke to be sometimes a little more precise than his knowledge would warrant.

John was the son of a priest and was a Nazarene from his birth. The same stories are told of his birth that are told of Samuel and Samson, who were "given to the Lord" by their mothers, even before they were born. He was the last of the prophets of Israel, the last of those wonderful shaggy anchorites of the desert, of whom Elijah and Samuel were the first. It is, of course, possible that the fact that the Jews at this time were looking for one who should come in the power and spirit of Elijah, had something to do with the account which we possess of John's appearance. However, it is a little difficult to say whether his camel's hair garment was counted as shaggy or as "soft raiment." But as to his preaching, at least, there is no uncertain sound. He issues from the wilderness and speaks his "Thus saith the Lord," exactly as Elijah come to life again might have spoken it.

Mr. Jones, at the Monday noon teachers' meeting, urged that it was easier to undervalue than to overvalue the work of John, and his influence in the founding of Christianity. There are always these beginners before the beginning, who do their work strongly and well, die unrecognized and are forgotten, while some other (perhaps greater and perhaps not), by entering into their labors, fills the eyes of the world as the great founder of the new movement.

Mr. Blake defended what may be called the denunciatory preaching of John, "Generation of vi-pers, who hath warned you," etc., saying that this sort of moral wrath, as John Weiss termed it in the case of Theodore Parker, is a very essential quality in those best fitted to serve humanity in important crises.

The baptism of Jesus by John may be treated in this lesson, or in number six, which takes up the subject of Jesus entering upon his ministry. John's baptism was not a new thing, not of his own invention or introduction. The Jews baptized proselytes to their religion, and baptism in the sacred river Jordan no doubt had been practiced for a long time previous to John's preaching. Mr. Utter suggested that it may have been connected with the pilgrimages to the Jordan, and that John may have found his first audience among such pilgrims.

The wilderness of Judea, in which John preached, is southeast of Jerusalem, including a good deal of the country between that city and the Dead sea. The locusts, which formed part of John's food, according to Matthew, were the edible grasshoppers of those regions,—there is no ground whatever for supposing the word to refer to the pod of the locust tree, or any such vegetable matter.

Colorado.—The 4th inst. was a red letter day for Unitarianism in this state. Two churches dedicated, one at Denver, the other at Greeley, the dedication sermon at both places being preached by M. J. Savage, of Boston. Mr. Herford was also present at Denver and made a stirring address in the morning and preached in the evening. Mr. Savage's theme at Denver was "The True Position and Work of the Church in the Modern World." Mr. Herford's theme was "Paul's Experience of Prayer." Rev. N. S. Hogeland, of Greeley, the Jewish rabbi, and Rev. A. B. Hyde, D. D., of Maryland, also took part in the services. Crowds went away for the want of room to admit them. The city papers give extensive accounts, including full reports of the two sermons, from which we hope to give some clippings in the future. Our correspondents in that region have been so full of their joy that they have not taken time to report. But we see from these papers the splendid fruition of their earnest labors and send them our heartiest greetings. The seed sown by the devoted hands of Beckwith, Stone, Herbert and Weeks fell upon good ground and is bringing forth a hundred fold, and the harvest is not yet. It is still seeding time.

A Jewish Dedication.—Last Sunday a most unique and probably antique dedication took place in this city. The Hebrew congregation Ohave Shalom Miriam is an orthodox Jewish society composed largely of the humbler representatives of that race, tradesmen, peddlers and handicraftsmen. There are no wealthy people among them, they have been worshipping for several years in an obscure hall on an unattractive street, but now they have completed a substantial new synagogue at a cost of $30,000. The exercises on Sunday last began at 2 and continued till 10 P. M. They were interspersed with speeches, music and lunching. The chief interest centered in the selling by auction the honors of the occasion or the privileges of the ceremony. It began in the old hall in selling the privilege of carrying the property of the society out of the old home into the new; the scrolls of the society, which number in all some two dozen different rolls, brought from $2 to $15 apiece, then the lamp of the altar, the keys, vestments, etc., etc. At the new building the privileges of spreading the altar, of lighting each jet of each chandelier, etc., etc., the sales in both buildings aggregated some $2000. Judging from the report the proceedings were very far from being a mere shrewd piece of commercial "jewing," as it will be at once suggested by their Gentile critics. The occasion was full of sentiment. Young men bought the privilege for their mothers or aged grandmothers to light a jet of gas in the chandelier, which they did with radiant faces. The president of the society, with tears streaming down his face, handed the key, bedded in a basket of flowers, to his little son and daughter, for whom he bought the right of opening the door and of being the first to enter the building to which he had given so much time and affection. Grotesque as all this seems, when compared to scenes so often witnessed in Christian churches, the buying rights in a "ring cake" or votes for a bracelet to be given to the handsomest girl, a chance in a "grab-bag," or a dip into a "fishpond," etc., etc., this rises into the dignity of a ritual. It is clothed with poetry, it cultivates sentiment, it sets us thinking, aye, and feeling, too, does it not?

"The Southern Letter" is the title of a little sheet printed by the Tuskegee Normal School, Alabama. This is one of the most prosperous colored schools in the south; presided over by Booker T. Washington. The September issue is both inspiring and touching in the quiet evidence it gives of courage and diligence on the part of the race that is struggling upward so successfully out of slavery through ignorance into independence and intelligence. We learn that "quite a little colony of the students have been at work during the summer in the Birmingham coal mine to earn money to resume their studies in the fall." We heard Mr. Washington in his address at Weirs last July, and it was of the ringing, manly kind that inspires enthusiastic confidence. We gladly print the following statement of their needs and earnestly hope that they will fall under the eye of some who will take the hint.

I. Books and periodicals, for the library—Sunday-school papers; daily, weekly or monthly papers for our reading room.

II. Bed clothes of any kind; new or second hand clothes for needy students.

III. Money in any sums to help meet current and building expenses.

Kansas.—The Topeka church was closed during August and the first two Sundays in September. Mr. Powell preached two Sundays at Wichita to intelligent audiences which give promise of another church in this state. Last Sunday he preached before the Universalist State Convention at Hutchinson. Doctor Demorest, secretary of the National Universalist Convention, preached in Unity church, Topeka, on Tuesday night, the 13th. Miss Mary E. Leggett has been conducting the ladies' religious study class at Topeka during the summer, using the third programme (Unitarian Doctrines) in Unity Leaflet No. 12. Miss L. left Tuesday (P. M.) for Beatrice where she takes charge of the Unitarian Society for three months. She is so filled with the spirit of consecration to the work she has chosen, one can but predict success of the noblest kind for her. She leaves many warm friends in Topeka, who part with regret from one who has been a great help in our work here. Our Study Class are now going to take up the first programme published in Unity leaflet—The Growth of the Hebrew Religion.

Solon, Iowa.—Rev. Arthur J. Beavis, of Iowa City, was recently refused the Methodist Episcopal church at this place in which to deliver a lecture; as a consequence a rousing audience gathered in the hall, and the local paper says: "It is not known why the trustees would not allow him to lecture in the church, unless it is the fear that he might set some of the people to thinking on the subject and might result in a loss of a member or two from their church. No matter, however, what their reason was for so doing, the sentiment of the people is against the action of the trustees, and some assert that it was an insult to religion."

Cardiff, Wales.—An attractive Unitarian church with all the modern American attachments has recently been dedicated at this place. One interesting feature of the dedication was that the responsive service introduced by the American minister in Wales was written by a Welsh minister in America.

EDITORIAL.

THE following is going the rounds of the papers: "A Pennsylvania man rose in prayer-meeting, recently, and prayed for the absent 'who were prostrated on beds of sickness and sofas of wellness.'" Reader, do not smile too readily over the latter sufferers. Poor invalids! theirs is the more pathetic condition. It is easier to reach the difficulties of a diseased body than of a sick soul. Sad is the condition of the spiritual paralytics who are "prostrated on sofas of wellness," and their number is legion. Indeed, pray for them!

ONE of our exchanges says of UNITY, "It is willing to teach religion, but it will not represent it." If we understand this editor he has come very near the truth of it. We do exist to teach religion by printed and by spoken word, and still more, if it be possible, by consistent living, kindly acts and earnest deeds. In every way possible we would teach, and, so far as lies in our power, exemplify religion. But we dare make no claims that we represent by our thought or by our organization religion in any authoritative or peculiar way. It takes all shades of thought and form of ecclesiastical organizations, all churches, and all the unchurched as well, to represent religion. Any claim to this, set up by the representative of one sect or one creed, is presumptuous and dogmatic. We will try hard to thus nobly deserve the censure of our critic.

MRS. SALLIE F. CHAPIN, in the Union Signal, thus answers the wicked argument that the saloons must be taxed, in order that street and road funds may be adequate to secure good highways:

"If mothers had control
They could pave to-day
The broad highway
With something not so white as the souls
Of the innocent boys at play.
Why can't men pave the business marts
With something harder than women's hearts?
Is there no gold that will serve their turn,
Save the shining gold of the heads that rest
Soft on a loving mother's breast?
Must these go down to the drunkard's grave
In order that we the streets may pave?"

THERE is great rejoicing in orthodox circles over the failure of Professor Smyth, of Andover, to furnish Bible proof texts for his theory of second probation, as invited by the Independent. Whether Professor Smyth can furnish such proof texts or not, we are glad he has not done so. To attempt a demonstration of the "universal hope" by citations from a book held as infallible would be to perpetuate a greater error than the one displaced. To prove a true doctrine by a false method is certainly not an unmixed evil; but the conscientious teacher will not admit that even a good end can justify such a bad means. The doctrine of a partial salvation is but one of many errors flowing from the corrupted fountain of this false conception of the Bible. To cut off this rivulet and leave the fountain still flowing is but a partial and inadequate work. Professor Smyth has done well in not complying with the narrow request of the Independent. If he will now declare what he must ere this have perceived,—that the doctrine of the infallibility of the Bible is a part of the very theology constructed from that book, and that theology must, therefore, ultimately rest elsewhere than upon the Bible,—he will have taken one more step toward that "New Theology" which the broader and deeper thought of the times is shaping.

OUR neighbor, The Universalist, is disturbed because the New Theology Herald and Doctor Townsend have "fallen into the open arms of UNITY," because forsooth we have "no theology." But surely our contemporary is mistaken. We do have a theology, which teaches us that all religious movements in history have been and are actuated by a common search for truth and goodness; that all men are brethren, linked together by an infinite law, which is love, and that this linked chain binds together all the children of men in one brotherhood,—here in this world as in all worlds to come. We teach a theology that says that the differences in men's thoughts about religion are smaller than, and subordinate to, their harmonies,—the purposes and longing of the human soul. Instead of being "non-theistic," we teach a theism so vital and unquestioned that no wordy confession or abstinence from words can establish or disestablish it. We hold a theism so vital that we say that he who "obeys his laws, though he deny his existence," is also a believer in God, and an unwitting devotee at his shrine. We would teach a belief in God so overmastering that it becomes a faith in goodness, an appreciation of love, a reverence for truth, so vital and active that we will everywhere and evermore place the emphasis upon these attributes of God rather than upon any dogmatic pronunciation of the name. We are so solicitous for a theistic faith that we will not willingly let any word or words that are but inadequate symbols stand between us and the things. Instead of being "non-christian" in our teachings, we hold to an ever growing Christianity; a Christianity so real and so large that the name itself, as interpreted by history, is too small and unreal to represent it,—a Christianity of which the Christian sects, Catholic, Episcopalian, Methodist, Unitarian, Universalist and all the rest of them, individually and collectively, are but as shadows to the substance. We would teach the Christianity that has been in the world from the beginning of time, that is the anointed spirit of consecration exemplified in Buddha and Socrates as well as by Jesus,—a Christianity that teaches that the kingdom of heaven is within the soul; that says, "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord! Lord! but he that doeth the will, is acceptable." A Christianity that would judge the tree by its fruit, even though the tree be called by an evil name, or though it should fail to receive any name at all, if its fruit is for the refreshing and nourishing of men, we will count worthy a place in the orchards of God. To the teaching of such a theology, the maintenance of such a theism and the propagation of such a Christianity is UNITY committed, and in joining hands with UNITY in this work, Doctor Townsend and his associates do but continue the work they have so devotedly and successfully carried on for years in Jamestown and vicinity.

Reverence With a Downward Look.

The reverence of the pagan, as Goethe has shown, always looked up; it sought the divine in things high, but the reverence of the Christian, this great seer tells us, is found by looking down. It is found in humility. God to-day is oftener found in things lowly; the gate of heaven is under our feet, more often than it is over our heads. "Mind not high things, but condescend to things of low estate," says Paul. "He that would be greatest among you let him serve," says Jesus. A few weeks ago we stood on the top of Mt. Washington at four o'clock in the morning. The company had been hurried out of bed by the ringing of the bell that announced an approaching sunrise. We watched eagerly the clouds above us; at first they were so flaky and soft that they seemed to be just the screen needed for the sun to throw his rarest colors upon; the fleecy softness would change his fire into gold and turn his red into vanishing pinks. All eyes were turned toward the eastern horizon where "spurting and suppressed it lay," full of promise, but while we waited a mist came up from the distant sea. It touched first with gray and then with dampness the morning; the rebellious company halted shivering upon the rocks, half in hopes that their thirst for a sunrise might counteract even an east wind, and lift the fog and give us the sky again.

When the disappointment became too palpable to be concealed, some one suggested a walk in order to get up an appetite for breakfast so that that could be enjoyed if nothing else, and so a few of us started down the carriage road. We had not gone far before pebbles, lichens, mosses, mountain flowers and mountain butterflies began to charm us. The mind met new delights in every turn. Unconsciously a warmth fell upon us, and lo! as we looked down there were the glories we missed by looking up. Great chasms into which daylight was pouring like wine into a goblet, suggestive blues, mystic grays, eddied round the precipices, farther and farther the revelation extended, valleys opened, little lakes glistened like diamonds, and all the delights of a mountain painting seemed to be ours, at least more of them than we could carry. Tardily we realized what we ought to have known before, that the glories from that mountain cone were more beneath us than above us. What were the ether-filled spaces above, with their treacherous fleets of sailing mists, compared to the heroic ranges beneath us, the wooded slopes and peopled valleys in which children played and where lovers trysted. There is where the greater glory was. That is where heaven was to be looked for.

Let this symbolize the spiritual truth represented in our title. We stand ever on the mountain top. Would we find the glory of heaven, the "gate of God," seek it, not by looking up into the intangible ether of the unknown, the limitless spaces of our ignorance, but down into the craggy crannies of crooked human nature, among the weather-beaten rocks of human experience, down the shaded slopes of human society, the valleys of history where baby aspirations have bloomed, where manly temptations have been resisted, where human tears have fertilized the flowers of human affections.

Ancient tower-temples had altar chambers at the foot and at the top; both were fitting. It is well to climb at times where the soul can have a better view of the realm to which it belongs. But the most devout, the truest worshipper, I take it, will frequent most often the humbler altar at the foot of the tower; it is nearer to the hearthstone, it is not so far from the cradle, it is easier to keep the path worn between that shrine and the grave, flowers grow better down there, too, and we remember that the singers in our mountain party were in better voice and could sing longer at the foot of the mountain than on top. The knight sought high and far the "Holy Grail" that all the while hung beside his castle door. Underneath your feet is holy ground. The reverence that abides is the reverence that is humble. "Neither in this mountain nor in Jerusalem shall ye worship the Father, but in spirit and in truth."

A Baby's Spelling Lesson,

"The deep secret is the open secret." We can put a very deep one in five words, five syllables, that a child just beginning can spell: We see as we are. What the baby spells is this,—and he may well stumble over it,—that in everything we look at there is more than even the wisest eyes have yet looked at; and that the depth of each one's present seeing depends on how much past seeing is already funded in him,—that is, on how much he is already.

Go with an artist friend into the fields. He sees lights in the grass, tints in the clouds, shadows on the mountain, which your eye will hardly catch, even when pointed out. "Mr. Turner," said a friend one day to him, "Mr. Turner, I never see in Nature the glows and the colors you put into your pictures." "Ah, don't you wish you could, though?" was the painter's answer. We never wrote a poem, never framed a drama, but

The poem hangs on the berry-bush
When comes the poet's eye,—
The street is full of masquerade
When Shakespeare passes by.

Or read one of the great poems with a poet-friend. His face will flush, his voice will tremble, while you are cold and even-toned. As he pauses over this passage and that passage, you wonder how you passed its beauty by so unconsciously. Go to Europe; what you bring back in your memory and your note-book will be closely proportioned to the knowledge of history, and art, and men, you carry aboard the steamship in New York. Humboldt spent only five years in America, and it took twelve quartos and sixteen folios, and half a dozen helpers, and many years, to put on record what he saw. You and I have lived here fifty years, and how many folios and secretaries would it take to write out what we have seen? Most men find little new in a walk in the woods, or a mountain tramp. That same Humboldt walked up Vesuvius with two of his friends one day, and the world was definitely richer in new knowledge that night from that single excursion. Thoreau, wandering about the Concord woods or along the Cape Cod beaches, would sight new facts, as one picks daisies and buttercups in the field. "Did you ever find an Indian arrow-head?" asked his companion one day. "O yes, there is one," and he pointed at his feet. He had a whim of extolling his own town and neighborhood as the most favored center on the planet for natural observation. "I think nothing is to be hoped from you," he writes, "if this bit of mold under your feet is not sweeter to you than any other in this world,—or in any world." He found the red snow in one of his walks, and expected to find the Victoria Regia, and returned Kane's Arctic Voyage to a friend from whom he had borrowed it, with the remark that "most of the phenomena noted there might be observed in Concord." And once he wrote, "I have never got over my surprise that I should have been born into the most estimable place in all the world, and in the very nick of time, too!" A scratch on a rock in a Maine blueberry pasture would tell Agassiz that an iceberg passed that way ages ago, or that glaciers once lay there and ground their course southward. To you and me it is a scratch on a rock. A bit of chalk in Huxley's hands will bring up facts, not legends, of the oozy bed on which the Atlantic cable rests, and report how life went on at the time the Dover cliffs were formed. The whole realm of Nature, as it opens itself to modern science, reiterates with every new discovery the grand, inspiring, simple law—men see in proportion to what men are; every past sight counts into new visions.

Even those sudden glimpses of great truths, those marvels of insight at whose mystery the world catches breath, exemplify, they do not contravene, this law. We call such glimpses "inspiration," "genius," "revelation." Whatever they be, the new seeing bears some proportion to the past seeing. "The great mind sees the idea in the fact; the little mind sees only the fact"—if that. It's a Newton detects a law of gravitation in the fall of a ripe apple from its bough. Only a Goethe picks up a deer's skull in the woods and exclaims, "These skull-sections are but the spinal vertebræ modified." Mayer draws blood from a sick man's arm in some tropical country, and notices that the blood is of a brighter red than he has been wont to see up north; to Mayer, but not to the myriad doctors who had used their lancet before, that brighter crimson was hint sufficient to put him on the track of the correlation of forces,—the great scientific consummation thus far of the century. Darwin is struck by certain facts in the distribution of South American plants, and he follows out this simple lead to his doctrine of the natural origin of species,—the other scientific consummation of the century. Give Cuvier a tooth or a bone of an animal whose race ran out thousands of years ago, and sometimes he could reconstruct its figure, and the rocky archives of its burial place would prove his vision right. And Agassiz (the story, I believe, is strictly true) thrice dreamed his way into the stone and saw the creature lying there in fossil with the structure which his hammer afterward uncovered. Cuvier and Agassiz, Darwin and Mayer, could do these things; why not the common seers of science? Because each man can only see in proportion to what he has seen, that is, in proportion to what he is already. The better mind, the deeper insight; the greater fund of knowledge already acquired, the greater find of knowledge vouchsafed. The baby is right,—“We see as we are.”

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

The Sermon.

Exultant soars his lark-like soul
Beyond the people's yearning sight;
A glimpse they catch of waning wing,
Perchance of feather dropped in flight.

Yet, distance-hid, the bird is there,
And, thrilled with its intensity,
They hear his glad song ringing free
Far up the blue immensity;

And thank the Father that the guide,
The teacher that his grace hath sent,
Not alway walketh at their side
With heavenward eye and aim content,

But, singing, soars with straight, true flight,
To breathe the air of upper skies,
Whence comes his voice, like beckoning hand,
To bid free souls spread wing and rise.

Christian Agnosticism.

A recent writer in UNITY seeks to justify the use of the words “Christian Agnosticism” in terms against which I want to make a friendly protest. The ground of his position is found in the following phrase: “The incomprehensibility of God.” Stating that “God is incomprehensible,” and that “that which cannot be comprehended is mysterious,” and that therefore “God must ever be mysterious,” he likens the position of man to that of a ship in the fog: “The fog may lift a little, but the clear space which we then enjoy but shows a wider circle of mystery.”

I accept the illustration and desire to point out what is to me the illogicality of applying it to the proposition “God must ever be mysterious—is incomprehensible.” It is the mistake of confounding imagination (thinking by means of images, or mental pictures) and logical, or pure thinking. From the fact that our power of thinking gets its first stimulation to activity by means of the impression of the senses, we may be led to infer that mental power must always depend upon sense impressions. But this is not true. Power of thought depends upon the mind's grasp of universal and necessary principles and not upon the strength or feebleness of the senses. If the man on the fog-surrounded ship knows that he is on a ship, that the ocean is beneath the ship, and solid earth beneath the ocean, and that ship, ocean and earth exist in space of which he thoroughly knows the nature and law, I submit that there is nothing incomprehensible in the nature of the, as yet, unobserved details of the region around him. There is only lack of present knowledge about them. The first breath of wind may dissipate the fog and reveal water or land or other ships or what not. The man stands confronting not the incomprehensible but the, as yet, unobserved, two very different things indeed.

If the fog were absolutely enveloping and impenetrable and had been ever since the man was born, he would not—to carry on the figure—know that there was even an ocean or a ship under him, and there would be nothing to suggest to him a question regarding them, and the man would stand in the presence of, not what would be to him a mystery, but merely no question at all. The other figure of the writer is, in my view, equally misleading—viz., that of a man standing in a room of a temple from which room many doors open, each disclosing more rooms beyond, from each of which open more doors—and so on till, as he says, “the weary eye refuses to follow further.” Precisely. And here is the important point of the whole argument. The difficulty in discovering all about the temple is not at all a difficulty of thought—an inherent incomprehensibility in the nature of the temple—but purely a weariness of the eye, the tediousness of the endless process of going on from one detail to another. But there would be nothing in all this to prevent knowledge of the temple, the fact that it was a temple, the purpose to which it was dedicated, the nature of its construction, in short, the law of it, the general truths concerning it. There would be nothing in the nature of the temple which confronted the human mind as an insurmountable barrier.

The writer goes on to say that “a thing may be thinkable but not conceivable; that is to say we may think of the general notion horse, but when we conceive of horse it is always some particular horse which rises to view.” In regard to the puzzling appearance of some particular horse every time we think of the general notion of horse, it only needs to be noted that our thought is not in the slightest degree limited by the particular image. It may be admitted that there can be no thought without its accompaniment of a sensuous image. This is, however, because the nature of thought is activity, but the thinker is perfectly aware that he can make any image and can annul any by another. In fact in recalling anything by its image, it is not the thing that is seen but its image, a creation of the mind, and in pure, or logical thinking, the mind has to have the universal as the basis on which to make the particular image at any moment. When one thinks of the “general notion horse” and there immediately comes before his mental vision a particular horse, he is also perfectly well aware that the general notion will apply to any other horse and to each one of an infinite number of horses all specifically differing, if you please, from the first horse whose image came up. If one says the word “boat,” though we may think of a particular boat, we are well aware that the speaker may, and probably does, refer to quite a different boat, and it is the general, logical notion of boat which both the speaker and we have in common which constitutes the important part of our thought. The “particular image,” therefore, has nothing to do with the validity of a “general notion.”

The writer of the article goes on to say—“To conceive is to picture in imagination. We can never perfectly conceive of God.” If “to conceive” be “to picture in imagination,” then indeed nothing whatever can be “perfectly conceived,” not even a boulder in the field or a grain of sand any more than the solar system, for we know that matter is infinitely subdivisible and that anything, no matter what, is composed of infinite multiplicity, and hence in its very nature never completely pictureable. But to conceive is not to imagine. To conceive is to think logically and to see clearly the implications of a definition. With that insight once gained the logical faculty rests satisfied. Not so, however, the image-making faculty, which always goes on attempting to image all the particulars of a series which the logical faculty knows to be infinite in number. The logical faculty could, therefore, have told the image-making faculty that its industry was futile and could have told it so before its first step as well as after “the weary eye refuses to follow” further.

And this mistake,—putting imagination for thought and then discovering the impossibility of imagining everything—is what discourages so many and drives them to the supposition that there must be some value in mere mystery as such. I again submit that, if “the mysterious” is to be understood as the unsolvable and undiscoverable, there is no value in it whatever for the human soul.

“Let us,” says the writer of the article referred to, “not seek to minimize or decry the mysteriousness of God. Let us rather exalt it.” I would rather say, “Let us seek to minimize as far as possible all mysteries. By so doing we shall best serve mankind and ourselves. By so doing we shall most worthily and acceptably employ the powers which God has given us." One of the statements of the Episcopal service most offensive to me I have always felt to be the one that "God hath instituted holy mysteries," etc. But mysteries to be solved—to lead the soul of man on and stimulate him to endeavor by the hope of solving them—that is a very different affair. And in this view of mysteries as good things I can hardly doubt that the writer of "Christian Agnosticism" would, on reflection, agree with me.

An infinite number of things may be yet unknown, but is it not because God is really and truly knowable that we may have any relation to Him as moral beings, and is it not solely in the light of this divine truth about God that we can see any reason to call ourselves his children? "To follow on to know the Lord," I take to be the dictate of reason and based upon the truth that we are made in His image and capable of growing evermore into the knowledge of Him.

Quietness.

Now God be thanked for quietude!
For each serene and tranquil mood,
Each interval of calm wherein Strength for life's task and strife we win.

'Tis in such hours that thought has room
To lift its loveliest, holiest bloom;
Thence, in its deeds, the true soul brings
The fairest of life's blossomings.

Memorial Service of Rev. C. H. A. Dall.

Yesterday was the anniversary of the death of the Rev. C. H. A. Dall, and it was observed in a most becoming manner by his friends, admirers and pupils. The four Mission Schools—Dall's High School, the Hindoo Girls' School, the Rovers' School, and the Entally Middle Vernacular School—were closed out of respect to his memory. Early in the morning, quite a large number of students, about a dozen Hindoo girls, ex-pupils and Brahmo friends, assembled at the Unitarian Mission House in Dhurrumtollah, with flowers and garlands. At 7 A. M. the procession was formed. Mrs. Tomkins and Miss Moffat with the girls started first, and the students with their teachers and other gentlemen followed in procession on the lower circular road burial ground. One of the boys carried a trophy of flowers in the shape of a Hindoo temple. On arrival at the grave, the girls placed the wreaths around the railings, and the students then marched around the grave, throwing flowers and garlands. After a short interval, a Brahmo gentleman, Baboo Tincowry Mookerjee, offered up a prayer. Baboo Dwarka Nath Singha then stepped forward, and said: "I will now ask Baboo Sree Narain Mookerjee, one of the most devoted of friends of our dear departed, to plant by the grave a tree, the seed of which Mr. Dall brought from the grave of his beloved Washington on his last visit to America. I also now ask one and all of you to occasionally visit this spot, and bring with you a few of the flowers which Mr. Dall loved so much, and may each visit here recall to your minds the good and pure life of him, whose dust lies beneath, and give you renewed strength to try to follow the example and precepts of 'Dall the Good.'" The tree was then planted, and the boys sang a hymn composed especially for the occasion. Baboo Umesh Chunder Dutt, the minister of the Sadharan Brahmo Somaj, then addressed the assembly, dwelling on the catholic spirit of Mr. Dall, his paternal care of the students, his sympathy and support of all movements for the moral and religious welfare of the people of India, and his strong advocacy of the cause of temperance, and exhorted one and all to imitate him, and be a living memorial of Mr. Dall. He closed his address with prayer, the happy allusion during which to the rain, that was then falling in torrents as tears from heaven, moved every heart deeply, and there was scarcely one whose eyes were dry. Some 300 of Mr. Dall's pamphlets were distributed, and the assembly quietly dispersed. The whole scene was most affecting and solemn. It was perhaps for the first time that Hindoo girls have been allowed by their parents to tread a Christian burial ground. But it shows the affection and esteem in which Mr. Dall was regarded. It should be noted that the tomb, which has been paid from the Dall Memorial Fund, bears the following inscription: "This monument is erected by his admiring friends and loving pupils, as a mark of respect and affection which his self-denying, exemplary life, and earnest missionary labor inspired in all who knew him." There is also a Sanscrit verse inscribed upon the tomb.—Indian Daily News.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Comment and Criticism.

The Christian Leader comments on the alliance of the New Theology Herald with UNITY, and in a friendly spirit says of the latter paper: "It does not represent 'religious' thought at all—refuses to do so; its creed is simply ethical. It is willing to teach religion, but it will not represent it." It would seem to the average thinker that the best way to represent religion is to teach it. If the Leader has a better way, we shall be glad to adopt it.

Again, referring to Doctor Townsend's statement that "the Christlike character saves," the Leader says: "Nothing could be better, but UNITY would go to the stake before it would 'represent' anything with Christ in it, or even God." Considering the fact that UNITY has emphasized character above all else, the Leader's statement reads like a "lapsus styli."

The Universalist of Sept. 10, referring to the alliance says: "It is a very curious transfer, this of the organ of a New Theology to a journal that has no theology,—that excludes even a Christian Theism from the statement of its beliefs." Does UNITY exclude a statement of "Christian Theism" from its columns? If so, why does it make Doctor Townsend, who is an avowed "Christian Theist," one of its board of editors? Why does it not exact of Mr. Lauer a pledge not to teach certain "unstated" doctrines in its columns, before extending to him its official shears and paste pot? Does not the Universalist perceive that this alliance of UNITY with a paper which has avowedly stood for a "theology" is the strongest possible refutation of the charge that its undogmatism is born of agnosticism or unbelief?

The Universalist also says: "This identification of Doctor Townsend and his paper with the non-Theistic and non-Christian Unitarians will probably end, as it should end, all participation of Universalists hereafter in the Lakeside School at Chautauqua, and will also, no doubt, cause the withdrawal of such Unitarians as Doctors Peabody and Hill from that platform." Is Universalism so narrow that it can not speak from the same platform with a man who refuses to build a barbed wire fence of creed about his deepest beliefs? Are Universalists so weak that they can not trust their truths in an atmosphere which vibrates even with doctrines hostile to their own? God forbid! The Lakeside School was founded to furnish a platform for the utterance of men's noblest thought. Because it was founded to encourage the development of a broader theology, must it place a limit to that growth by excluding from its platform all whose beliefs are not already crystallized into a certain form? If Christianity is worthy of belief, will it be injured by the words of those who do not limit its meaning to certain statements? If there is a God in the Universe does He need to be advertised at every summer camp meeting to insure belief in His existence? Nobody has yet lectured at the Lakeside School who does not believe in the existence of a Supreme Power; yet we trust that no one has lectured there who would not hold any new truth more dear than his most cherished beliefs. The Universalist, in this criticism, evinces somewhat of that spirit of exclusiveness and intolerance which has caused so much of suffering to all progressive thinkers in the past. Experience should have taught a better way.

TO THE EDITOR OF UNITY:—I would like to ask a little space in the columns of your paper, to tell your readers about the "Country Week," which was started in a small way in Unity Church Industrial School this summer, and to acknowledge with thanks the kindness of those who have aided us in carrying it out. When the hot weather in July came, we felt that we must give as many of our children as we could a breath of the fresh air and a glimpse of country life. Many of them had never ridden in the cars, had never been in the country, and of course knew nothing of its pleasures. The result of our efforts has been the sending of twenty-one children for a week or ten days to friends in the near neighborhood. Besides these, six families of young children, with their mothers, were sent to Highwood. They came back full of delight at what they had seen and done. They told of the rides in the hay carts, the animals, the flowers, the bathing in the lake, the new clothes which had been given to them, and the kindness of all their entertainers. For all these pleasures they would like to join us in thanking Mrs. Mann, Geneva, Ill.; Mrs. C. L. Davis and Miss Eva F. Davis, LaFox; Mrs. C. H. Larkin, Elgin, Ill.; Mrs. Carr, Batavia, Ill.; Mrs. West, Winnetka, Ill.; Mrs. Millar, Argyle Park; and the three families in Rockford, where six children were sent by the Charity Organization Society. Hoping that next summer this small beginning may grow large enough to include the whole school, I am, your friend, truly,

C. D. ADAMS,
Secretary Unity Church Industrial School.

If That Was Dishonest, Isn't This?

DEAR UNITY:—In a recent number J. V. B. has a discussion of the question whether it was honest for a bibliophile to buy for ten cents a book he knew to be worth $500, and concluding that it was not. I am inclined to agree that the bibliophile did take a mean advantage of the bookstall keeper; but, having admitted that, I can see no stop before getting to Ruskin, Count Tolstoi and the sermon on the mount. And yet I have never found any one in all this Christian civilization of ours so simple as to think Christ meant what he said. Can J. V. B. tell me the essential differences between the case cited and these: Knowing that grain will be very dear the coming winter, A. B. buys all he can of farmers who do not look ahead, borrowing money at eight per cent of M. N., who does not realize his opportunity, and in the spring sells for 50 per cent more than he paid, returning to M. N. his eight per cent with which he has gained 42 per cent. Or this: My neighbor has to pay his rent or be turned out of his house. Knowing that I have to spare, he comes to me and borrows $100, and by pinching is enabled to pay me back $106 the year after.

THE HOME.

A Wedding in the Garden.

There's a party in the garden; have you had an invitation?
Yes, the great Sir Tiger Lily is to wed My Lady Rose.
It's the marriage of the season, for, in name and reputation,
Both the high contracting parties equal any flower that grows.

And they've summoned to attend it all the loveliest, stateliest flowers,
And the bobolinks and thrushes are to sing a matinee;
So the blossoms all are trooping to the leafy, fragrant bowers
Where the wedding-feast is set forth in magnificent array.

Shy arbutus from the woodlands, violets for little pages,
Asters tall, and stately zinnias, bursting in their pompous pride;
Honey-suckles, sweet and clinging, sunflowers, looking wise as sages,
And, for priest, a Calla Lilly, portly and self-satisfied.

Dainty balsams and verbenas, mignonette, so shy and tender,
Gladioli, stiff, unbending, keeping order in the place;
And, for bridesmaids for My Lady, white-robed lilies, tall and slender, Gliding swiftly to their stations, bowing with exquisite grace.

Gay, old-fashioned pinks and larkspur, with the quaintest of demeanor,
Sweet wild roses,—country cousins!—drooping Canterbury bells;
Morning-glories, bright and saucy, heartsease,—timid little dreamer!—
Buttercups and nodding daisies, marching upward from the dells.

All the birds are gath'ring swiftly, flying lightly to their places,
Perching on the leafy tree-tops, talking o'er the gala day;
Getting up some mild flirtations, showing off their pretty graces,
Gossiping about their neighbors, just to pass the time away.

But, because Sir Tiger Lily can't endure his vulgar humming,
They have sent no invitation to their friend, the Bumble-bee;
And the slight has made him furious, and he vows that he is coming,
And he'll pay them for their rudeness with a loud charivari.

Hark! I hear the bluebells chiming, ringing out the wedding peal,
And a hush, profound, expectant, settles o'er the waiting throng;
Listen! softly on the breezes floats the chorus hymeneal,
As the birds pour out their voices in a grand, triumphal song.

Child Philosophy.

A little girl had some new shoes which were stiff and hard, after the manner of new shoes. When the little maiden drew them off at night, she exclaimed with a sigh of relief, "Oh, how good new shoes feel when they're off!" Being a hearer of this naive bit of wisdom, I fell to thinking of it as more than a childish oddity of language. Truly is there not such a thing as feeling things and thinking of things when "they're off?" and is not this the part of a grateful and lowly spirit? There is a deep philosophy of enjoyment in thinking of things both when they're on and when they're off. The wisdom and philosophy is this—enjoy pleasures when they're on and enjoy pains when they're off. Now, if this be considered, it is the condition of all enjoyment; for it is not easy to enjoy a pleasure when it's off, and quite impossible to enjoy a pain when it's on. How, then, can we enjoy at all, and especially how can we enjoy the whole of life and press virtue and happiness from the whole, unless we enjoy the two kinds of things at their right times, namely, pleasures when they're on and pains when they're off? Yet, how contrary to the wisdom of the little child most of us go! "Pleasures brighten as they take their flight," says the poet. Sad, very sad! The world is full of whimpers, cries, and groans after "off" joys which but little we rejoiced in when they were on; likewise full of howls and writhings over pains and diseases which yielded no pleasure when they were off, but moanings and roarings enough when they are on. Now, did ever any one who had drained deeply a joy when it was on, and tasted it with great gratitude of soul, ever bewail it with murmurs, scowls, dirges or bellowings when it came to an end? I can not tell, but I think not. For when any one has been faithful to a joy, it is so faithful to him that it leaves a store of comfort and peace with him when it departs. And, contrariwise, they that find happiness because a pain is off, and think how good that it is off, are they who take it quietly, without whining or howling, when it comes on.

But now, how are we to rejoice in a pain when it is off? For this is a point to be thought of, since I have observed that many persons think they do this when they rejoice that they are not in pain like others, as the publican gave thanks that he was not "like other men." But this is a wrong way, and will not make the heart soft. Surely it is but hardhearted, when we witness pain, loss and grief, to turn it to joy because we have escaped; and it is but a selfish road to contentment which many preach, namely, to bethink us how many are worse off than we are. For the right way is not to be pleased because we have less pain than others, but to be pained that others suffer more than we. But how, then, shall we enjoy a pain when it is off? Why, thus, indeed—we are to enjoy our own pains by thinking of them with joy that now we feel them no more. This may be a very wholesome and grateful rejoicing. For if sometimes many pleasures be removed, and troubles, difficulties, struggles, come to take their place, or if it be within us a kind of dull day—not night, not sunshine—then if we bethink us that once we were sick and now well, once weak and now strong, once in pain and now whole, these thoughts will be good food for the soul, and we shall make a joy out of pains that are off.

The Bread-Words of God.

SERMON BY REV. JAMES G. TOWNSEND, D. D.

"Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God."—Matt. 4: 4.

Some words are transient and local—for the hour and for the few. Some words are permanent and universal, for all times and for all. Of this latter class are those words of the Great Teacher, "Man shall not live by bread alone." They touch the lowest depths and the profoundest heights of our nature. In all literature I know no sentence which can compare with it in philosophical and ethical insight.

How clearly it recognizes the wants of human nature. Man is a creature of many mouths. Man should not live by bread alone—he has more than his physical nature that must be fed. That thought is but a shallow will, which sees in man only the necessity of material things. Oh, say some, "give man a soft bed, a tight roof and a large bank account and you compass his wants." But do you? Here is a man who sits at a banquet, eating and drinking until he is surfeited. You say, "His mouth and stomach measure him." But the next morning he is at business and takes hold of it with a grasp that does not relax until ten at night. In any measurement of him you must take into account these industrial desires, this money-making propensity.

Have you yet fully measured him? See him as he stands over the bed whereon lies a sick child. Day and night find him there. No call of business is as loud as the faint moan of his child. When at last the child is carried out and laid under the flowers this man sadly picks up again the scattered threads of business, but if you were to look into his heart you would see a wound that every day bleeds fresh blood. But have you sounded all the notes in the gamut of his nature?

See the same man as he looks upon the hills fired by the flames of the setting sun! A glow falls upon his face as if some Ariel were touching his features with light. He is passing through the gate Beautiful, and you have not measured him if you do not take into your account this passionate desire.

See him again in the shadows of the forest, as he forgets hunger and weariness in his search. Search for what? That he may discover the nest and learn the habits of the strange bird which he has been watching for a week. The man is not measured until you recognize his profound desire for knowledge.

Listen to his reply to an expostulating voice. "Why do you take a course which will bring you so much misery?" How firm comes back the voice, "Because it is right and I can do no other." Can he be measured without taking into account that august element we call conscience?

Finally see this man as he kneels in the darkness, sobs roll like waves out of his soul as he cries, "Oh, thou, Great Silence, speak to me." Can man be measured without including this aspiration of the Infinite?

I say again, man is a creature of many mouths. The dullest lump of apathetic clay, at times desires more than bread. The heart hungers for affection, the imagination for beauty, the mind for truth, the conscience for right, the soul for God.

But as man is a creature of many mouths God is a being of many words. He feeds every mouth which he has made. For the physical mouth of man what ample provisions has he made. We look with careless eye often at the material foods as common things. But the rosy apple, the yellow peach, the white turnip, the leafy cabbage, the earth colored potato, the golden pumpkin, the grains, wheat, corn, rye, oats, barley, millet,—what are these common fruits or grains but bread words of God, gifts of his beneficence.

There is too that grace which is on all things of use—that quality we call beauty. Plus the useful there is the beautiful to feed the eye and the imagination. I lingered a long time at the fair the other day before the display of apples, and I could not but think how much they feed the eye. That stand was a parterre of beauty, each apple was a globe of rarest color. What lines and curves! The apples there told more of form and color than all the painters and sculptors in the world know. If the fruit which hangs on the Tree of Life in Heaven is more beautiful than they, our eyes will have to be attuned to the sight or we shall go blind. But more than all the beauty we see about us—the changing grass, the golden dandelions, the humble mallows and mayweed, the dust of the street, the gray and white pebbles, the distant hills smoothed into wondrous form, the flying clouds struck through with crimson, the flaming sun—what are all these but bread words to feed our want for beauty on.

And the wondrous beauty of the human face (and every face is beautiful unless made ugly by passion), is not that God's bread word too? We pass by human faces and read nothing therein. A great portrait painter when he was asked if he did not find many faces which were totally uninteresting to him said: "I never had to paint a face which did not possess lines and meanings beyond my power to seize and portray."

How the thought flashes out upon the future. Seems "To come and go with tidings from the heart,

As it a running messenger had been."

Another word upon which God feeds us is the bread-word of affection. We often speak lightly of father, mother, brother, sister, husband, wife, child, forgetting the profound meaning of those relationships. We forget that their pure love is Heaven's bread on which we are to nourish our hearts. A little child in the home is a message immediate of the kingdom of heaven. There is more sustenance in the kiss of a child than a banquet set before a king. And when the child has slipped out of our arms, to kiss even in memory the lips which have withered in death is better than to fill our hands with gold.

God also feeds us on his words which he speaks through the lips of philosophers, poets and prophets. The high utterances of Moses, Buddha, Isaiah, John, Paul, Luther, Dante, Milton, Shakespeare, Goethe, are divine bread-words to feed our intellectual and moral nature. More clearly and potentially has God spoken through Christ. "In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and the word was God." This is not poetry, this is not miracle, it is the natural order of things. Christ is God's best word to man. In Christ humanity was so clarified, so transparent, that the Divine shone through. Christ was the liquid syllable of the divine speech. In Him humanity blossomed until it bore the very perfume of heaven.

"Blessed are the pure at heart; for they shall see God." "Be ye therefore perfect even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect." "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word which proceedeth out of the mouth of God"—these and other great words seem to chime with the music of everlasting Truth—they are the bread-words of humanity!

But you ask, "Will God speak immediately to me?" How freely Christ confessed that he had no monopoly of the divine gift. "Ask and it shall be given you, Seek and ye shall find, Knock and it shall be opened unto you." Some souls are rivers, some are rills, but there is no soul so small but it may be a channel of the Divine. That impulse, to be better, that tender feeling, that uplifting of courage, that voice you heard when no one was near, that touch that thrilled you, was it not God?

This, then, is our high privilege to live upon every word of God, his word material, his word mental, his word spiritual. We are to drain, so to speak, the udders of the universe. There is no cup of joy, beauty, inspiration, to which we may not put our lips. But is not this the picture of a selfish life? No, far from it. Here is an enjoyment from which none are shut out by the amount you take. Why should you be miserable in your goodness? The highest goodness is to enjoy. Joy radiates a ray from a happy heart, disperses a cloud which hangs over the heart of another. When you feel delight in art, in beauty, in affection, you help lift off the sorrow of the world. The kiss of the child goes through the heart of the father and through all hearts which the father touches. Disavow forever the belief that to be miserable is to be good. Happiness is goodness. Man may live on every moral which proceedeth out of the mouth of God, for all his words are good and happy words.

We come now naturally to the true meaning of what living is. Living is the normal activity of our whole nature. He who lives least is he who uses the least of his nature. He who lives most is he who uses most of his nature. Here, for example, is the inebriate who uses only his stomach. His life is a single path from his home to the saloon. How narrow his life. Here is a man whose engrossing thought is the gratification of his sensual nature. How narrow his life. And the man who turns all his desires to personal ease and comfort,—what a small circle does he live in? How much larger is the life of one who satisfies every part of his nature, feeds his heart on affection, his mind on truth, his imagination with beauty, feeds every mouth of his nature, breakfasts on the morning light and sups upon the stars.

Some men's lives are the vibration of a single string and that a base one. Other men's lives are great organs on which the hands of the universe play sublime melodies. What a narrow life that woman lives whose ideal is fashion, whose belief is a fashion, whose religion is a fashion! Compare her life with this woman who lives in a humble home, but who has learned to drink from the deep well of affection, who delights ever in her menial work, who knows how to make Longfellow and Tennyson sing for her, who is made happy at the sight of a flower, and in her hours of meditation and prayer holds high converse with God.

What a narrow life does that man live who feeds himself on pride and prejudice, this one who nurses his jealousies and whose meal is fault-finding, or this one whose thoughts circle around his desire for a soft place, wherein he may escape the burden of life. Life narrowed to a point is not life. Life is in the quality and breadth of feeling, and that man lives whose moral and intellectual hand stretches over the continents, down into the depths, up into the heights and brings the treasures of the universe to him.

Here we see the operation of a great law—namely, that the soul grows like what it feeds on. Let me know the outward and inward life of a man, where he goes, the companionship he seeks, the conversation he listens to, the books he reads, the paths in which his thoughts travel and I will paint his moral portrait for you. I know the man. For if the soul feeds on lust it grows lustful, if on trivialities it grows trivial, if on flattery it grows vain, if on the earth it grows earthy. But if the man feeds on broad sympathies, pastures in wide fields of thought, lives upon the grand bread-words of God, his soul grows broad, beautiful, rhythmical as the oak which sucks up the juices of an acre into its mighty mouth.

But this thought grows deeper. We are very apt to overrate the influence of what we call blood. We say of a child or of a man, "Oh, you can't make anything of him, you can't make a silk purse out of a sow's ear." This is arrogant nonsense when applied to a man. Look what a transformation you can make in a plant or animal by giving it rich and nourishing food. Take the the commonest cattle and give them good food and kind treatment and in a few generations you have an improved race, you make a necessity for a new herd book.

But what you do for a race of animals you can do for the individual man, or the man can do for himself. The soul responds to the bread it feeds on. What a narrow, petty, trivial, inch deep nature was that of Rosamond Vincy. Rosamond Vincy was a prudent negative Becky Sharpe, but under the influence of Dorothea's generous womanhood she rose up to a high emotion and resolution. Take any child and put it in a home where there are no petty quarrels, mean selfishness, trivial aims, corruptions, coarseness, but where the life is large, rich, pure, and the child will, in almost every case, take of the quality of that life. If you were to ask me for a complete definition of man, I should give it in one word, Sympathy—the sympathy of things. He takes that which he touches. If he touches the earth, he's earthly; if he touches the heavenly, he's heavenly. If he touches God, he is Divine. Let beauty thrill him, he becomes a poem; let music he is an oratorio. Let prayer, and his soul becomes an altar whereon burn the heavenly flames.

We can here see the divine method by which we can conquer the vile hungers of the flesh. See the tiger feeding with ferocious greed upon the body of his victim. We all have the tiger passions for drink, for lust, for gain or for selfish advancement. How shall we quell them? The more we feed them the more vile and ferocious they grow. There is but one way, by getting the taste of the better bread in our mouths. When we have tried the better we do not care to go back to the old way. We would not go back to the customs of our forefathers of a couple of centuries back. Then the tables, even of the best families, were usually rough boards. There were no table cloths. Ladies rarely and gentlemen never possessed a handkerchief. The food was usually piled upon the bare board before each guest, the board not often washed. If there were plates, two persons, a lady and a gentleman, ate off one plate, and as forks were unknown, they ate with their fingers, not over clean. We who have the cleanly convenience of the modern table, even at the most plain meal, do not wish to go back to the customs of forefathers.

This is true in all our life. When we rise to better things, when we taste that which is good, these vile hungers no longer gnaw in the passions. He who feeds his heart on the pure joys of affection will not care to feed on the carrion of lust. He who enters the wide zones of honesty will not care to go back to the narrow places of lies and deceit. How can one who has fed upon the bread-words of God go back to feed upon the stones? He who has tasted the seeds of liberty, will he care for the dark prison houses of slavery. He that hath the pearl will not exchange it for the pebble. He that once lives dreads most of all that he should again die.

How is it with you, my brothers and sisters? Is your life coarse, unclean, narrow, or broad as the zones of knowledge?

Have you quenched all your vile hungers and learned to love the good bread of God? Is your life so real and true that you feel it must be for ever? There is no proof of another life like living nobly in this. The certainty of the Hereafter is in the grandeur, the beauty and the glory of the Here.

George Eliot has said, with deep penetration, "We can begin to do many things with a new person—even begin to be a better man."

Perhaps in this sacred hour we, in the vision of a great truth, may begin to rise to its meaning, begin to incarnate it in our lives.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Chicago.—The Union Teachers' Meeting, on Monday, at noon, September 19. Fourteen present. The lesson was the second chapter of Luke, the story of the birth and childhood of Jesus. Mr. Utter, the leader, said the story of the taxing could not be explained in conformity with facts, or so as to save Luke's accuracy. The Romans did not decree a universal taxation but made requisitions on the rulers of tributary provinces and left them to get the money as they chose. Besides, why should Joseph and Mary go to a city where they had no property? The reason and purpose of the story is plain, namely to have Jesus born in a Davidical city. Luke throughout seems so to shape the narrative as to make Jesus fulfill as much as possible the ancient biblical prophecies. We should tell the children in a wise and careful way that the story is mythical and that it was made a long time afterward, because Jesus was so great and good that it seemed to men he must have had a wonderful birth.

Directors' Meeting of the W. W. U. C.—The third meeting of the board of directors of the W. W. U. C. was held Thursday, Sept. 1, at the headquarters, 175 Dearborn street. Present, Mrs. West in the chair, Mrs. Jennings, of La Porte, Ind., Mrs. Brown, of Hinsdale, Ill., Mrs. Dow, Mrs. Hilton, Mrs. Marean, Miss Hilton, of Chicago. The reports of secretary and treasurer were read and accepted. Letters were read from Wichita, Kansas; Sioux Falls, Dakota; Princeton, Ill., and from three of the state directors—Mrs. Dinsmore, of Nebraska, Mrs. Hiscock, of Colorado, and Mrs. Savage, of Wisconsin. In both Wichita and Madison, Dakota, there are movements almost ripe for organization. Leaders to focus the interest into a society is all that seems needed. From Princeton comes encouraging report of an organization, with about forty signatures to the bond of fellowship, which has been holding regular services for two months, with an attendance of from forty to seventy persons. Mrs. Richardson adds in her letter: "This is woman's work, and we feel very happy at the outlook. . . . There are hundreds of little towns all over Illinois where just such little circles are possible. All the people need is the determination to try." We wish this good word might be caught up and acted upon by many groups of friends throughout the west. In behalf of the Indian work Mrs. Jones moved the following resolution: Resolved, That Mrs. Dow write Mr. Bond and inquire into his most pressing need, and report the same in UNITY with a call for help. Mrs. Jones, chairman of the, Temperance committee, moved: That the Woman's Conference recommends that the Sunday-schools of the Unitarian churches hold special temperance services at stated times during the year,—which was carried. Mrs. Marean, chairman of Foreign Mission committee, stated that she had been in correspondence with the Pundita Ramabai, with the hope of arranging for her to be present at the regular meeting of the Woman's Association of Chicago when the paper on Foreign Missions would be given, that she might emphasize the need for help among the women of India. But the pressing need of the conference at present is more money to carry on the Post-office Mission. Memberships to the conference are solicited. A motion to adjourn was made and carried.

FLORENCE HILTON, Secretary.

Philadelphia.—Morse has made a head of Carlyle in which is portrayed the rugged sweetness of a man whose most frequent portraits emphasize simply a partial view of his character, and that the one we could least like. —Clifford, Mangasarian and Haskell are back in their pulpits again.

—The plan of the school of the Ethical Society has been extended so as to include larger children and ampler studies. Miss Demmon, of Boston, is to be among the teachers the coming season, and it is probable that Morse will have charge of the class in modeling.

—The question of the observance of Sunday is very much agitated here just now, with the Germans mostly, to offset the extreme thought of the orthodox preachers, and the Bible is ludicrously quoted to sustain both sides.

—Mr. Ames has not yet returned to the city, but his people continue their informal Sunday gatherings.

—Mangasarian is preaching a series of national sermons.

—The president of the Camden city council is, I believe, president of the Unitarian society of that city as well.

—It is probable the contemporary club will take up some of the great religious and social questions for discussion through the series of meetings that commence with November. Conway, George and Flske are among the possible speakers.

—Morse has done so much good work since he came here in the spring that it affords one satisfaction to say that Chicago people who are interested in such things may soon have an opportunity, through some arrangement he is now perfecting, to examine the results for themselves. H. L. T.

The Pacific Slope.—The Unitarian club and church at Oakland are growing in numbers and influence and moving towards a church edifice.

—Green, in Tacoma, W. T., has broken ground for his new chapel to be finished by Christmas.

—Wheelock in Spokane Falls, reports a fine lot secured and a church building in prospect.

—Los Angeles is still wrestling with a building enterprise. They have large plans and that makes it come harder.

—Santa Barbara owns a church lot which cost $3500 two years ago, is now held at $20,000.

—The Jewish Society Emanuel in San Francisco have generously offered the Sunday use of their temple to the Unitarian society while the latter's new church is building, and it has been accepted.

—Rev. Chas. W. Wendte recently lectured before the literary and social association of Emanuel Temple.

—This same tireless missionary has lately been much interested in high license for Oakland. It was carried at the polls but the saloon keepers bought up the council. The end is not yet.

Minnesota.—J. R. Effinger, western secretary, spent Sunday last in Minneapolis, preaching in the morning for Mr. Simpolla. The congregation was large and inspiring, filling the fine auditorium and overflowing into the galleries. Late comers dropped into easy chairs in the parlors, within range of the pulpit. The parlors are so commodious that a hundred people may be thus seated. The admirable church building already filled with its eager congregation, is a noble testimonial to the ability and faithfulness of a devoted minister and an augury of good to the denomination he represents. In the evening came heart refreshings with old friends and fellow workers in St. Paul, and a glimpse at Unity church committees, with their heads together in earnest consultation over plans of work for the coming fall and winter. Mr. Crothers is beloved by the people and is interested in all methods of aggressive missionary work. It but remains for the Minnesota brethren to organize a state conference, with the come-to-stay feeling, man the field with a good minister-at-large, stand generously at his back, and begin to build up the waste places. West St. Paul, with its twelve or fifteen thousand people, should soon be made the center of a new Unitarian movement. A state conference, once an established fact, would tell helpfully upon the movements already started at Duluth, Winona and Luverne, and would soon awaken a kindred interest at other points. We rejoice in the encouraging outlook for the liberal cause in Minnesota.

Boston Notes.—At Meadville, during the summer, the number of students belonging to the next graduating class has been reduced, the hope being to send out the usual sized class with a higher grade of ability than ever before. Professor Barber tarries at the east till the time of fall opening, advancing the interests of his school. Rev. N. Green, of Mottram, Ceshire, England, who is upon a tour of study of our eastern and western methods, preached last Sunday very acceptably in the Meadville pulpit. Students entering the school the present fall will be given unusually good advantages of training.

—The work of the Boston churches the coming winter is hoped to be continued, theater preaching for five months, possibly additional services at a south end theater, young people's services under auspices of the young men's "Channing Club," hotel advertising of Sunday services, opening of the Boston "Toynbee Hall" project, lectures in Channing Hall to parents and Sunday-school teachers, offered by the Sunday-school Association, special effort to inaugurate the Japanese mission, an effort to unite more closely the practical work in New England of Universalists and Unitarians, the eagerly expected benefit from the work of the National Bureau of Unity Clubs, besides usual courses of sermons in our city churches.

An Experiment.—In the Davenport society one of the members tried the experiment of sending sermons—two or more at a time—to the stay-at-home people through the ten weeks' vacation, and found the sending forth an easier matter than the calls would have been, while undoubtedly the sermons carried more of the outlooking and uplifting spirit so hard to attain in the heat and dust of July and August, than one personality could possibly have given.

287 Unity short tracts were used.

136 Unity mission tracts.

54 A. U. A. tracts.

9 miscellaneous sermons.

Total, 486.

Uneliminated Savagery.—The trail of the serpent is still upon the man, the beast from which we came is still in active conflict with the angel towards which we are tending in every human soul. In illustration of the above, we clip from a newspaper the following item concerning an English nobleman: "Lord Eversley, at ninety-four years old, is still a sprightly and active man, in body and mind. He is as close a student of current politics as when he was Speaker of the House, thirty odd years ago, and as keen a sportsman as ever, as may be inferred from the fact that he has just been purchasing a brace of breech-loading guns containing all the modern improvements invented by men born since he passed

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION

VOLUME XX.]

CHICAGO, OCTOBER 1, 1887.

[NUMBER 5.]

EDITORIAL.

AT Portland, Ind., the Presbyterians were very much disturbed by the thought of a Unitarian occupying their church, but finally concluded Unitarians could not be worse than Universalists, so they resolved to run the risk. Another lady told the missionary she expected to be awfully bored, but said all were disappointed. All risked a second service and wanted more.

THE O. B. W. Weekly thus balances the temperance equation:

"We have the drinking men on our side; we have the foreign element on our side; and we have the money on our side; and money is a power, and don't you forget it!"—A Liquor Dealer.

"We have the sober men on our side; we have the women on our side; and we have God on our side; and God is a power, 'and don't you forget it!'"—John P. St. John.

THE Gospel Banner has some good things to say about the minister's wife. It says: "Doubly blessed is the true minister who has a wife well adapted to him and to his work. Such a woman can do an invaluable work in connection with his labors. But no parish should consider that it calls his wife when it settles a minister. No exacting duties should be marked out for her. She should be as free as any in the parish in these matters. Yet such a woman will do all that can be reasonably asked of her. She knows her place in church work as in home work and in social duties. Freedom she must have.

IN one of the many noble and well deserved tributes that have been paid to the late Dr. Mark Hopkins, the writer says: "He was one of those rare beings whose life, while revealing the possibilities of human nature, has rendered more easy of comprehension the problem of the divine incarnation in the person of Jesus." A noble and suggestive tribute! It is the divine in our life that helps us to see and interpret the divine in another. The Christ life is reflected in all holy lives. The "divine incarnation" is not limited to a single child of the All-father, to one "only" son. That high doctrine which has found its partial utterance in the deification of Jesus, is slowly orbiting itself in the larger thought, which is its logical outcome, namely, the divine incarnation in Man. Every noble life is a key to this mystery, a visible commentary on the larger scripture.

AN educational institution in the east is said to have originated this method of raising funds: "Four persons, each taking the letter 'A' to identify himself, paid in ten cents each and undertook to secure four other persons, lettered 'B,' who should give ten cents each, and they in turn should find four others to do the same, and so on, continuing the arithmetical progression through the alphabet." It is the many little sums that make the large sums. The Roman Catholic churches in this country, with their charities, are very largely supported by the multiplied small contributions. The Methodists, of all our Protestant churches, best understand the secret of this. The average church financiering, however, will not "waste time" in gathering the little gifts. To the ordinary business man, used to accounts on a larger scale, the dimes are scarcely worth the collecting. The "free seat" system has failed financially in some experiments for lack of more exact method and appreciation of these little gifts. But the combined gifts of fifty are of more value than the same sum from five, if only they mean the interest and good-will of ten times as many. Of course it means more work for somebody, but no good thing is brought about or long sustained in this world apart from somebody's labor.

IN reading a recent editorial in a certain religious journal, marked by very ill-considered personalities, we were reminded of a remark once made in our presence by the minister of one of the leading orthodox congregational churches in the west. The minister had just received and read a note from a fellow-minister touching some local denominational matter, wherein the manifestly intended sting was but poorly concealed under the endearing address. "There," said the man, "I never knew a minister who had some spiteful and mean thing to say to another who didn't begin with 'dear brother' and end with 'your brother in Christ.' Brotherhood is better shown in brotherly courtesy and consideration than in 'brother'-ing another's name, and cant can taint the best words.

MRS. WOOLLEY, in "Love and Theology," tells us that at Dennison theological amity had proceeded so far that the three church bells in the village had been selected so that their pitch would harmonize one with the other, so that when they were sounded together of a Sunday morning there was, instead of discord, a melodious chord. This is a hint for those who would work for unity in religion. Our dream is not a monotone in religion, but harmony; not uniformity of thought and organization, but complexity, looking toward the same end,—the perfection of life. Let each church bell have its individual tone to emphasize, but let it also willingly contribute its notes in that grander chord, which can not be sounded, except through the help of all the bells of all the churches in Christendom and out of christendom.

WE clip from an exchange this interesting paragraph about Henry Ward Beecher's library, which is soon to be scattered under the hammer of the auctioneer: "It is a large collection, and those who have examined it find that it abounds in poetry, history, philosophy, ethics, and works on religious subjects. There are numerous flat table books filled with engravings. Not a few of these are representations of statuary, both ancient and modern. There is a noticeable absence of novels. Even his own production, 'Norwood,' has no place in the collection. There are few Greek or Latin books. The poetical works show signs of usage. Singularly enough, although there are several dictionaries, this can not be said of them. There are Bibles and hymn books by the score, many of them bearing inscriptions to indicate that they were presents from admirers or friends. The historical works form the greater part of the library, and appear to have been often consulted."

THE colored preacher, John Jasper, is reported to have preached his sermon on "The Sun Do Move" nearly one hundred times since he first gave it to his congregation, in 1878. He is reported as saying that he has had large offers from all over the country, and even from across the ocean, to come and give this "sermon;" that a man in London once offered him $400. We suppose Mr. Jasper to be thoroughly sincere in his peculiar ideas, and we doubt not that along with these "scientific" views he gives to his own people much helpful exhortation and instruction bearing upon their daily life. In all this he deserves respect. But what shall we say of people who do not believe at all what he is preaching as conviction, and take him up only to furnish amusement, or as a financial venture? It reveals a curious and rather unpleasant aspect of human nature. If such motives, as we suspect, lay behind some of these offers, it seems to us both a mocking at truth and a mocking at humanity. It suggests that sneer which Jesus thought worse than anger, and for which the punishment typified in the fire of Gehenna seemed to him none too severe.

NOT to anticipate the fuller word of criticism and review which in due time UNITY will give, we cannot delay our word of welcome to Mrs. Woolley's new story, "Love and Theology." Our readers will welcome it as the first book from the hand of one of our own staff, whose name and word, both in prose and poetry, they have long been familiar with. They will welcome the book as a prophetic venture in literature, the bold utilizing of the deeper heart material, as well as the thought material of to-day, which, now as always, gathers around religious questions and artistic and literary problems. We know enough about this book, both in its growth and completion, to say confidently that the reader will find in it a vivid reflection of the sincere gropings toward "sweetness and light" through which people are passing all around us. When the liberal thought becomes fluid enough to flow into poetic, artistic and literary moulds, then it will be gospel thought, it will have life shaping potency. Of the literary qualities of this book we do not now speak, although we know it to be toothsome. But of its ethical and religious importance, we are glad to give this prompt hint, that our readers may lose no time in securing it. Will those who read it tell us what they think of it,—not necessarily for print.

More Editorial Wanderings.

The last number of UNITY was edited on wheels. On Thursday, 15th, 8 P. M., the senior left the center of things in the west on the Chicago & Atlantic railway, and found himself twelve hours later at Akron, Ohio, the city famed for oatmeal, sewer pipes, Buckeye reapers and mowers, and last, but not least, Buchtel college. This last was the occasion of our halt of twenty-four hours. The unmistakable signs of prosperity are manifested everywhere. A trim campus with its flower beds, closely shaven lawn and sidewalks; inside the building, cleanly rooms, carpeted halls and tidy class-rooms bespoke not only prosperity, but the presence of ladies, which always dispels the barn-like dreariness and barracks-like coarseness of the colleges into which only boys are admitted. Last year there were 369 in attendance upon all the departments, about one-half of them ladies. This year there will be an increase. The faculty, with Dr. Cone at its head, consists of twenty-three gentlemen and ladies, and seems to be alive, progressive, enthusiastic and able. This college is under the management of the Universalist convention of the state of Ohio. But, as a Universalist college ought to be, it is in fact a non-sectarian school where "religious opinions are respected but not taught." The historical interest of the college centers about the generosity of its chief benefactor, whose name it bears. Mr. Buchtel would be best known to our western farmers as the Buckeye reaper man, but he will be known to future generations as the man who labored hard and successfully, and gave his all to the good of mankind in this college. First and last his benefactions to the college will amount to about a quarter of a million. The result already is a wholesome college doing genuine work, exerting a great influence upon the pretty city and surrounding country, and offering good privileges at very low prices. To those who are seeking an unsectarian atmosphere in which to educate their boys and girls at much less cost in money than the larger universities of the land demand, Buchtel college commends itself. Friday evening the lower chapel was filled by students and citizens to listen to a lecture on "The Cost of an Idea," by the Chicago editor.

Saturday morning we were on wheels again, editing UNITY en route. At 4 P. M. we arrived at Jamestown, the objective point of this ramble. We came to exchange with Doctor Townsend, of the Independent church and the "New School of Theology." A half hour later who meets us at the parsonage door but the heretical doctor himself! Somebody has blundered. He thought it was to be a week later. Where the blunder lies we will never tell in UNITY. But here we were, Chicago and the expectant pulpit six hundred miles away, and both preachers at one end of the line. Saturday, 5 P. M., telephone, telegraph, carriage and a parishioner or two were called into hurried assistance, and in thirty-five minutes the doctor was off on a local branch road to head off the limited express on the Lake Shore road which reached Chicago at 9:55 Sunday morning.

Sunday two full congregations gathered in the handsome auditorium, which seats upwards of 500 people. The old Methodist church has been improved and renewed as much as the theology of the minister who once stood in its pulpit as a Methodist, now as an independent, representing the broader fellowship and the larger hope.

A bright Sunday-school of 175 children in ample rooms, in the vestry a new $4000 organ, all bespoke the vitality of the new movement. The day was perfect, the welcome to the stranger was cordial. But we were all wondering whether the doctor got there in time!

Monday evening another good congregation met at the Independent church, in Jamestown, to listen to a lecture on "George Eliot, and her Writings." Five hours of Tuesday were spent at Meadville; just long enough to shake hands with a few of the returning students and to meet on the steps of the Unitarian church the first fruits in the direction of theological student, of All Souls church Post-office Mission, and to learn that on the Sunday previous he sought the editor in his own pulpit, and found instead Doctor Townsend, who did get there on time. The prospects are for full classes at the theological school. The hard seats are going out of the school chapel, more comfortable ones going in. The church organ is being moved down stairs and other signs of prosperity are visible.

What is the matter with the Erie railroad system? Has Jay Gould too little money? The train on his controlled lines was late as usual, and instead of being in Chicago at eight o'clock it was nearly one in the afternoon when we arrived on Wednesday; but we were in time to spend an afternoon with the brethren in social fellowship and council with Doctor Townsend, the man who preached two tender, earnest sermons in the pulpit of All Souls, and who left an impression as of one who has resources. On the evening of that day he bade us "good-bye" with the assurance that the bands of fellowship had been tightened, his confidence in UNITY, its cause and its representatives strengthened and his purpose to co-operate deepened. So ends another "wandering" of the editor.

We Appeal to the Governor.

When the final decision of the Supreme Court of Illinois that confirmed the doom of the sentenced anarchists now awaiting death in the jail of this city, fixing the 11th day of November as the time when the awful deed is to be done was made public, we think it must have sent a quiver of pain through all sensitive hearts and the sun's face was somewhat darkened. Not that the decision was a surprise or that it could possibly have been otherwise. These parties labored persistently and intelligently to arouse armed resistance to the legally-constituted authorities, they sought rebellion and planned for and encouraged the taking of life, they were active aiders and abettors to the foul deeds perpetrated upon innocent men in the line of their duty in haymarket square on the 4th of May, 1886. Of the above we have not now and never have had any doubts. The facts that they are the products of foreign tyranny, that they did not understand the genius of American institutions, that they were actuated by humanitarian impulses, that they were moved by a zealous and commendable passion for reform do greatly modify our feelings towards them. They change repugnance to pity, hate to charity, but they do not change the facts that through these and their associates the lives of innocent women and children were put in awful jeopardy, and that mob violence, the most terrible form of human violence, was set on foot by them, and that, furthermore, if they had had their way a great city would have been devastated with blood and fire. For these and similar reasons society should take prompt and effective methods to protect itself. Stern methods are the tenderest methods. We ask for no further delays or other trials. We have no sympathy with any effort to escape or confuse the workings of the law by the employment of still more skillful attorneys like Benjamin F. Butler or Robert Ingersoll. These men have committed serious crime and were advocates of crime. They have rendered themselves liable to the severest provisions of our law. The severest provision of this law in Illinois is, alas! hanging. If it is necessary for the state to hang anybody, that necessity is now upon it. Against this law we make earnest protest with this urgent case in mind and in hand.

We have carefully read the opinion of the judges and believe it to be clear and conclusive. We have no mock sentiment to thwart the strong hand of justice or to dim the clear eye of reason. Progress comes by severe methods; the lower life must always give way to the higher. We believe in the evangelizing power of even red-handed war under certain circumstances. The present writer spent three precious years of his life in hardship and exposure as evidence of this faith, and he has never been able by any process of self-analysis to draw an ethical line between Jenkin Lloyd Jones, private in the Sixth Wisconsin Battery, and Jenkin Lloyd Jones, pastor and editor. In both cases the aim of life was the ministry of freedom, the hastening of the kingdom of God on earth on the lines of character, culture and equality. He regrets that on the 4th of May, 1886, he was temporarily out of the city so as not to be able to tender his services to the mayor, if necessary. His hand will pull the lanyard of a shotted gun pointed at solid files of living men with as clear a conscience now as then if the safety of the homes and the principles of our country demand it.

Having said this we will not be misunderstood when we protest against this hanging. In the name of the state that is strong enough to protect itself without stooping to the cruel and criminal level of the mob itself; in the name of humanity, which recognizes more and more the sanctity of all life, and that not the least nor the vilest is to be crushed except when all other resources fail; in the name of religion that leaves all retribution to that infinite justice that the gallows can neither hinder nor hasten—"Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord,"—and gives to the state only the right to protect itself; in the name of morality that teaches that one wrong can not be righted by the perpetration of another wrong; in the name of our children whom we would save from the brutalizing effects of this conspicuous legal murder, we protest against this hanging, and appeal to the Governor of Illinois to exercise his constitutional prerogative and put forth his hand and exercise that clemency that is the higher justice, and commute the awful sentence of the court to imprisonment for life. We do not ask for freedom or pardon. The consequences of these men's acts are too far-reaching, the danger of similar uprising in the future too imminent. We need the severe warning, the prompt rebuke, but we do ask that these poor, deluded idealists, these men seeking for the right thing on the wrong road, these men who have made themselves drunk—aye, brutal—upon the holy wine of equality, be treated with that consideration that becomes a civilized people, who remember "How a single pebble at the root mars the straightness of the pine," who realize their corporate responsibility in these matters. Let the city of Chicago that in 1886 laughed at a swaggering and non-ethical administration, let the state of Illinois, with her purblind politicians and unholy legislators, let the great United States of America, clogged with unscrupulous wealth, and at times well-nigh strangled with its monopolies and capitalistic combinations, sublime in their selfishness, remember that there are too many partners in the crime at the haymarket square to thus single out these seven to death and the rest to freedom. Let us not give this undue personal emphasis to an impersonal problem. Let us not glorify these narrow-minded reformers with the glory of martyrdom. Let us not by the arm of the state add force to the passion that already blinds the eye of reason on all sides. It is the mock sentiment, that to-day clings to the barbaric law of Moses and demands eye for eye and tooth for tooth. It is cold judgment, severe justice, high science that demand that "If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he be thirsty, give him drink, for in so doing you heap coals of fire upon his head." This is hard to do, and harder to receive, but permanent peace and safety to human life and property are possible in no other condition. The tumbrils rattled many a day through the streets of Paris with their heavy load of perpetrators of tyranny given over to the embraces of Madame Guillotine—"the Bride of Freedom," they said—but headless trunks only called for more decapitations. Let no time be wasted in trying to save these lives by legal chicanery and pettifogging; but let the unanimous elements of this country, the pulpit, the platform, and the press in the state of Illinois, appeal to the Governor for that higher justice—at least, so in all modesty we interpret that gospel which is also law. Sadly but boldly we confess our brotherhood with the seven doomed men in the jail, and, as we hope for no heaven to which they will be eternal strangers, we are willing to try to live with them here on earth until they and we are summoned by a Power not of human law to appear where violence is not known and peace and unity reign forever.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

The Rain.

When life's noon sun is beating
In fiery fury down,
And faith's bright color fading
Into a cheerless brown;

When paths that lie before me
Seem desolate and waste;
When joys have stopped their singing
And friends no longer haste;

When hope, the tree that sheltered
And nourished better life,
Is leaf by leaf fast falling
Beneath the noon-tide strife,

May such a heavenly blessing
As the refreshing rain
Bring back the youth that's fading
And make it bloom again.

WILLIAM S. LORD.

Union by Many Ways.

A large, significant fact emphasized by the new volume of Tolstoi's "Confessions" is the very evident drift of modern thought to an almost exclusive assertion of the ethical and non-miraculous elements of religious truth. The proof of this wiser seeing exists entirely aside from the necessary consciousness of Tolstoi, or of orthodox teachers, that they are penetrated by such an appellant energy. They may know nothing of the ultimate effects of their work even while that work may tend toward an entirely rationalistic basis, as, in fact, with many conservatives, it really does. Tolstoi, however, cannot be said to be going blindly into any philosophy of his own, but the rather is aware that the world requires a new faith in something accepted as the intensest reality. Such teaching, moreover, as now emanates from the Andover progressists, or from the orthodox pulpit in general, can not be regarded as a conscious effort toward the realization of a more essentially humanitarian ideal than is credally affirmed. Yet, Professor Hedge's Church of Humanity is a thing towards which all difference is converging, however little some of the voyagers comprehend the direction of their steps. Of course, all labor toward so beautiful an end deserves to be appreciated. While it is true that the great no-church philosophers and thinkers, together with ethical culture societies and Unitarian churches, may lead in the movement, all that aids the necessary constructive forces should be recognized. Tolstoi's "Pure Christianity" is nothing more in itself than the "ethical basis" under another name. When certain theologians relax an old severity and adjudge a new chance for the heathen, may we not, without stretching our facts, account it as a Presbyterian step towards an inevitable ethical organization of society? The religiousness of the George agitation in New York, that is so much insisted upon by its supporters, lies in its bringing together of many hitherto divided forces, which mistook theology for religion, but now begin to see that religion, if it means anything at all, must center in moral powers, and be one with this day's good as well as to morrow's promises. Not disguising such progress, which discovers itself wherever we turn, we may be better prepared to learn the lessons of material and spiritual generosity. Not—every man for himself: but every man for all! And every man for all by being so just to himself that he could not be unjust to his fellows! Tolstoi certainly taps the root of this question. He discards the improbable theologies, the cruelties of theory, the pretense that allows a continual conflict between life and thought, and calls us up to the clearer ways which we may tread in the joy of purity. On this basis all mankind may be one. All that the church teaches in the interests of such a faith is good, and everything else is of the nature of an excrescence. Here is the heart of the social, the religious, the political, the industrial questions. We are to be so interested in union that we dare not give aid and comfort to the first or any comer in contravention of it. This or nothing. You who can write "God"—do it; you who can write "good"—do that; you who can declare for man—be zealous of your faith; you who can pronounce for "ethics"—make that the shrine of your many pilgrimages! All of you, born of man for man's noblest rounding-off, may give tribute in some way to the fact you see as chiefest among universal things. Tolstoi stands for this. So do the higher seers of our western world as they bend an anxious and not unrewarded ear to earth for the sound of the coming jubilee of the faiths!

HORACE L. TRAUBEL.

The Sower.

C. C.

"A sower went forth to sow."

Along the pathless prairie
The tread of human feet,—
Up rise the smoke-plumed cabins,
'Mid springing corn and wheat;
Where, like a mimic ocean,
The wind swept grasses stirred,
The golden sheaves are gathered,
The harvest song is heard.

In vigil of the spirit,
A young man, listening, heard,—
"Go forth among thy fellows, Thy seed the living Word."
By springs of joy and sorrow,
In fields of toil and care,
By deserts of temptation,
He sowed in faith and prayer.

Nursed by the generous sunshine,
The early and late rain,
From year to year the prairie
Has waved with ripening grain:
From year to year the harvest
Of nobler thought and deed,
Of holier faith and purpose,
Has blessed the sower's seed.

O brave and faithful sower,
Not thine on earth to bind
The full sheaves of thy harvest,
The growths of heart and mind:

Moves on in widening circles
The life-embodied word,
And they shall bear thee witness,
Thy voice who never heard.

The people leave their labor,
The children cease their play,
They bring thee love and honor,
To crown thy festal day.
The heavens glow in beauty,
Lit by thy westering sun,
And earth forestalls the greeting,
"Servant of God, well done!"

To P. O. M. Workers.

The following circular to applicants for Unitarian literature has been prepared by the National Post-office Mission Committee of the Women's Auxiliary Conference:

The aim of the Post-office Mission of the Unitarian Church is to reach those liberal thinkers scattered throughout the country, who, having outgrown orthodox creeds, can no longer accept the religious views prevalent around them, and who are often unaware that in the Unitarian church they can find a congenial religious atmosphere. Our effort is to reach such persons by means of an advertisement in the papers, offering Unitarian literature free to all applicants, an effort already crowned with most gratifying success.

Our desire is that these isolated liberals shall no longer stand alone, but shall realize that they belong to a large body of earnest, thoughtful, religious believers, that they shall become our "parishoners" and fellow-workers. To this end, correspondence is desirable. Literature can be sent more surely to actual needs, if we know what those needs are.

What, then, can applicants do to help both themselves and the whole work?

I. Write occasionally to the senders, stating needs, doubts, etc. It is extremely discouraging to send papers, week after week, off into space, receiving no response, feeling, as time goes on, that possibly the applicant's address is changed or that his interest has wholly ceased. A few words of kindly appreciation now and then mightily cheer and encourage the senders. Any questions we will always cheerfully answer to the best of our ability by either the written or printed word.

II. Circulate the reading matter sent freely. In many places far from any Unitarian church, a liberal center is slowly (sometimes rapidly) growing around some one earnest person, who has hastened to share his new-found faith with his friends. Thus the way is prepared for the state missionary, and, eventually, for a Unitarian church. Where a church can not be formed, a reading or Unity club, a series of Sunday afternoon or evening parlor meetings, with some simple form of worship and the reading of a good sermon, followed by discussion, or a small Sunday-school may be organized, that shall be fruitful of much good. Advice and aid in forming such circles will always gladly be given.

III. Send us names of people anywhere likely to be interested in our faith, but only those quite sure to appreciate the matter sent.

IV. Subscribe for one or more of the papers, if able, and circulate your copy. Always let us know if you are a subscriber to any of the papers sent.

V. If unable to subscribe, send postage-stamps or money occasionally, according to your ability, to the P. O. M. Committee. The expense of sending out weekly a large number of publications is a serious consideration, and all stamps received are not only a needed financial help, but encourage us, as an expression of a real interest.

VI. Buy a good book now and then, and loan it. Channing's works, for only one dollar, Channing's life, at the same price, may be instanced as each a library of good—a treasure house of noble, uplifting thought. Lists of desirable books, with prices, will be sent to applicants, who should, however, if possible, state their special needs.

VII. Borrow from the free loaning libraries. Our best denominational books are loaned by mail, the receiver paying the postage only. Catalogues sent on application, and any desired information about books given.

Finally, if at any time your interest ceases, and you no longer read or care for the matter sent, have the kindness to notify us at once, thus saving wasted papers, stamps, time and work. Our wish is to send our literature only where heartily welcomed.

A Sketch.

Over eighteen centuries ago there lived a man whose influence on subsequent time has been greater than that of any other name which history affords; whose title has furnished a word for that which noble men and women deem dearest and most sacred in life.

Yet, strange to tell, little is historically known of the man. Among the narratives of him there have some been selected which many deem trustworthy, but these, coming from credulous men, and based upon legends (by many called traditions) which sprang up and grew years after the events they pretend to tell of, the narratives themselves are of historic value almost only as furnishing a mere medium through which his earnest life and moral beauty shone. As the western clouds are made to tell of the glories of the departed sun, so the spirit of heaven-born genius impresses itself on the dullest materials.

From these wonder-loving legends, critical men have striven to write a life, but as yet no genius has arisen capable from the reflections to satisfactorily tell of the original light. Nor may we yet know to what extent the man was the product of the times in which he lived, or to what extent he intentionally moulded subsequent events.

We hardly know more than that he lived in an obscure province of the Roman empire, and at a time when the stoic virtues had declined—when Rome, drunken with blood and bloated with her crimes, was rotting in vice; when the once heroic Greece had grown servile, and when the whole of the then civilized world was slowly dying. Then nature revolted, and men arose protesting against the abominations, and among them there was one whose heavenly spirit and whose tragic death have immortalized him for all time. Back of the myth and fable, we know there must have been an intensely earnest and pure, though somewhat narrow life. We know that faith in an imminent and loving heavenly Father dominated every fiber of his being—a faith without which there can be no real and consoling religion. With all the wrecks that may come, this is the one belief, the one faith, that will to the yearning human heart ever stand immutable.

To what extent his ecstasy caused him to view his own relations to the Father as peculiar is not clear, but certain it is he was dominated with such a belief. His death alone could scarcely be accounted for on other grounds; for we may believe that, as reported, he died the cruel death of a malefactor, and we may accept, as consonant with his spirit, that in his death pangs he forgave his persecutors—his death thus furnishing the tenderest, as well as the most dramatic spectacle the world has ever given, and one that has wrung tears from the eyes of millions.

His followers, while neglecting his noble virtues, sought to make amends by deifying the man. Long years afterward men learned to attach a fetish worship to the legendary narratives themselves, which generally in details, when they do not contradict, they copy. And many so worship them at this day. And in the ears of thousands there has wrung, and in the ears of thousands yet unborn there will wring with superstitions awe, the words, "Whom do men say that I, the son of man, am?"

CORRESPONDENCE.

EDITOR OF UNITY:—In finding another's property on the highway, and exacting or accepting a reward for its return, the question occurs, to what decree does my honesty rise or fall with an occasion? If my neighbor's loss involves property worth a hundred dollars, and I grant him new possession for twenty-five dollars, am I more or less than twenty-five per cent. rogue, or does the fact of my shrewdness not affect me morally at all? It seems a case parallel to that which Mr. Blake so beautifully reviewed in a recent article. Yet it appears to be easy enough to reconcile yourself to the logic of exaction if you have grounded the whole course of your ethics upon the expectation of a future life. If it is right to be good for the sake of what is to come as a reward in the future, it is right to be good for the sake of what is to come in the shape of immediate benefit now. That is, it is right to be good in so far as the spiritual is paid for, cash down, in the physical, but not an inch beyond that limit. It is almost heedless to say that there is no basis for morals at all in such a philosophy. Under it, life suffers moral changes with each wind that blows. Yet a vast deal that goes to make up the common life of people is constructed from just that sort of a flimsy material. Moreover, the principle that one may rightly extort what he can from the belongings or labor of another, just because occasion or power made it possible, is responsible for all the crime and disturbance in the commercial spheres. What we require is a code that recognizes a higher inspiration. If you say it were worthy of the owner to pay you his reward, I reply that it were worthier still for you to refuse it. What may be an attestation of spirit with your refusal becomes an act of commerce by your acceptance. But you say, a reward may be a gift, freely bestowed by the owner. A gift to what? A gift that is conceived and fulfilled in beauty must be one of lover to lover. This man simply pays you for being honest. Your sense of integrity revolts against the implied suspicion. For you to surrender to a reward is for you to abdicate a spiritual freedom for a commercial thralldom.

H. L. T.

TO THE EDITOR OF UNITY:—My attention has been drawn to a letter from J. C. F. Grumbine, in the UNITY of the 10th inst., upon "Henry George and the United Labor Party." I desire to call to your notice what should be of special interest to your readers, namely, the intensely religious character of this new crusade in which Dr. McGlynn, as well as Henry George, are so prominent. Your readers can gather from the following quotations how much of this genuine religious element there is in the teaching of Mr. George:

"Envy the rich? Who that realizes that he must some day wake up in the beyond can envy those who spend their strength to gather what they can not use here and can not take away. The only thing certain to any of us is death. 'Like the swallow darting through thy hall, such, O king, is the life of man!'"

"We come from where we know not; we go—who shall say? Impenetrable darkness behind and gathering shades before. What, when our time comes, does it matter whether we have fared daintily or not, whether we have worn soft raiment or not, whether we have a great fortune or nothing at all, whether we shall have reaped honors or been despised, have been counted learned or ignorant—as compared with how we may have used that talent which has been intrusted to us for the Master's service? What shall it matter when eyeballs glaze and ears grow dull, if out of the darkness may stretch a hand, and into the silence may come a voice: 'Well done, thou good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.' I shall speak of rights, I shall speak of utility, I shall speak of interest; I shall meet on their chosen ground those who say that the largest production of wealth is the greatest good, and material progress the highest aim. Nevertheless, I appreciate the truth embodied in these words of Mazzini to the working classes of Italy, and would echo them: 'Workingmen, brothers! When Christ came and changed the face of the world, he spoke not of rights to the rich, who needed not to achieve them, nor to the poor, who would doubtless have abused them, in imitation of the rich; he spoke not of utility nor of interest to a people whom interest and utility had corrupted; he spoke of duty, he spoke of love, of sacrifice and of faith; he said that they should be first among all who had contributed most by their labor to the good of all. And the word of Christ, breathed in the ear of a society in which all true life was extinct, recalled it to existence, conquered the millions, conquered the world, caused the education of the human race to ascend one degree on the scale of progress.'—[Social Problems, chapter IX.]. And:

"The hope that rises is the heart of all religions! The poets have sung it, the seers have told it, and in its deepest pulses the heart of man throbs responsive to its truth. This, that Plutarch said, is what in all times and in all tongues has been said by the pure hearted and strong sighted, who, standing as it were upon the mountain tops of thought, and looking over the shadowy ocean, have beheld the loom of land. Men's souls, encompassed here with bodies and passions, have no communication with God, except what they can reach to in conception only by means of philosophy, as by a kind of an obscure dream. But when they are loosed from the body, and removed into the unseen, invisible, impassable and pure region, this God is then their leader and king; they then, as it were, hanging on Him wholly, and beholding without weariness, and passionately affecting that beauty which can not be expressed or uttered by men."—[Progress and Poverty.]

And Doctor McGlynn, in his lecture on "The Cross of a New Crusade," said: "It is my opinion that the Christian church would speedily gather in the whole world into the flock of Christ, if she would preach more generously and more self-sacrificingly to men and women and children whenever they will listen to her, and would carry out with her all wondrously potent influences the blessed lesson of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man."

In this way has this political movement assumed not only a religious aspect, but a most genuinely religious one at that.

Yours truly,

ALFRED S. HOUGHTON. M. D.

THE UNITY CLUB.

REV. C. W. WENDTE writes to Mr. Rich as follows: "Let me say that the credit for originating, among Unitarians, what is now known as the Unity Club, is probably due to Unity church, Chicago. When I came to Chicago, in 1869, there was existing in Mr. Collyer's society a very flourishing organization known as Unity Church Fraternity, which was substantially what our Unity clubs are to-day, save that it laid more stress on charitable endeavor than is the fashion among us now. After this model and reminiscences of my former connection with the Boston Young Men's Christian Union, I found, in 1870, the "Starr King Fraternity" among the young people of the Fourth church, Chicago, and in 1871 the Chicago Christian Union (now the Athenæum). The Starr King Fraternity held sociables, studied art, etc., arranged lecture courses, gave "penny readings" among the poor, entertainments of music, recitations, etc., to the inmates of the county hospital, etc., etc.

Possibly Unity Church Fraternity may have had a prototype, but I think they are entitled to the credit of furnishing the good example to the rest of us in that early day of our history, and also the half, and the better half, of our name."

The above is an interesting illustration of the well-known fact that most good things have no beginning. Who invented the watch? Who first made the shovel? The answer is "Nobody," because so many bodies had a hand in it. We suspect the same is true of the Unity Club. It has had no beginning; in one form or another it has been coming into being for the last century. Sporadic classes for study, and spasmodic plans for organizing young people, etc., doubtless reach back all through the history of American churches.

It is simply a question of emphasis, and the selection of the dominant lines that have finally shaped the Unity Club. In its more developed type it is not an organization of young people, neither is it a philanthropic, social or an amusement organization; but it is the study side of the church, a systematic attempt to link thought and culture as a part of the religious work of the church under the directing impulse, and, if possible, guidance of the minister. The first systematic and continuous study of non-biblical authors as a part of the church work, to which all would be invited, and, so far as possible, all would be utilized without reference to age or sex, that we know of in the west, was a season's course laid out in All Souls church at Janesville, Wis., in the winter of '71 and '72, and a year or two later similar work was inaugurated at St. Paul; but we suspect that prior to either of these, Rev. E. H. Hall had regular classes for the study of art in his church at Worcester, Mass. We do not expect to find out who first made the watch; but since the question is raised we will be glad of whatever light may be thrown upon the development of some parts of it. The perfection of the dial or the construction of the case perhaps is discoverable.

We will be glad to print any information received on this dark subject.

THE STUDY TABLE.

The Cabin in the Clearing and Other Poems. By Benjamin S. Parker. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co. 12mo., pp. 310. Cloth, plain edges, $1.50. Full gilt $2.00.

After the surfeit of ballades and rondeaux with which recent bards have overwhelmed us, it is pleasant to listen to the "native wood-notes wild" of a natural singer, one of the few —"who make

Music for its own sweet sake."

The muse who inspired these songs is not the mincing, modish, fine lady of the minuet, but a hearty, buxom country lass, who foots it fealty in country dance and reel, whose haunt is the husking and the quilting-bee, and who knows a hickory from a pig-nut and an acorn from a chincapin.

Such of these poems as have from time to time been given to the world in "poet's corner" of papers and magazines have been lovingly transferred to many a scrap book; his "Indian Graves" and "'Tis Morning and the Days are Long" found a fitting niche in John James Piatt's "Union of American Poetry and Art," but it is with sincere pleasure western folk greet the appearance of "The Cabin in the Clearing and Other Poems," the first full collection of the verses of a writer whose fugitive pieces have endeared him to many a household.

"The critic comes with awful frown
To crush the artist like a gnat!"

sings our bard; but the sternest of critics under the spell of this greenwood music would forget to frown; for here is the very scent of clover and elder-bloom, the whistle of the quail, the merry chatter of wren and chipmunk, the ripple of forest streams and dance of chequered sunbeams. It is no book-knowledge of nature these lines display—the hand which penned them has been in its time dyed brown with the walnut stain dear to the hoosier boy, and stained with the juice of fox grape and blackberry. The poet has known the haunt of partridge and gray squirrel, the taste of May-apple and haw and hish paw-paw, and has caught his cadences from

"Chattering blackbirds on the trees,
Piping loud their ecstasies,
And the catbird's tangled dream
Of all melodies that make
Bird-songs glad for music's sake.

Where the hawthorne's tardy bloom
And the linden's rich perfume,
With its hint of honey cells
And the trumpet flower's red bells
Wooed the wandering pirate bee.

[Song of the Imprisoned Thrush, p. 52.]

And because this bard goes straight to nature's heart for his inspiration, here is that "local color" for which our English critics have so often clamored, and the genuine

"Artless art that tarries long."

"The Cabin in the Clearing," "The Spelling School," "The Camp Meeting," "The Redbud," "An Old Thanksgiving," are true pioneer pictures, doubly welcome in this day when the old pioneer element in western life is already a thing of the past: the log-cabin has given place to the Queen Anne cottage; and maple sugar to the sanded, granulated fraud of commerce. These are, in the highest sense, poetry of the people; but there are not a few poems for poets also, first of these ranks "The Poet's Reed," closely followed by "An Empty Nest," "Conquerors," "She Was Not Made for Sorrow," "A Little Maid of Two"—a delightful study in natural theology, "A Christmas Thought," "The Poet's Art," "Beyond the Afternoon," "Bard and Blossom," and "The Song of the Imprisoned Thrush."

There is a glint of humor in the dialect verse, and a lyric lilt in "Pretty Mary O," "Meggy May," and "The Singing Wind," which makes one marvel why the writer did not follow this vein further,—a genuine song is as rare a thing in these degenerate days as a black swan.

In "occasional" verse he is remarkably happy as "The Whitewater Bar," "Garfield," "Morton," and certain of his sonnets evince. His sonnets, however, are such only to the extent of being poems in fourteen lines, they are not even fourteeners, as Charles Lamb calls the looser Shakespearean model: and this is a fact which the purists among reviewers are likely to make the author feel to his cost; the modern school is "rigidly righteous" as to the rhymes of the octave and the sextet. Pre-eminent among the memorial verses is the noble threnody on the death of Sumner, in which these lines occur:

"Hang but one broken feller on his urn,
Let one black mother only bring her young,
And while the past shall on her soul return
But teach her child to lisp with faltering tongue
The name of him, the apostle,—him who gave
His life to freedom and the suffering slave.
We can not honor him, the time is past,
He honored our humanity——"

The fine quality of the poem is evenly sustained from first to last. We can not deny UNITY readers one further quotation, from the tribute to Paul Hamilton Hayne:

"Sunshine and music are the poet's dower;
He sings, and lo! the land is wed to fame:
It may have wealth and excellence and power,
But o'er them all men write the poet's name;
'Tis Burns's land or Schiller's clime or Hayne's:
O'er every ruler's right the poet reigns."

To the names of Forcythe Willson, John James Piatt, Benjamin F. Taylor, John Finley, James W. Riley, Wallace, Harney, and Eggleston, Indiana will be proud to add the name of this new bard, who has caught and held for us in these songs something of her early "settler" life with its instinctive love of nature, homely beauty and sturdy independence of thought.

The Ruling Principles of Method Applied in Education. By Antonio Rosmini Servati. Translated by Mrs. Grey. Boston: D. C. Heath & Co. $1.40.

The book is a fragment, published after the author's death, of a much larger work which the writer had planned. The larger work was to describe the education of the human being, carried through all the stages of life on the principle of natural development, here laid down and applied to infant education only. The outline of the plan of the larger work, as gleaned from the author's notes, is given in the preface. "It is clear," says Mrs. Grey, "that had life and leisure been granted him, he would have given to the world what it has never yet had, a complete method and art of education, based on the applied science of human nature, and having for its aim the full and harmonious development of the latter to the measure of the stature of the perfect man."

Fortunately, the earlier part, which is preserved to us, contains the fundamental principles, both of method and practice, which remain the same for all periods of life, and of which the application only varies with the varying degrees of individual development. If the former are thoroughly mastered, together with their groundwork in the laws of human nature, the latter will be a comparatively easy task.

It is interesting to note how far that task has been accomplished for us by Froebel, whose Kindergarten system worked out by him in entire ignorance of Rosmini, and under conditions of birth, education, circumstances, so widely different, is yet the complete application to every detail of infant education of Rosmini's principles, or rather principles common to both because both had arrived at them by the same road—the profound study of human nature. Rosmini being a priest of the Roman church "was obliged to depart in religious instruction from the fundamental principle of both himself and Froebel—that children should never learn words representing ideas which their minds are incapable of conceiving; while Froebel, whose whole teaching was imbued with the spirit of religion and directed to lead the mind and heart to the love and adoration of God, excluded from it all dogmatic formulas given in words which the child could not understand.

The book contains three hundred and sixty-three pages. Following the preface is a short sketch of Rosmini. In an introduction the author defines his "Function of the Mind" and methods of each of these functions in performing its particular task. He limits the discussion in this book to the Expository Method, or that through which our knowledge may be imparted to others, and therefore governs teaching in general.

The following, as he sums it up, is the question he tries to answer: "What is the ruling principle of Method? or in other words, How shall we find the sure rule by which the teacher of youth shall know what things to begin with and what should follow, so that the child shall be led on, by gradations always duly adapted to his powers, from what he knows, to what he does not know and has yet to be taught?" A problem this that any thoughtful teacher would like to have satisfactorily solved.

Children notice resemblances more readily than differences. In discussing the order of procedure while teaching children classification of things, Rosmini ingeniously advocates beginning with the general and proceeding to the particular, showing by illustration how the reverse order would necessitate the correction of nearly seventy errors in the child's mind in getting the correct signification of the words—flowers, Rosacea, roses,—the special rose Adelaide Como. He adds, "If this method be continued the mind is led into error, its ideas are dim and confused, and at last it is brought to a stand, and all but stupefied." Truly, the "how" through Rosmini's eyes, becomes more important to the teacher than the "what," since mind power is the great object sought.

The book, though deeply interesting, is one for the study table rather than for vacation days. Who that has tried it will think the study of a child's mind ever an easy task. Even with Rosmini's keen insight to aid us it still remains a profound subject.

THE "Old South" historical workers in Boston have already issued four leaflets in the series of 1887. They are as follows:

No. 1. Puritan Politics in England and New England, by Edward Everett Hale.

No. 2. The English Colonies in America, by De Torqueville.

No. 3. The Time of Our Political Probation. Circular letter addressed by Washington to the governors of all the states, on disbanding the army.

No. 4. The Constitution of the United States.

LEE & SHEPARD are about to issue new editions of George Lowell Austin's "Life of Longfellow" and "The Life and Times of Wendell Phillips," also of Henry Giles' "Human Life in Shakespeare," the latter has been out of print for some time. It is the interpretation of genius by genius and it ought to delight a new set of readers and quicken a younger generation.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Duluth, Minn.—The new society here is moving ahead with hope and courage. Mr. West, late of Geneva, Ill., has been engaged as permanent minister, and since the beginning of his work there (September 1), five church committees or "working sections" have gone actively into operation. They are these: Building Committee, Finance Committee, Social Section, Visiting Committee and Musical Committee. An Ethical and Charity Section, and a Unity Literary Club, will also soon be at work. The society will be a working society, as well as a hopeful and reverent and truth-loving society. Mr. West goes to the new position entirely untrammelled in thought and methods, and more cordial relations between people and minister than already exist could hardly be. Let us all wish it well, and by our sympathy and, perhaps, occasional letter, aid it in becoming a power for truth, righteousness and love in the "new northwest."

Chicago.—Mr. Utter preached last Sunday, in answer to the recent criticism on Christianity by a Chinese. A generous abstract of the sermon was published in the Inter-Ocean.

—A mistake at the Tribune office announced last Sunday morning that Mr. Jones was to preach on the Anarchists Sunday evening. So many came that he repeated his morning sermon to a good audience.

—Rev. Albert Walkley, of Manistee, was in the city this week. He looked in on UNITY office in the interest of a refreshing benefaction sustained in this city by one of his parishoners, in the shape of the Emeline Baths on West Madison street, of which we hope to give fuller accounts one of these days. Here a full bath can be had for 10 cents, a shower bath for five, with a reduction of two cents in either case where the parties bring their own towels. All of the appurtenances are of the most approved pattern. The establishment is a model of cleanliness. Upward of 44,000 baths were taken here last year, and the patronage is growing. Mr. Ruggles, this apostle of soap and towel, this efficient missionary of that which is next to godliness, because godliness is reached by going that way, is looking into the possibilities of establishing similar institutions both on the north and south sides.

—Miss Tupper and Miss Putnam, who have been laboring in our missionary field in western Iowa during the summer, passed through the city this week to resume their studies, one at Cornell and one at the Meadville Theological Seminary. Let other young ladies follow in their footsteps.

Chicago.—The Union Teachers' meeting on Monday was not well attended, since the next Sunday is to be devoted to a review. Mr. Jones was leader, and in a general way took up the first two chapters of Luke. Mr. Utter, in his notes on lesson 4, says he would have gladly taken up the study of the teachings of Jesus, omitting the birth stories altogether. A better attitude would be the braver one of saying this is our best material. We ought to rejoice in these legendary poetical elements of these gospels. In these chapters are six of the great hymns of the Christian church. We are perhaps not accustomed to think of Luke as a great poet, and yet here are these great hymns, the "Magnificat," the "Benedictus," the "Nunc Dimittis," "Gloria in Excelsis," "Hail Mary," ("Ave Maria.") To identify these in their places in the gospel was spoken of as a useful exercise for certain classes. The debt of Luke to the Old Testament was proposed as another interesting question.

Our Indiana Missionary.—Ft. Wayne. —This place was recently visited by Missionary Jennings. An effort will be made to set the Liberal church on its feet again in this thriving city. Negotiations are pending to secure the Jewish temple. The time seems ripe for a successful movement this fall.

—Portland. —A town of 5000 inhabitants on the Grand Rapids R. R., is just passing through a gas boom. It contains one man who had incidentally, through a traveling man from Richmond, heard of Unitarianism. Through his influence Mr. Jennings was invited last Sunday morning and evening to speak in the Presbyterian church—that church being without a pastor. Good audiences were in attendance at both services. The people seemed to enjoy the new light, and say they will want more in the future.

—Winchester. —The district missionary spoke for the second time in this place last Wednesday evening. After the service the audience unanimously voted to ask Mr. Jennings to lecture there again the next week. Many handed in their names for copies of our publications. The people evidently mean to investigate Unitarianism.

—Westville was visited September 18th, where he spoke afternoon and evening in the Baptist church. The church was filled on both occasions. Arrangements for these meetings were made by a young woman who once occupied a place in Mr. Thayer's choir, in Cincinnati. She was then, and is now, a Methodist, although she confesses to a strong leaning toward the Unitarians. Unitarian services will be held from time to time in Westville.

—Richmond. —This place has just been visited. On account of the yearly meetings of the Friends, both Hicksite and Orthodox, the Unitarian movement will not be resumed probably until November, as Mr. Jennings goes to Toledo, O., through October.

Philadelphia.—A preacher of this city, still overborne by the ancient theologies, calls down "the just wrath of the Almighty God" upon the authors of the Illinois bridge disaster.

—The constitution has been celebrated here the past week with a vim beyond description. Among the preachers who have considered the subject, there are several whose deliverances are interesting, if not instructive. One of them, Doctor Corbett, who is Episcopal by faith, sees in the celebration the suggestion that "the foul mouths" of "Socialists, Anarchists and Nihilists, foreign-born traitors," "must be stopped." Doctor Tiffany, in more liberal temper, dwelling specially upon the religious aspects of the case, insisted upon the preservation of that "grand heritage of a grand people—a free church and a free state." In most instances, however, so far as published notes permit us to know, little of a remarkable tenor, either for good or bad, was uttered in the pulpits. The initial prayer of the Saturday's ceremonies at Independence Hall was allotted to Bishop Potter, and the closing utterance to Cardinal Gibbons. It is interesting enough to be noted that the body of Catholic priests present at this day's exercises absented themselves till the Episcopalian features had been concluded, and then appeared together and took their seats.

—A Methodist preacher in Camden, Lake by name, has been handling Unity church and Mr.

Haskell, of that city, and Unitarian teaching in general, without gloves. The outbreak is of little importance, except as an indication of the animosity that has been developed in Camden towards a movement that seems new and impudent to some in that community. The critic simply threshes old straw, accuses Unitarians of "the do and the don't" natural to the various beliefs they everywhere acknowledge, calls on God to have mercy on their souls, and so on, ad nauseam. Which simply shows how far such a man really is from comprehending the spirit that animates the liberal movements of the day. He has so occupied himself with the divergent convictions of those he impeaches that he has failed to see the higher religious unity which becomes richer rather than weaker for the variety it allows. The Camden society, faced by the narrow interpretations necessarily more rife in a small than a large town, should realize that the antagonism means to them inspiration, not failure. Camden is the place, and 1887 is the time, for just such work as they are called upon to accomplish by their free choice. Let them have well-speed for their encouragement from all friends, near or remote.

—The school of the Ethical Society is to be opened on the 22d.

—Mr. Ames is back in the city, and preached for the first time on the morning of the 18th. Evening services at his church will not be started till October. Of all the liberal churches here, I believe his is the most occupied in various works.

Boston.—The fifth annual course of the Old South lectures for young people has just closed. The course has been the most interesting and successful yet given, the old meeting house being always full. The general subject for the year, "The Birth of the Nation," chosen in commemoration of the centennial of the adoption of the constitution, was a fortunate one, and much reading and study have been stimulated. The programme in detail was as follows: "How the Men of the English Commonwealth Planned Constitutions," by Prof. James K. Hosmer; "How the American Colonies grew together," John Fiske; "The Confusion after the Revolution," Davis R. Dewey; "The Convention and the Constitution," Hon. John D. Long; "James Madison and His Journal," Prof. E. B. Andrews; "How Patrick Henry Opposed the Constitution," Henry L. Sutherland; "Alexander Hamilton and the Federalist," Miss Alice E. Freeman; "Washington's Part, and the Nation's First Years," Edward Everett Hale. Mr. Belfield, of the Chicago Manual Training School, who has been the prime mover in establishing "Old South" lectures in Chicago, was present at two or three of the lectures, and went home with new inspiration. He is arranging a course of lectures on the constitution for the young people of Chicago. The subjects proposed for the Old South essays this year relate, like the lectures, to the constitution. They are as follows: I. The Albany Convention of 1754—its history and significance, with reference to previous and subsequent movement toward union in the colonies. II. Is a Congress of two houses or a Congress of one house the better—what was said about it in the Constitutional Convention, and what is to be said about it to-day?

Wichita, Kansas.—A Sunday Circle has been formed in this enterprising western city. J. R. Effinger, western secretary, goes this week to visit them. He will spend several weeks in Kansas.

Religious Books Wanted.—A society in the west, which is struggling under many difficulties to build a church for its Unitarian faith, will gratefully receive donations of books for religious study class and Sunday-school uses, hoping in due time to contribute its own share to our common cause. For particulars, address Mrs. E. T. LEONARD, 175 Dearborn street, Chicago.

EDITORIAL.

DOCTOR TOWNSEND said the other day to his people, "There is no greater sorrow than to feel that we have neglected or wasted a God-given opportunity."

H. TAMBS LYCHE writes us that his correspondents tell him that his post-office mission tracts, which he sends to Norway, go wandering about from house to house as long as the paper holds together.

MR. MEAD's lectures at the Plymouth church in this city, of which the Rev. Mr. Gunsaulus is pastor, have drawn large audiences. Mr. Mead is fortunate in being a missionary of breadth, culture and ethical earnestness, without being fettered by sectarian prejudices and denominational lines.

MAX MULLER speaks of India as "the country in which to study the true origin and natural growth of religion." Some one criticises this by saying: "This is true of what theologians call 'natural' religion, which is assumed to be a growth out of human consciousness; but the Christian religion is not a natural religion." On this, opinions may differ, but our verdict would be, if Christianity is not a natural religion, so much the worse for it.

MOST of our western readers are too far away, and too much wanting in local associations, to understand the full significance of the recent merging of two Unitarian churches in Boston,—the South Congregational church and the Hollis Street church. By this arrangement, H. Bernard Carpenter, the brilliant poet-preacher, retires from his charge, where he was much beloved, and Edward Everett Hale and his colleague, Edward Hale, become pastors of the combined church, which starts out unencumbered with debt, and with a constituency large in numbers and abundant in means. From this united church great things are to be expected. The blended traditions of both societies, the merging of geographical lines, and the philanthropic and open-hearted attitude of Mr. Hale justify great expectations. But do we not have here another slight but significant indication of the trend of things? Not more churches, but better churches, America needs. The tendency to emphasize harmonies rather than differences will surely demonstrate, little by little, the foolishness of separate organizations in many a locality. To-day church union, and not theological discussion, is the thing to work for. America is growing toward a church "for the people, by the people, and of the people." Signs are not wanting that the American Catholic church is already forming under this or some other name.

A CORRESPONDENT in the Christian Register seems greatly elated because a western church, in its recent dedicatory services, italicized in its order of exercises the words, "to a pure and ever-growing Christianity," because, he said, it is needed in "these days of vague generalities." Upon the taste and judgment of the local parish and minister we have no criticism to make. Individuality asserts itself in type, as it ought to, and always does; although we do not see how a responsive service, strongly devotional in its nature, can specially emphasize one line above another; but with this deliberate attempt to make a theological virtue, and to teach a general lesson, by these italics, we are moved to make a comment. We turn to the services to see what the "vague generalities" are which are left in common type. Among the subordinate words are these: "Truth," "Righteousness," "Universal Brotherhood," "Religion," "God our heavenly Father," "Love," "Thanksgiving," "Praise," "the thought of immortality," "the consecration and education of children," the ascription of the Lord's prayer which gives to God "the Kingdom, the Power, and the Glory." We cannot believe that this zealous minister meant to subordinate these words to the word "Christian," the content of which is often with him and others a matter of investigation and discussion. Rather we think this an unconscious emphasis of a nervous clutching for words in an age remarkable for its frank speech, and a growing preference in general for substance rather than form, for things rather than names. We believe the italicized words belong in the vocabulary of the devout, but we shrink from the irreverence that asks us to use the printer's art to make invidious comparisons between the word "Christian" and the great names of the nameless One. Next we will have the Lord's prayer italicized in spots, and the sermon on the Mount printed in small caps, and italics, and lower case, in proportion as emphasis is needed "in these days of vague generalities."

OUR friends the Universalists are offering a cash prize of one hundred dollars for "the best statement of Universalism." Within a limit of eight thousand words, the successful competitor must "make a statement that will show how Universalism satisfies every religious want in man, and is therefore needed by, and appeals to, all." The present attitude of the denomination toward traditional methods, or at least its recognition of the spirit of the times, is evinced in the request that the desired statement be "not an abstract theological discussion," and "not a 'proof' of Universalism from the Bible or Nature, except incidentally, but a simple and attractive statement, in answer to the questions, What is Universalism, and What is it good for?" We have never seen an advertisement for a hat-block upon which hats could be molded for all heads, but we should as soon expect a satisfactory response to such an advertisement, as to one calling for a "statement" which should satisfy all thinking brains. Yet we hope that our brethren may find a statement which can do duty as a missionary document, even if it does not prove that denominational Universalism satisfies every religious want in man.

THE Religio-Philosophical Journal publishes a lengthy "open letter to the Seybert Commission," by A. B. Richmond, an able and well-known criminal lawyer of Meadville, Pa. In his letter, which is clear, forcible, and evidently written in perfect candor and earnestness, Mr. Richmond narrates certain experiences which he had at the camp meeting of the Spiritualists on Cassadoga lake, N. Y. He claims to be an adept in legerdemain, and holds that the phenomena he witnessed could not be produced in the manner set forth by the Commission in its report, recently published. He says: "I do not say that the manifestations I saw came from the spirit-world—if there is such a world—but I do say that I do not believe they were feats of legerdemain. It may be that the believers in spirit manifestations are in error—and I confess that I fear they are,—yet, until you can explain all the phenomena that attend their seances on the theory of fraud, you are not entitled to a verdict." The letter, and the report which it criticises, are worth reading as contributions to the growing literature of "Psychic Research," a branch of legitimate science, which is attracting much attention among progressive minds.

The Debilitating Adjective.

The reign of the adjective in English literature is of comparatively recent date. The earlier masters wrote with substantive and verb, and did not expect to produce their strong effects by their modifiers. All this has changed. Modern literature as well as modern conversation is full of adjectives. We fear American more than English pages are thus colored. It is no longer Niagara, but splendid Niagara; not mother's love, but tender mother's love; not our country, but our glorious country; not religion, but Christian religion; not Christianity, but pure Christianity. We are not among those who despise adjectives; and we doubtless are among those who indulge too freely in them. Great is the use of the adjective; but we do want to protest against this flippant and cant use of the adjective "pure" in relation to Christianity. Our first objection lies in the fact that it leads to the Phariseism, "Lord, I thank thee that I am not as other men are." The Christian Register of last week rendered morals and religion a service by reminding its readers that "There is not a single religious denomination that does not claim to teach pure Christianity. Neither the noun nor the adjective which accompanies it serves to distinguish one Christian sect from another." With what sincerity does the Catholic devotee and the Episcopalian enthusiast, as well as the Universalist and the Unitarian, insist that his pursuit if not his possession is "pure" Christianity; now what right has a little denomination with a limp and pale history of less than a hundred years, like the Unitarians, to claim by this adjective that that tremendous energy that has swept down through the ages, moulding nations, building cities, and shaping civilizations, is impure Christianity because it holds so much that the "pure" Christianity of the Unitarian rejects.

This suggests our second distrust of the adjective; however complimentary it is meant to be, it really denudes the great warm reality it tries to define. If we inquire at the Unitarian headquarters what "pure" Christianity is, we will be promptly replied, "The life and teachings of Jesus," or as our contemporary the Register puts it, "The religion of the Golden Rule, the Lord's prayer and the two great commandments." Good, but this religion never built cathedrals, painted the master pieces of Christian art, composed and sang the great oratorios, went on Crusades, established fast and feast days, lifted souls by the pomp of ceremonials, humbled them with anchoritic penances, tamed them with purgatorial fears and disciplined them with apostolic rites and ecclesiastical authority. The Christianity that did all this had creeds, forms, banners, armies, priests, bishops, etc., that the Unitarian does not believe in. Compared to this, the "pure" Christianity that excludes and denudes is but a disembodied spirit, an impotent ghost. We will respect and honor, not only the Christianity of Jesus but the Christianity of Paul, with all his theological subtleties; the Christianity of Augustine, of Chrysostom, of St. Bernard, Aye, and the Christianity of John Calvin and Jonathan Edwards, as well as the Christianity of Luther, Wesley, Ballou, Channing and Parker. The Christianity that deserves our honor, gratitude and study is the Christianity that is colored like the waters of a river with the soil of the country through which it passes. Doctor Hedge has well argued that Athanasius with his Trinity taught a higher truth concerning the divine nature than Arius with his Unity. The "pure" Christianity, as defined by the Unitarians, does represent the underlying principles of the Christian movement, because it represents the universal elements of religion. Love, duty, humility, faith in God, and service to man, trust and prayer, which the Unitarian insists upon as "pure" Christianity,—are found in all religions, and consequently are the least characteristic things in Christianity.

Christianity as interpreted by history (and this would seem to be the only authoritative interpretation) is these principles clothed with institutions, rites, doctrines, creeds and ceremonials adapted to the needs and capacities of the various ages and lands in which it has dominated. This clothing, this coloring, is what has given to Christianity its dominating power. To denude Christianity of all this by the complacent adjective "pure," is to ignore much of that which has given comfort, strength and devotion to Christendom. Is not this also pure Christianity? As pure as the limpid teachings of Jesus. For does it not represent the pure affections of pure souls? The pure purposes of pure hearts? Has it not sustained pure lives and given pure comfort, and does it not represent the most distinctive peculiarities in that form of religion which has shaped the devotions of the most civilized nations? We honor this Christian stream entire; we recognize that the universal elements of religion, which certain Unitarian friends at this time would fain compel us to call "pure Christianity," must clothe themselves with forms adapted to each new age. In seeking for this new clothing of form and living word we will use and honor Christianity in its synthesis; but we will not slavishly follow. What we need is, not a denuded Christianity, but a developed religion into which the great Christian stream has poured all its wealth of life, poetry, fable and truth. Whatever has helped humanity is pure. To the pure all things are pure.

The Society of Solitude.

We are apt to think that when a man retires from life in the city or village, he goes into actual solitude. We do not see that neighbors, relatives, friends, are but manifestations of that Power which speaks through every form of life. Does he leave behind him the voice of man? He goes into the midst of myriad voices, any one of which should speak more eloquently than the lips of his friend. No human tongue can speak as the leaves speak. No human lips so eloquent as the tinted lips of the lily, parted in perfumed breath. No tone of man so full of meaning as the notes of birds, the ripple of running brooks, the manifold untranslated voices of nature. Does he leave behind him the face of his friend? He comes into the company of faces more beautiful than any face of man or woman. The glad countenance of the violet or daisy, the broad genial face of the sunflower, these compensate, and more, for the faces he has left. Solitude, to the man of the spirit, is not vacant but full of intensest life. For the flitting forms of men and women, changing at the bid of some ape of fashion, he has for company the thoughts of the great and good, visions of truth and beauty, images of the ideal haunting him as dreams of the day. His neighbors are the forms of kindred life that flourish all about him. The song of the bird beats at his ears as notes from the throat of a fellow. The splash of water, the patter of raindrops on the roof, the sighing of the night wind around his dwelling, the chirp of the cricket, the hoot of the owl, the croaking of frogs, the buzz of insects,—these are but syllables in the speech of nature, through which the Great Soul speaks to his. Human voices are dull and empty, compared with the fresh glad voices of nature. The speech of man is degenerate. Flattery, sycophancy, lies, have so debased his speech that it is no longer healthy and normal. These voices of nature never speak false. In them is no deception. What they utter they are; and the understanding of the man may seize upon them as revelations of the real.

Companionable forms stand all about us. For us the trees gossip and laugh; to our ears are directed the songs of the birds and the chatter of squirrels; for our eyes the petals of the flowers unfold; for our sense is their perfume cast on the air; for our feet the grass carpets the earth; for our delectation are shady bowers, still waters, ripened fruits, clustering grapes, trees and vines and outspread fields, and hillsides lit by the slanting sun. For us earth ripens her harvests; for us the corn grows yellow on the ear; for us the sunbeam paints rosy red the apple's cheek and golden yellow the heads of grain; for us the winds fetch perfume from the south, the waters catch the kisses of the sun, the robe of Mother Earth is oft renewed, changed from the green of spring to the rainbow hues of autumn; for us all forms and forces blend themselves to make the harmony of life. And shall man stand in solitude among these forms and voices? Ah, no! All these are brothers, fellows to the man. Fresh from creation's perfect mold, they teach him purity and truth. Unsullied by the taints of sin, they show him what himself might be. Unbought by gold, they preach to him of virtue, honor truth. They stand as teachers to his soul, and 'all their lessons are most holy writ.

Apart from men, but dwelling with God, amid all His myriad voices! Alone, but not alone. Companioned by the children of God, not yet prodigal to their Father's love. Say not that he who leaves behind the din and whirl of men, must stand alone. He leaves the images, but finds the dwelling place of God. He shuts his ears to the empty voices of babbling men, but opens his soul to the voices of God, full of divinest meaning. He goes from solitude into the company of all that is kindred to his soul. He is no longer the companion of men, but he becomes the companion of the Infinite and Eternal.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

A September Lane.

One time we left the dusty thoroughfare,
We two, and wandered down a country lane.
The fields on either hand lay brown and bare,
Shorn of their garnered wealth of golden grain.

But the green roadside was all thickly set
With purple iron-weed and with plummy grass,
Pert oxeye daisies, homely Bouncing-Bet—
No town belle but a genuine country lass.

Wholesome and sturdy,—here and there the coil
Of the wild grapevine and convolvuli;
Wood sorrel lifted up its green trefoil
And shapely golden cup to woo the bee.

A hurrying robin shook the graceful plume
Of goldenrod as it flew swift along,
Primroses pale exhaled a faint perfume
Ethereal as a strain of distant song.

Snapdragon in the hedgerow sought to hide;
And pennyroyal, and catnip with the dull
Green leaf and dusty bloom, grew side by side.
Of simple-sweet beauty all the place was full,

Such as fond Nature strews in hidden nooks,
Careless if human eye shall ever see;
And here and there the wasted summer brooks
Over the sun-cracked rocks stole silently.

Resting a moment—Do you mind the place?—
Under a thorn-tree set with spikes blood-red,
With keen far glancing eye you sought to trace
The path, and pondered if it homeward led.

Then I, because my thoughts were often rife
With wanton questionings of the future, cried:—
"Will this long lane be like our lot in life?
For see—we know not whither it will guide,

"But blindly trace its length with lingering feet.
Ah yes, I feel our life is like the lane—
Not grand or great, but calm and homely-sweet."
And mind you how you answered me again?

"Love, if it be, we'll take them as they come—
The common blessings that may fill our lot,
And be so happy in our quiet home
The joys of greater lives shall be forgot.

"See—though the path by us be all untried,
The eternal heavens smiling o'er it bend;
And the same Power that decked the green wayside,
Will it not lead us onward to the end?"

CINCINNATI, O.

Religion and Politics.

We hear a good deal about politics and as much about religion of late, yet when we see a clergyman engaging in political life or interesting himself in the current problems of our civilization—those problems which remain for the people to solve by their suffrages—we are apt, unless broad in intellect, to decide such action or such conduct unwise, or at least imprudent. People seem to feel, or rather a few people seem to believe, that the province of a clergyman is the pulpit. And they go so far as not only to criticise the clergymen who are at all inclined to be public spirited or take hold of public affairs, but also to withdraw their support, even slander and misrepresent them. Note the remark, which the Rev. Hugh O. Pentecost made in this city when he addressed the united labor party, and congratulated it upon the unanimous nomination of Henry George for secretary of state, that he was so hampered by the requirements of a comparatively narrow field that he would be glad if some power would excommunicate him, so that he could be free to act as he pleased. This declaration was a naked hint at the seclusive life of a clergyman and the expression of a long and pent-up dissatisfaction which has residence in the life of more than one minister. It showed that there was a desire on the part of the clergy to be broader than their pulpits, while there was, on the part of the congregation, an effort to abridge their privileges, control their ambition, circumscribe their mission, and mark out the duties of their life. Of course, such zealous and uncalled-for advice or effort is highly appreciated by the ministry. Public teachers, who are paid to teach, treasure the suggestions of their pupils and listen to their murmurings rather than to the commands of their own conscience and judgment. The truth of the whole matter is in this: Politics has become another name for jobbery, rascality, demagogism. Hence our good and pious people think that a clergyman will soil his hands, corrupt his heart and sink into a general demoralized state of being by meddling with politics.

And yet, what other means have we by which we can mold humanity in general, or guide the state, or legislate, or re-write the laws, than by the ballot, and how are men to be convinced of the wrong of bad, ignorant or careless voting? how are they to be directed in regard to correct and fair political action, if those who know what right is and who stand up before the world as paragons of manhood and truth-giving teachers, are denied the privilege of declaring the truth wherever and whenever it may be expedient or proper? If right is right in religion, it is right in politics, and a congregation who would deny their pastor a hearing outside of the church, or refuse to retain him as their minister if he, in the streets or in a hall, unmasked error and gave humanity what to him seems to be the dictates of his reason and conscience, ought to hire a fool for a teacher or change their tactics. It is generally believed that politics is a machine to be run by practitioners, whether pure or corrupt, and this opinion obtains among the more intelligent people, who declare that a decent man will hardly run for office, because offices are the gift of the ward demagogue, the saloon and the boodle leaders or mugwumps of a party. And in a particular this comparison is offensively true. And therefore, again, there is a demand for those rightminded men who will, by their eloquence and logic, change the current of public opinion and give intelligence to the political action of the masses of mankind.

But some men love half measures or compromises. As Herbert Spencer asserts in his social statics, if they were asked whether the earth turns on its axis from east to west or from west to east, they would reply, "A little of both," or "Not exactly either." They hate positive statements. And so they would like to see the clergy steal up to the polls and deposit their ballot secretly. These people would be terribly offended if they should learn that dear Reverend So-and-So tried to convince Mr. Brown that his party was in the wrong; that the party for which he cast his vote represents a nobler idea, or a more feasible and constitutional platform. I deem it,—and by saying so, I represent a majority of the ministry,—that it is a part of the everlasting duty of a clergyman to preach the truth fearlessly. He may choose the occasion or the opportunity for the declaration of truth, yet he is a coward whether in or out of the pulpit, for a salary or for a congregation, for precedent or for popularity, to varnish it, to attempt to reconcile it to error or make it justify the wrong. A clergyman can not afford, nor can he, without injury to himself, straddle two horses going two different directions. And it was against this tendency among the rabbis and hypocrisy of the pharisees and sadducees that Jesus hurled many rebukes and paid a glowing tribute to the fishermen who had abandoned their boats and nets and had dared to take up the cross and follow him. Religion means duty to one another and to God—and in a collective sense to individuals constituting a state, a society or a nation. Woe be to the man who refuses to speak in season thoughts which he knows may help to decide the destiny of humanity. And woe be to the high priests of this nineteenth century who for self-aggrandizement live for Mammon and not for God. The pulpit should stand for the seat of truth, and from it in earth as from the very throne of deity, if throne we may suppose God has, should issue justice without disguise.

"Then I said—'O Lord, I am Thine,
And wait but the word from Thee;
But why are Thy looks divine
So searchingly turned on me?'"

"Then he spake, and with kind command,
His words as the dew came down—
'Brother, the day is at hand,
Lay hold on the Cross and the Crown!'"
J. C. F. GRUMBINE.

The Compensations of the Country.

(From a paper read before a Farmers' Institute held at River Falls, Wis., December 1, 1886, on "What Can the Farm Do For the Girl.")

. . . I take it for granted that the baby girl in the country belongs to the same species as the baby girl anywhere else, and is capable of like development. That the baby girl is to be trained in directions which will increase her happiness as a woman. That happiness for woman, as well as for man, lies in the direction of greatest helpfulness, not in the path of greatest helplessness. That greatest helpfulness results from fullest development of the physical, mental, and moral nature of the individual.

Emerson in his essay on compensation says: "Every excess causes a defect. Every defect an excess. Every sweet has its sour, every evil its good. Every faculty which is a receiver of pleasure has an equal penalty in its abuse. For everything you have missed you have gained something else, and for everything you gain you lose something." If Emerson's doctrine is a true one, and I believe it is, what are the compensations that a home on the farm renders to the growing girl? Can this home build up, round out, and complete the character which will result in a happy womanhood? Let us first see what she loses from her environments when compared with her more fortunate city sister. She loses the stir, the impulse to step faster because of the throng which presses all around one, the education which comes with scarcely an effort through the channel of the eye and the ear, from the busy, crowded streets, the familiarity with men and things, choice of companions, co-operative study and work, ripe thoughts from the living lips of wise men, inspiring music, the master play, the art gallery; yes, all these and many things more does our country girl miss which tell in the growth of her city sister. And yet, for all that, I do not regret that the first sixteen years of my life were spent on the farm, far from all these educational means. For all that, I count it a loss which cannot be made good if a few weeks of each summer's vacation are not mine at the old homestead, and for all the delight the city has for me, I expect to spend, if anywhere, a peaceful and contented old age where I spent my youth.

In place of the city sights and sounds, with its bustle and endless change, the country girl has the blue sky, the fleecy cloud, the glowing sunset, the majestic storm, the miracle of budding leaf and flower, the mystery of the burning bush of autumn, the ice and snow crystals of winter, the hum of insects and the sweet carol of birds.

She may not have the delightful companionship of chosen friends of her own age, but the possibility of hurtful companionship is made less, and tender home ties may nowhere else be so closely bound. To me at the old home, nothing could compensate as I see it, for the constant companionship of my mother, made possible by her freedom from the demands of society. The walks with her in meadow and wood, the fairy lore of a distant land that she then taught me; her descriptions of the picturesque scenery of her native home beyond the sea; its castles and its cottages; its peat beds and its fairs, so interwoven with stories of her own home life there, were all so vivid to me, that sometimes now, it seems to me, I must have once breathed the mountain air of Wales, though I was born in the forest wilds of Wisconsin, and have never crossed the briny sea.

No evening service in a finely equipped church could awaken more true devotion than the Sunday evening circle in our early home, when seated around the large table with father and mother as teachers, and brothers and sisters as classmates, I learned to read in the language of the distant fatherland the entertaining Bible. I needed no better incentive than my father's hand on my head and his "Well done, my girl," from his lips. A compensation for the concert we missed came afterward in the dear old Welsh hymns which our father and mother sang for us, the notes of which recalled now in our vacation days, will bring tears to the eyes of any one of the old circle.

How dear to my heart are the scenes of my childhood,
When fond recollection presents them to view,
The orchard, the meadow, the deep tangled wild-wood,
And every loved spot that my infancy knew.

The strength which one receives from an anchorage in one's youth to one place, to a few familiar haunts, is frequently dwelt upon by George Eliot, whose early home was in the country. We need but to read the table of contents in a collection of Whittier's poems, or those of the Cary sisters, to recall how these simple sights and experiences of country life inspired their pure thought and noble song.

Incomparable are the advantages of a country girl for physical development. Pure air, fresh, unadulterated food, outdoor work and pastimes, better conditions for sleep, should make her superior to her city sister in the great essential of a sound body.

* * * * *

Not all the correctives I have tried to hint at are enough to prevent occasional unrest and weariness. The preacher, the merchant, the lawyer and teacher would grow rusty and crusty if they never took a vacation. The necessity which comes to all workful lives for occasional periods of rest and change of scene is less recognized by farmers than it should be. The woman's sphere in the home is necessarily most narrow and confining, and she it is, who from lack of it grows cross, hopeless, morbid, insane. That a woman's home and work are on a farm is no reason that the city and its attractions should be a blank to her. Here comes in the beautiful law of reciprocity. Her country home is a haven of comfort, rest and enjoyment to her city friend and the city home of her friend becomes a complement of her own, supplying the change and recreation which she needs.

A healthy body, habits of industry, a business tact, a strong attachment to home, a cultured mind, a helpful spirit, a loving, reverent soul, these all may the farm bring to the girl. Need I suggest what the girl thus developed may bring to the farm? You who have a loving daughter that is the light and life of your home, know what she does bring to the farm, with all her frailties, now. You who have a patient, faithful wife, a tender, self-sacrificing mother, know what she will bring to the farm home of the future when one worthy of her shall ask her to share and bless it.—Ellen C. Lloyd Jones.

Call it the "Voice of God" or human wisdom, did not the teachings of Moses come out of the expectation and discontent of his people? Were not the prophets impelled by strife and failures to look for further revelations of the still Unknown Being they feign would worship? Was not the blessed Jesus, however human or divine, a witness for the meek, the merciful, the pure in heart, the peacemaker? Did not Shakespeare find his Othellos and Desdemonas, Dickens his Oliver Twists, Little Nells, Gradgrinds and Pickwicks? Victor Hugo had the whole surging French nation in his heart, out of which to write his books. Emerson was a voice for the million. He knew and loved those who sat at his feet. Mr. Alcott knew he was talking for the world, and Miss Alcott is aware that Mrs. Jo is like other mothers and her boys like other boys. Newton was not the only man who wondered why things should fall. Not alone Copernicus watched the skies, and others besides Columbus looked longingly over the seas. The secrets of retort and crucible have been sought by midnight laborer as well as by alchemist in his laboratory. Impressions in soil and rock, and varieties and classes in nature are found by the lonely wanderer as well as by the commissioned and attended explorer. Distances, weights and momentums are calculated by workmen as by architect. Signs, cycles and space are studied by sailors as by scholars. Thus discoveries proceed, theology loiters, and truth grows; while errors slowly disappear as dust when shaken from the petals of a rose or brushed from statues of stone.

Ignatius Donnelly's Comet.

Prof. Alexander Winchell, in the September Forum, dissects a book called "Ragnarok," by Ignatius Donnelly. This book is a sort of pseudo-scientific romance, intended to prove that the superficial accumulation which the geologists call "drift" was brought to the earth by a comet. Professor Winchell says of the book: "It is worth reading; at least, if one wishes chiefly to be amused by an extraordinary association of facts and legends and conclusions. If one never saw a square plug fit a round hole, here is a rare opportunity. Literature has never been the field of equal jugglery. He arrays so much that is true in science, and genuine in legend, and wise in proverb, and excellent in style, that if he means his book for a scientific romance, it is one of the most successful ever set afloat; while, if he means it as a sober argument for a striking theory, it stands by the side of 'Paradise Found' as a phenomenal aggregation of varied learning sundered from its conclusions. Is it harmless to inculcate fable with such gravity that a majority of readers accept it for fact? Does science receive no prejudice from an exposition as attractive and baseless as a romance, but dressed in the conventional garb of genuine science?"

When the professor gets through with the book, it remains as a romance, but is annihilated as a work of science. Many other popular books might well be submitted to the furnace fires of similar analysis, and their false and harmful character shown. Mr. Donnelly is not the only one who romances in the guise of science.

Use and Abuse of the Bible.

Between 3000 and 2000 years ago, a sacred literature sprang up among the Hebrew people; it grew to be a collection of 39 books,—legend, law, history, poetry, prophecy, philosophy. It flooded the mind of the nation like a fertilizing stream; it shone in their firmament like a sun; it gradually acquired a mysterious authority as the Word of God—the only Oracle—the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. But then it became a stumbling-block; for this false theory of scripture as a finality closed the minds of the people to further light and chained them to the past. When a new prophet arose, charged with fresh inspiration, and calling them to advance, they stood still in their tracks. "Abraham was our father; Moses our law-giver; God has said his last word long ago."

So the new prophet was killed and Judaism stiffened into an arrested development.

But the new life was not killed; and it produced more sacred books, with a new mixture of history, legend, gospel, prophecy, sublime morality and divine humanity. The New Testament went the way of the Old. From being a fountain of light and comfort, it became a rigid authority, a fetter upon the mind, a padlock upon the lips, and a quarry of building material for dogmatists. There are millions who go to it not merely for the spiritual nourishment which both Testaments and all noble literature supply, but for literal truth mathematically expressed; taking for God's exact law and word their own interpretations of the English translation of the Greek translation of the Aramaic speech of Jesus, as it survived in the memory of his anonymous reporters. A wonderful and glorious survival indeed,—radiant with a light which no clouds can quench; but still a light reflected and transmitted through a medium quite fallible and imperfect; namely, the ambiguous language of man.

"The letter killeth; the spirit giveth life." And the spirit ever speaks through the letter,

"As sunbeams stream through liberal space."

The spirit of truth within us must be the interpreter of every record, and must help us to winnow the wheat from the chaff. The Word of God—the truth, the reason, the wisdom, by which men and angels live—abideth forever. That word is in the ancient books; it is in the modern mind; it is hidden in our hearts; it is old as eternity; it is young as the morning.—Charles C. Ames, in the 1887 "Year Book" of his church.

THE STUDY TABLE.

A Great Book.

Similar to the feelings raised when first seeing the mountains or the sea, are those inspired by the reading of a great book. As in the first case, nature has become elevated in our minds, so in the latter, has human nature. Is it not Emerson who says, "Reading a great work, we are for the time being the noble hero?" Victor Hugo mentions how a high literary production shows us mankind as worthier than we had supposed, we partaking of that worth. Thinking in this direction, cannot we decide upon the test of a great book? It will leave us thinking more nobly of men, and somewhat more devoted to the true than we were before.

I had heard so much of Tolstoi's tragic "Anna Karenina," and of the harrowing effect it would leave on the mind, I was loth to read it. Yet the middle weeks of August will ever be memorable to me as having made the acquaintance of that wonderful book. I should not think of calling it harrowing, but that the first statement with regard to it should be: It gives one of the greatest ethical teachings with more power than almost any modern novel.

Can any one point to any book that shows more clearly the power of the individual, exclusive of circumstances, to make or mar life? In almost all works of fiction, circumstances play an important part in the moulding of destinies. But here we seem to see the two souls, independently, almost, slowly evolving, one toward purity and peace, the other toward sin and sorrow. The novelist has placed them in fine juxtaposition, and our hearts are so linked with both, that when we read of Levin, we share with childish freedom his simple joys, and when we read of Anna, we know the passion and the unrest. Even when Levin is disappointed in love, or contemplates suicide, there is such an absence of bitterness and gnawing remorse we cannot feel wholly unhappy for him; we can turn to his palliatives with abandon, swing the scythe all day with the peasants, eat the dry bread, drink from the rusty dipper the brook water warmed by the sun and tasting of the floating grass, crying, "There was never so sweet a draught!" Every little detail of his home life we take an interest in. (We shouldn't think of calling these particulars inartistic.)

good. We care a great deal more about his succeeding in his quest than we do about his marrying Kitty. In most novels we should have been shocked at the husband's finding his wife so different from his ideal, but here it only adds a vivid, poetic touch to the picture of Levin's development. The book ends with a ringing word of hope, and, even after reading of Anna's pitiful fate, one closes it with that stirring word sounding clearest.

But Anna! What a fascinating, sad heart! Strong must be the hand that could lead her along that career. The real novelist loves his characters, and we almost fancy Tolstoi himself weeping, as day by day that brilliant, delicate mind succumbed to the dread fate. She makes us all her lovers from the first. In that interview with Dolly, when, glowing with health and beauty and affection, she tells how she could forgive the mortal offence that wronged woman was suffering, we see the exaltation of her nature. In the reaction of that nature from the passion that is alluring her, when she decides to return at once to her home, where her little boy shall keep her safe, how we sympathize with her! But alas! the fatal step has already been taken. It is the first step that ruins, "the little rift within the lute." How plainly we are shown that in this book. No amount of good resolutions afterward availed. Indeed, did she not very soon pass to the place where resolutions are impossible? Some one has remarked how Goethe taught the same truth in the "Elective Affinities",—the significance of just that answering look or hand clasp. Tolstoi does not leave us in any doubt that Anna knew her sin from the first. He lets us see, also, how the mind that thus chooses sin knows that it can not escape punishment. Anna took no means toward reinstating herself in the society whose laws she had violated. How impotent all such efforts would appear to the self-torturing mind! And we may not regret Anna's pain. It would be insensibility to suffering where sin has been committed that we should regret. Frightful would have been the condition and the lesson, had any of the results of her sin been less than the writer's faithful hand has here depicted.

Yet the picture, realistic as it is, leaves in the mind a poetic memory, second only to that of Francesca in Dante's "Inferno."

Another Lesson from Miss Phelps.

The best lessons taught by the writer, poet or preacher, are often of an incidental character, and quite apart from his conscious object and intention. Miss Phelps makes the problem of man's spiritual existence after death the subject of her latest volume, "Between the Gates,"* as of two preceding works with similar titles, and different readers will find the lesson she aims to teach in this respect of differing degrees of use and value. For myself, I find the incidental lesson on the moral weight and significance of words of sufficient importance to justify the existence of the book, quite aside from the graver topics with which it deals, and its literary and artistic merit. "Between the Gates", is the story of a disembodied spirit, known on earth as Dr. Esmerald Thorne, a busy and successful physician, and in philosophy a strict scientist, as that term is construed in the teachings of modern materialism. Late in life he experienced the one ideal passion of his life in the love of a woman—one of those strong, delicate womanly creatures Miss Phelps loves to portray—who afterward became his wife. Three years of married life passed, full of poetic inspiration and happiness, bringing to them one beautiful child, a boy. But great as this happiness was, it could not undo the work of years and change the quick, impetuous, domineering character of the successful doctor into one of constant thoughtfulness and courtesy, such as befits the married lover and the gentleman at his own fireside. Loving his wife more than ever, and with a chivalrous devotion that converted her into mingled goddess and saint, Esmerald Thorne admits that, dear as his happiness was, he came in time to "get used to it." The cares of a hurried professional career crept inside the home, and having been a nervous, exacting man before marriage, he remained the same after. One evening he reaches home unusually worn and out of sorts, in that irascible frame of mind which the slightest circumstance provokes to intemperate speech. He is annoyed at his wife, for compelling him, through her loving habit of waiting for him, to come home at all, when he could ill spare the time. He is in a rage against some of his fellow-practitioners who have different ideas from his about the construction of the new hospital. He is angry because he is served with quails for supper instead of a nutritious roast. He has lost money on Stock street; and upbraids his wife because she will not take his word for it that the teething boy up-stairs is not really sick, only fretful. Other women trust his word implicitly in such matters—why can not she? And so he hurries out of the house, to take the reins of a restive horse, which dashes down the street with him in a mad runaway, upsetting and instantly killing him.

Shorn of the flesh, yet filled with agonized remorse for the sins committed in it, Esmerald Thorne looks back on his life, and admits that he was always an irritable man—one of those who was "quick" with servants, and who often spoke with scornful impatience to his nearest friends, who excused it on the ground that that was one of the Doctor's "peculiarities." The habit began when he was a boy, a bright, precocious youth, and his mother's idol, who petted and deferred to him even in his babyhood. His father was an irritable man before him, and he, the son, had early conceived the idea that this kind of fault was the natural prerogative of masculinity. What a frequent hint for reflection is here. Esmerald Thorne's is not the only household where the quick, authoritative tone which bespeaks instant attention on the part of all the female members, is that naturally permissible to masculine lips. With women, Esmerald Thorne's tone was necessarily that of the master, since, until he met his wife, he had known only sick women, who clung to and depended on him like children. Helen seemed the first well woman he had ever seen, and above and around her absolute physical well-being glowed a kind of moral radiance. And he loved her—loved her truly, with strong, manly passion, and a romantic fondness. The account of his despair and remorse when, being dead, he finds it impossible to atone for the crime of that last leave-taking, reads, as I heard some one say, like the description of a Protestant purgatory. All the repentant husband's being is strained and tortured with the single desire to return to earth and make things right with Helen; but this, according to Miss Phelps' knowledge of the laws of our coming existence, is denied him. Hating interference and authority when alive, Esmerald Thorne rebels against it no less when dead. Heaven's joys and mysteries are naught to him until he can see his wife and obtain her forgiveness. But this is not to be; and slowly and painfully this arrogant, self-seeking spirit learns the difficult virtue of humble obedience. The work of regeneration then begun, his wish to atone takes on a more unselfish form,—that of a desire to be made a visiting ministrant to the human homes of earth, there to teach the "sacred graces of human speech,—the preciousness and poignancy of words." He would "emphasize the opportunity of those who love each other—set the whole force of a man's experience and a spirit's power to make an irritable scene in loving homes as degrading as a blow." To such an apparently humble, but glorious, ambition had all the talent, experience and fame of the renowned physician come at last.

Speaking of the effect which mere words may have on a sensitive soul, Doctor Thorne says of himself he might as well have struck his wife as have compelled her to submit to this kind of "moral pummeling," doubting if he would have proved a less amiable fellow had he "worn cowhide boots and kicked her." For him, a man of learning and judgment, a loving and careful husband, and withal a supposed gentleman, the sin had been as great. "I, with what I was pleased to term my high organization and special training—I, like any brutal kind, had berated my wife—had belabored her with the bludgeons that bruise the life out of women's souls."

Not women's souls only! Often the most sensitive, as the most loving, nature in the household's is the man's, and the

*BETWEEN THE GATES. Elizabeth Stuart Phelps. Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Boston. $1.25.

"moral pommeling" comes from another source. By many, irritability would be set down as a fault more native to women than to men; but I have no interest in computing differences of that kind, feeling sure that no fault nor virtue is the exclusive birthright of either sex. The power to feel constitutes the basis of character in both man and woman, and great and inexcusable as Jesus made the offending of "these little ones" is the sin of wounding the heart that loves us. Unhappily, the instinct of cruelty remains after we have, in very shame, dropped its old barbarous means of expression. The tongue is an abiding possession after the lash and whipping post have been abolished. That instrument of keenest torture and malice awaits our training into the practice of those daily amenities of human speech which enter everywhere into the converse of truly-enlightened and cultivated souls. Esmerald Thorne had to die before he discovered how grave a fault, and merciless in its results, his of swift, intemperate speech was; but the rest of us, instructed by his example, whether we accept the main facts of his narrative or not, may learn it sooner, and need not wait for his excuse for repenting of and mending it.

CELIA PARKER WOOLLEY.

"CONSCIOUS MOTHERHOOD," by Miss Emma Marwedel, is the initiatory volume of the great work on which she has been practically engaged for the last five years, "The introduction of children to the forms and poetry of nature," by their own inventive work in drawing during their earliest years in the kindergarten and primary school. This volume is the most adequate response to Froebel's great discovery of method that has been written, and shows the author to be altogether his superior disciple in philosophic insight, artistic genius, and the enthusiasm of humanity. Every mother, every father, as well as every radical statesman, will find it a most inspiring manual. Her chapters on the statistics of crime, insanity, idiocy, etc., are most appalling, and show that her ideality does not shut her eyes to the morose facts that stare us in the face from all parts of our own country. It seems to me that the book will make a new era and give a new character to our civilization. It is published by the Inter-State Co., 30 Franklin street, Boston, and also in Chicago, and for $1.50 will be sent postpaid to any address. It is a book of 563 pages.

"EARTH outgrows the mythic fancies
Sung beside her in her youth;
And those debonnaire romances
Sound but dull beside the truth.
Phœbus' chariot-course is run;
Look up, brothers, to the sun!
Truth is fair; shall we forego it?
Do we right to sigh for wrong?
God himself is the best poet,
And the real is His song."

CORRESPONDENCE.

DEAR UNITY:—As, perhaps, there are those who would be pleased to hear something of the progress of liberal sentiment in my post-office parish, I would first say, for the gratification and encouragement of my co-workers in the cause of liberal Christianity, that the present outlook is altogether favorable. I could command a large territory did my financial means justify it, but I find very much to encourage me. Besides numerous large packages of Unitarian literature, which I obtain from the American Unitarian Association, I am receiving almost every week packages of tracts, Registers, Reviews and UNITIES, from the ladies—of Boston, Cincinnati, Chicago, and other points. These, in turn, I am continuing to distribute in my own locality, and to send off, as well, to other localities. There are large numbers of liberal thinkers in and around Jamestown who enjoy this kind of literature, among the number a young, promising and intelligent physician, upon whose mind I think I am making deep impressions. I have a lady correspondent at Moberly, Mo., to whom I sent another package last week, who rejoices in the Unitarian belief. There is also another lady at Frankton, Ind., an Adventist, with whom I am exchanging tracts and papers, and of whom I have some faint hopes. May God speed the good work.

THE HOME.

Boys and Homes.

Every now and then one reads, in the best papers, false sentiments about boys and their relations to their homes. They are spoken of as if they are wholly devoid of the sense of responsibility that even the ordinarily trained boy ought to possess; as if the ingenuity of every member of the family need be taxed to devise means for keeping them, especially in the evening, in the home where certainly one might suppose they ought to expect to be at seasonable hours. I think a great deal of harm is done by articles suggesting to sisters how to keep their brothers at home in the evening, or to mothers offering hints for making home attractive to their sons. It would be far better to propose to the boys themselves methods for helping to make home a pleasant place!

Not long ago, a little lad of twelve was trying to persuade his mother to allow him to play on the street with his mates after dark. When other arguments had failed, he said, "But home is so dull! The ——" (naming a paper his mother valued) "says, no wonder boys don't care to stay home in the evening, so little is done for them to amuse them, and that's why some boys get into rough company." The mother lifted the boy's face toward her own, and looked deep down into his eyes. Said she, "My child, what kind of a boy would he be who made a dull home the excuse for joining rough companions?" "Not a good one, of course," said the truthful little lad, blushing.

Why can not those writers who are so anxious for the welfare of our boys speak the truth? Why write as if there were really some excuse for their entering into evil ways? There is no reason why a boy should feel less than a girl his obligations to the home. If the home is dull, why urge upon the daughter alone to enliven it? Why not urge upon both son and daughter? Some homes are dull. Fathers and mothers have strenuous labors and cares. When evening comes they require rest. Who should enliven such homes? The weary mother, or just the daughter? Why should not the son set his young brain to work to "make things pleasant?" There is a suggestion of weakness in that mother, who, having done her duties faithfully through the day, and with every faculty used to its utmost limit, yet compels herself to overwork for the sake of keeping her son from spending his evenings with evil associates. Why has she not trained him concerning his duties to the home? And in those zealous writers of advice to mothers and daughters one detects a lack of earnest thought, deep thought, upon this subject. Let the appeals be made to the boys themselves. Few boys are so devoid of a sense of honor but that a few honest words to them would set the matter before them in its true light. No honorable boy would accept from mother and sister offices that really were his own to perform. Say to the boys that it is their trust to help make the home a cheerful place in the evening,—that father and mother, busy for them all day, have a right to sometimes expect entertainment from them, finding in their society and plans relaxation from cares that often press too heavily. No true boy, who can be made to feel the truth of this, will ever need to have his mother or sister advised as to means of keeping him in the house evenings.

The trouble seems to be that boys are not taught to feel their responsibility in this direction. They need to be approached as if they had more character and sense of duty. The best thing I have lately read, written for the benefit of boys, was by Mr. Blake, about manly boys. I wish that gentleman would speak further. I read his words to two boys I know, and a certain expression of the eyes told me that they had an effect. Perhaps Mr. Blake will tell his view of boys' duties toward the home.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Chicago.—The winter's work of the Unity Club of All Souls Church has fairly begun. Last Sunday the pastor preached, in accordance with a suggestion made some months ago by the Unity Club Bureau, "On the Importance of the Intellectual Life," and on Monday evening the parlors of the church overflowed with upwards of a hundred people at the first session of the Emerson Section, where Mr. Gannett led the conversation on "How to get into Emerson and what you find when you get there." The talk was a memorable one to those who heard it, and the enthusiasm looking towards future study was great in the club. —The Third Church has just put out its annual for 1887-88; a very neat pamphlet of 36 pages, which shows the careful hands of diligent workers everywhere. Every meeting of the church, with the exception of the Sunday morning services, from September 29 to June 29, is put down. The work of the church is divided into four sections, social, charitable, Sunday-school and missionary. The Unity Club is to confine its study entirely to Unitarian history and doctrine. The studies are arranged for fourteen evenings, five of them given to Unitarianism in the Bible, three to Unity with three manifestations, three to the mediatorial view of Unitarianism, and three to the humanitarian view. There is a Longfellow class that is to study Ivanhoe and Rienzi, a musical club which is to have a Schubert, Rubenstein and Mozart evening, a young people's club to attend to the good time. The annual contains a directory of the parish and associate organizations. If one wants to see how a church may be put to work, let him send for one of these annuals to James Vila Blake, corner Monroe and Laflin streets.

—The subject at the noon teachers' meeting was the temptation of Jesus, Mr. Blake leading. He began by calling attention to the change of significance of the rite of baptism in the Christian church. At first it implied a confession of the Messiahship of Jesus. Then it came to mean the washing away of sins. So firm became this belief that many postponed their baptism to as late a date as possible, that it might wash away the more sins. This motive is assigned to Constantine, who is reputed to have kept a priest near him in case of an emergency, so that his baptism might pass him into heaven clean. Mr. Blake also noticed the change in the thought of Satan, from being an angel of the Lord, used to test the virtue of his children, to an adversary who had dominion over the unregenerate world. Of the story of the temptation, Mr. Blake said it must be understood as veritable history, allegorical or poetical representation of an inward experience, or a mythical growth springing out of the loving hearts of the people and accepted as true by the writer of Luke. Two pleasant episodes occurred during the session. One, an exhibition by Mr. B. B. Wiley, of the Third church, of some beautifully mounted flowers from the neighborhood of Jerusalem; some ancient coin, that was perhaps the widow's mite; also the reading of a letter from one who was once a resident of Chicago, and now living in Jerusalem, awaiting the literal fulfilment of every Messianic promise in the Bible. The second was the entering of Mr. Batchelor with the old time smile and cheer. His presence was very welcome, and his clear word in the discussion was helpful as always.

The Chicago Women's Unitarian Association met on Thursday, Sept. 29, at the church of the Messiah, the president, Mrs. S. W. Conger, in the chair. The attendance was unusually large for the first meeting, more than a hundred ladies being present. Lunch was served at half-past twelve, after which the meeting was called to order, the minutes of the last meeting read and accepted. The following resolutions were offered by Mrs. Woolley:

WHEREAS, Since our last meeting our sister, Mrs. E. John Fry, has passed away from our midst, we in loving remembrance offer the following:

Resolved, That in her gentleness, humility, and transparent goodness, we recognize a character of rare worth and beauty.

Resolved, That we extend to her sorrowing relatives our sincere sympathy in the great loss they have sustained.

And of our sister, Mrs. Charles F. Weber, it is also with tender memory

Resolved, That from her sincere and noble character we derive a high and inspiring example, and that we extend to her family our heartfelt sympathy in their sorrow.

Mrs. Jones reported happily on current religious events for the month. She spoke of the accession of Dr. Townsend, of Jamestown, N. Y., to our ranks; of the absorption of the New Theology Herald by UNITY; of the growth of liberal sentiment in England; of the manufacture and use of soap in the Holy Land, and the rise in corner lots in Jerusalem, as hopeful indications of progress. Mrs. E. A. West, of the Third church, then read an able and instructive paper on temperance work in Unitarian churches. She spoke first of the imperative need of temperance agitation, as seen in the eighteen miles of saloon front in the city of Chicago; of the fifteen millions spent annually in drink, besides the time wasted in dissipation, and the enfeebled constitutions of children born of intemperate parents, of the fact attested by the officers of the Women's Reformatory at Sherborn, Mass., that ninety-seven in a hundred of the inmates were addicted to drink; of the frequency with which judges call attention to the fact that the great proportion of crime is committed under the influence of intoxicants. She then gave some account of the formation of the Church Temperance Society at the National Unitarian Conference at Saratoga, and of its anniversary meeting at Tremont Temple, Boston, with extracts from the valuable addresses delivered on that occasion by Governor Long, Rev. E. E. Hale, Rev. M. J. Savage, Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, and Rev. J. L. Jones. Previous to the formation of the Church Temperance Society two churches had formed societies: those of Dorchester, Mass., and St. Paul, Minnesota. Thirty such societies have since been formed. Letters from Rev. C. A. Staples and Rev. Lyman Clark gave an account of temperance educational work done in their churches. Mrs. West also gave some facts relative to the use and effects of alcohol in medical practice, giving the opinion of eminent physicians that alcoholic spirits were unnecessary, and even harmful, and closed by referring to the benefits resulting from temperance agitation. Mrs. Butler, of Oak Park, followed in a paper on temperance work in Universalist churches, in which she showed that the ministry of that church had from the first been strenuous advocates of temperance, and had done good work for the cause; Pierpont, Ballou, Chapin, Miner, and others having been prominent and arduous laborers in the field. She also gave an interesting account of work for temperance in which the ladies of Oak Park Universalist church had joined with the W. C. T. U. in establishing a reading room where boys of the street were entertained and instructed in the most helpful way on nearly every evening in the week. Quotations from Channing's famous address on temperance were read by Miss Brown, after which a spirited discussion followed, in which Mrs. Blake, Mrs. Conger, Mrs. Jones, Mrs. Effinger, Mrs. West, Mrs. Galvin, and Miss Leavens took part. The association then adjourned to meet on the last Thursday in October, at the Third church. The meeting was full of interest and inspiration and all felt that the year's work had been most auspiciously begun.

Philadelphia.—With October 1st, the First church was opened, and the Spring Garden society added evening to morning services. This placed all the liberal organizations upon the active footing again, save Mr. Weston's, which is to resume its meetings later in the month. Clifford is to speak for Chadwick on the 9th.

—Unity church, Camden, is preparing for a fair in December, the income from which is designed for the building fund.

—Adler, Salter, Sheldon and Weston have been in consultation here the better part of a week upon matters attending the direction of the Ethical movement.

—Whatever may be thought of the significance of liberal organization in itself, the fact that Mr. Mangasarian's secession to the Unitarian from the Presbyterian church, the formation of the Camden Society, and the successful entrance of the society for ethical culture upon this new field, have marked the three or four years gone, virtually doubling the organized force of liberals, is a notable thing not wisely to be passed by.

—A great stir has been made in this city by certain irate Presbyterians who imagined some offense in the way the religious position of the Centennial Ceremonies in Independence square were arranged. It is the Popery, in particular, as discovered in Cardinal Gibbon's presence and prayer, that raised the alarm of these critics. Yet Chairman Kasson has explained that Presbyterians were in no way discriminated against, but that the matters as prepared were thought fair enough to all. The fact is, the Presbyterian would not have complained had some Methodist or Baptist been chosen in place of the cardinal. Indeed, they express themselves as feeling that the Catholic church is inimical to the liberty celebrated, and should therefore not be recognized in such ceremonies.

—The personal liberty party lately sprung into existence here, is organizing ward leagues which are likely to express their indignation, so far as possible, in political action.

—Mr. Haskell delivered an address on "Agnosticism" at Unity church, Camden, September 21, which was generous and inclusive, and deserved a larger hearing than it received there. I believe the Wednesday evening meetings are hereafter to be a feature in the church's programme.

H. L. T.

Boston.—The conference of Unitarian ministers at Princeton, Mass., creates a scarcity of the brethren this week at the A. U. A. rooms. A new edition of J. F. Clarke's tract entitled, "Why am I a Unitarian?" is now ready for gratuitous distribution by our A. U. A. secretary.

—On the first Sunday in October Rev. E. E. Hale will commence his pastorate over the joint body made up by his own society and the Hollis Street society. By Doctor Hale's removal from his old church a large territory at the south part of the city will be left without liberal preaching, except that of one Universalist church, and there is talk among our denomination of starting a modest new "People's church" within that district.

The Christian Life estimates that "$5,000,000 have been placed in the hands of Mr. Moody for Christian work, first and last." This money has been chiefly given for the purpose of keeping people out of hell. When will people be as willing to give as much "to keep hell out of the people?"—to borrow the startling antithesis of Mr. Calthrop.

CANNON FARRAR says that "drink, vice and mammon worship are bringing about by natural laws their own inevitable retribution, and unless remedies be found in our earnestness and in our self-denial, and in our promotion by every possible means of the common good of all, then the Huns and Vandals who shall shipwreck our civilization are being bred, not in the steppes of Asia, but in the slums of great cities."

ALLUSION is made elsewhere to the bust of Emerson in church. Why does not some Boston art-dealer, co-operating with Morse or some other sculptor in sympathy with the liberal faith, make available plaster casts, of uniform size, suitable for brackets and niches in churches and vestries, of the four major prophets of the liberal faith—Emerson, Channing, Parker and Martineau? We believe there would be call enough to warrant the venture.

REV. GRINDALL REYNOLDS, Secretary of the A. U. A., is soon to start on a visiting tour among the Unitarian churches of the Rocky mountain and Pacific slope regions. Rev. George Batchelor is already making a circuit of our churches in the northwest, and we believe it is his purpose to visit most of the churches of the Mississippi valley as a representative of the A. U. A. The visit of these gentlemen will do good to the churches, but we expect the churches will do them quite as much good. They will find wherever they go very little appetite for theological disputations, great readiness for the ethical unities that ripen into missionary zeal and co-operation on a non-doctrinal basis. We think the result of these gentlemen's visits will enable them to go back to the east and confidently affirm that they found no atheistic Unitarian churches out west, and that "one-half of the Unitarians out here are not skeptics." This good thing suggests the next good thing to do,—a tour of the eastern churches by some representative of our western work. Such a missionary tour would greatly augment the financial and spiritual missionary resources of our cause east and west. The west and the east need to exchange commodities, compare notes and go into heartier partnership for the regeneration of the world.

To Sunday-schools that are not already at work upon a course of lessons for the winter, we suggest the use of the short series called "The Christmas Poem and the Christmas Fact," by W. C. Gannett, price 5 cents. It is full of interesting "Bible Fairy Stories" which clustered about the birth of Jesus, and has just the tender and thoughtful word for the children that will deepen and make real to them the truth and joy of the Christmas season. The school beginning on them soon will find themselves delightfully prepared for the glad Christmas times.

A CORRESPONDENT in last week's Christian Register is shocked because a church in Minnesota has placed a bust of Emerson by the side of the pulpit. He says, "Doubtless the parish would object to seeing a painting or an image of Christ in such a place. They would be likely to say that it seemed too much like the idolatry of the Roman Catholic church." For the consolation of this correspondent we would say that there is a Unitarian church in Chicago, conservative enough to have Muncacsy's "Christ before Pilate" at the pulpit end of the church and a copy of Da Vinci's "Last Supper" at the other, and it would like to hang in the church a picture of the blessed Madonna, if it could procure a good one, the Sistine, for instance. Perhaps this correspondent would like to encourage this conservatism in the Unitarian church by forwarding to it a copy of this great picture.

IN the New York Independent of September 29, 1887, Prof. Frederic Wright, D.D., of Oberlin Theological Seminary, in his reminiscences of "Alaska Missions," gives us this "Creed of Jake," with high commendation. "Jake" was their faithful Indian guide, and was converted by Doctor Corlies, of Philadelphia; not by preaching dogmas to him, but by nursing him through a long spell of sickness.

This is the creed:

1. God is the boss of us fellers, and of every man—all.
2. God loves us fellers, and every man—all.
3. I feel in heart that I love God; my brother, my sister, and every man—all.
4. I wish every feller loved Jesus: then all good: no bad: no fight.

This creed of the untutored savage puts to shame the metaphysical speculations which have been inflicted upon the Christian church by well meaning but mistaken theologians.

A CORRESPONDENT in a St. Louis paper raises the alarm concerning the injudicious purchase of books in Sunday-school libraries again. He tells of a superintendent who to his horror had found that the book seller had insinuated the works of Oliver Optic, Horatio Alger, Miss Braddon, George Sand, even Ouida and Zola, into the Sunday-school library that was under careless administration;—but worse yet,—we allow the correspondent to tell the rest of the story in his own anxious words:

"But that isn't all or the worst of it," continued the superintendent. "Not long ago one of the teachers came to me and said her faith in orthodoxy had been very much shaken, and she did not know that she could conscientiously remain longer in the school. Several of her class were also losing their confidence in the old creed. She said this result had been reached by reading one of the books in the Sunday-school library. It was 'Bluffton,' and was the account of how a young Presbyterian minister had been converted to rationalism and had finally taken his congregation with him over to liberalism. I hunted up the work and read it. The author is the Rev. Minot J. Savage, the prominent and eloquent Boston Unitarian clergyman. The book is a remarkable one, and even made me feel uncomfortable, as hide-bound in Calvinism as I supposed I was. Investigation showed me that a score of our older scholars and several of the teachers had been very much impressed by the story and had been talking the subject over. The book is all the more effective because it is a faithful portrayal, as I understand, of Mr. Savage's personal experience. How the book got into our library I don't know, but I suppose the selections were made by some clerk in the publishing house of whom we purchased. He saw the book was by a minister and naturally presumed it was eminently fit. Right in our own city I have learned that 'Bluffton' is in half a dozen libraries and is doing deadly work to orthodoxy. Of course this sort of thing must stop. We may be placing antidotes to all our instruction in the scholar's hands. Sensational and immoral novels and infidel publications are certainly not in place in orthodox Sunday-schools. I suppose there are hundreds of superintendents in this country who are as ignorant and careless as I was, and that these objectionable books are being sent out to scores of schools this fall. It is really alarming, and you can readily understand how anxious I am to rectify the evil, as far as I can, in our school. I wish I could send a note of warning to other superintendents."

The Ideal.

Our ideals are more real than what we call the actual. Science is rapidly growing into such proportions that it considers the unattained possibilities of the Sermon on the Mount facts of as much importance in political science as the statistics of illiteracy. The problem of crime and criminals can not be solved until the criminal's dreams of excellence are taken into account, as well as his ignoble failures. An idealist is not an impractical soul, intoxicated with a heavenly ether that incapacitates him for homely duties, and blinds him to the light of clear reason and deliberate judgment. Indeed, these hard realities feed the ideal. Out of the shadows of sorrow and sin does the ideal life ever spring. Bruises teach the fledgling that dexterity of wing which eventually lifts it above the brambles and rocks. The stolid reality of to-day forms the stiff but fertile soil out of which the permanent ideals of the immortal life are to grow.

It follows, then, that the true measure of our life at any given time is the measure of our ideals. The outcome of our lives, individually and collectively, is not determined by what we have or what we are, but by what we want to be, and the loyalty with which we struggle toward that ideal. So long, then, as the human soul reaches after the unrealized, so long is it growing; but if the vision ever fades, then life flags and powers droop. This is the only thought of old age that is depressing,—the fear that possibly the hard experiences, the frequent disappointments, the loneliness and the hopes deferred will eventually make the heart sick, put out the fires of enthusiasm, and weaken our grasp upon life's ideals. Gray hairs are an ornament; stiffened limbs prepare the mind for the autumn feast that ought to follow a busy harvest; enfeebled eyesight is not so bad when the garnered mind hath less need of gleaners. But, oh, to have the world grow old and gray faster than we do! To have our faith in man totter as our limbs begin to tremble! To have the lime settle into the tissues of our heart and make that brittle as well as our bones! Oh, to have our loves changed to ashes! To have our eyes grow blind to things noble, to truth and to beauty—"To end our lives in days of withered prayer"—to borrow a phrase from Miss Cobbe, this is the old age that is infinitely sad. Outward things may perish without a pang, as they will;—only so we be rich in those inward things that grow more real as the material scaffolding falls away. We do stand on a narrow ledge of mortal time, where our minds may well grow dizzy with the thought of a fleeting world. It is true in a sense that we are spirits that are to be "Melted into thin air;

And like the baseless fabric of this vision,
The cloud-capped towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which inherit shall dissolve,
And, like the unsubstantial pageant, faded,
Leave not a rack behind. We are such stuff

As dreams are made of, and our little life
Is rounded with a sleep."

But there is that inward granite which in nature we call law, which in philosophy we call truth, which in morals we call right, and in religion we call God,—that endures for ever and for ever. And the ideals of the soul are the thoughts of God which we learn to think after Him.

"The word unto the prophet spoken
Was writ on tables yet unbroken,
The word by seers or sybils told
In groves of oak or fanes of gold,
Still floats upon the morning wind,
Still whispers to the willing mind.
One accent of the Holy Ghost
The heedless world hath never lost."

Fifty Years Ago.

As our political centennials are closing, American literature has entered on a semi centennial season. Bryant, Irving, Cooper, Channing, came earlier; but each year now from 1886 to 1890 is the fiftieth since some star-to-day well known in our firmament of letters began to shine. The men born in the first decade of the century,—Bancroft (1800), Emerson (1803), Hawthorne (1804), Longfellow (1807), Whittier (1808), Holmes (1809), were publishing their first fruits as young authors in 1836 to 1840. 1836 gave us Emerson's "Nature," Whittier's "Mogg Megone," and Holmes's first handful of his verses. 1837 heard Hawthorne's "Twice-told Tales." 1838 brought from Prescott (born 1796) his "Ferdinand and Isabella." Longfellow's "Voices of the Night" was published in 1839. Bancroft (born 1800) set out the first volumes of his history, and Edgar Poe (born 1811) his first collected stories, in 1840.

Among them all no book is likely to keep the dew upon it so long as the little "Nature," of which it took twelve years to sell the first five hundred copies. The year after this appeared, Emerson, then a young man of thirty-four, gave an address at Harvard College, which Doctor Holmes calls "our Intellectual Declaration of Independence." Its subject was "the American Scholar." The memory of its graceful cheer still lingers with the elder scholars of the country. The next year, 1838, and, again at Cambridge, he gave an address before the Divinity School, which might be called our Religious Declaration of Independence. It made a great commotion in the Unitarian circles of New England, which then were settling down, after their twenty years' struggle for spiritual freedom, in the belief that Christ was the author, and they the finishers, of faith. Upon this complacent mood Emerson's word broke, like a beautiful morning, with the assurance that there was a soul in man, source of all Bibles and all Christs, and unexhausted still,—a Soul that none of the churches preached.

Fifty years ago. To-day we read "the American Scholar" and wonder at "the breathless aisles" which listened so to it. The words are noble and are true, but to-day are the oxygen of the common air. The Divinity School address is now a Unitarian tract,—although that reads as fresh and morning-like as ever. So the pacing years have brought a semi-centennial upon us,—one that may worthily be noticed in our literary and religious circles. With this thought in mind, the programmes, printed on our Unity Club page this week and next, were prepared to assist a class at Hinsdale in the study of the two addresses, and they may be of service to some other class like-minded.

A Wayside Prophet.

While riding in a buggy through the country in northern Ohio a few days ago, we noticed that fences and bridges were adorned with various mottoes, painted in large letters, and calculated to arrest the eye of the spiritually indifferent. On the fence at a certain cross-road was printed "Prepare to meet thy God," and "Eternal life is free." On the stone abutment of a bridge appeared the startling injunction, "Repent or go to hell." Other mottoes at different places were,

"Repent, you wicked sinner," "Watch and pray," and "Let your light shine." On inquiry we learned that this is the work of a zealous old gentleman, who drives about in a canvas covered wagon, spreading, as he believes, the gospel of righteousness. There can be no doubt that some soul is startled occasionally out of its lethargy by a sight of one of these sentences. The farmer, driving his load of produce to the city, thinking of nothing but the state of the market, may be suddenly reminded that there are things above the sale of corn and potatoes. The butcher, driving his cattle to the slaughter-house, may suddenly recollect that souls, as well as bodies, must have food. The careless pedestrian, sauntering along, thoughtless of any save material wants, may be disagreeably confronted by the thought of spiritual needs. The comfortable man of the world, satisfied with his surroundings in time, may be reminded of an existence in eternity, wherein worldly goods confer no comfort. The sensualist, the drunkard, the robber and oppressor may be sometimes brought up standing by one of these wayside sermons. Scoffing will not obliterate the impression. The letters burn on the brain. Like an accusing spirit they follow the man, and will not down at his bidding. When he would laugh, they silence his mirth. He sees them in the bottom of the "social glass." They transform the faces of his former boon companions, and make them hideous. The seed sown by the wayside has taken root, and sometime must bear fruit in character. Such a work may these sentences on fence and stone perform. And if but one soul be made better, the patient painter will be rewarded.

Many may laugh at his zealous attempts to reform the world by printing his gospel on a board by the roadside; but is it more sensible to print it in a book? This man has put his message where he who runs may read. It will not be silenced, nor could any prophet scream louder. The flowers by the roadside speak the same, but men can not hear their voices. Cloud and sunlight, brook and meadow paint the same words, but men are blind to these,—they do not heed them. And so this wayside prophet goes forth to paint in characters which still mean something to human eyes (though even these are fast becoming meaningless) the gospel of righteousness. Do not call him over zealous, nor enthusiast. He recognizes the needs of the hour, and the blindness of men, and he conforms his conduct to these. When men can read the higher scriptures, his brush will not be needed. But when that time comes many pens will lose employment, and the hum of printing presses will be diminished. S. L.

A Peep at the Exposition.

Entering the Chicago Exposition, we were naturally drawn to the Woman's Department. After climbing the stairs we encountered a button-hole machine, which seemed to be doing admirable work, though, as button-holes were never a formidable undertaking to us, we were not particularly interested in this specialty; the woman, however, with feet on the treadle, demanded a halt and an inspection while she expatiated on its merits, of which we had no doubt, for our faith in sewing machines, indeed machinery of all kinds, is almost unbounded; but as we started to pass on she leaned over confidentially, and, holding out a little round box, remarked, "Here is something I make myself, so I can recommend it. It is a cream for the face and hands; will remove tan, freckles, pimples, or anything of the kind. Really, madam, you will find it quite harmless and valuable." We thanked her and turned once more, when she continued in a still more insinuating tone,—"It will also remove wrinkles;" but we assured her that our wrinkles had come to stay, while our little daughter marched on with nose tossed in the air, exclaiming, "The idea! how impertinent to insinuate that you have wrinkles!"

The Woman's Department was disappointing, as it always is—made up, as of necessity it must be, of the poor odds and ends of woman's work. The home cannot be transferred to an exposition; a mother's watchful care, a wife's loving co-operation, a sister's tender helpfulness cannot be placed on exhibition. The best work of woman is so subtle, so all-pervading, that it cannot be gathered together and placed in a show case any more than you can gather the ray of light that forms the life-giving sunshine, and so this department was disappointing though we were not disappointed, for how could it be otherwise? Woman's work as work we found, as it should be, placed in competition with other worker's work of its kind. In the Art Gallery she is represented by forty one artists and sixty-one pictures, the poorest of no mean merit, and all comparing favorably with the work of brother artists.

Looking out a number in our catalogue, a farmer came up and inquired, "Can you tell me what that is?" pointing to a picture, then turning to Miss Cheritree's "Return of the Flock" he exclaimed, "How natural! I've seen it hundreds of times. Seems as though the sheep were moving." His admiration of the animals was so evident that we remarked, "There is a Rosa Bonheur here." "A what?" he inquired. "A Rosa Bonheur; come this way." He left the sheep a little reluctantly, evidently expecting a floral piece. Well, if he didn't know Rosa Bonheur, he did know that bull—"Just perfect, ma'm, just perfect! Isn't it wonderful how the mind and hand of man can do these things," he said, and we left him lost in admiration—not of woman's work, but of the artist's work.

We have not space for mention of the really fine paintings on exhibition this year. There is Eastman Johnson's "Culprit," which needs no hint from the catalogue to tell its story. Brown's inimitable "Boys," Miss Stewart's "Relic of the Past," only to be met with in the south. Simmons's "Old Man and Child," and his wife's "Breton Children." One can never forget Harberger's "Poet and the Publisher"—pure business and clear frenzy. Bourge's "Cold Day," which made one long to invest in mittens for the street waifs. The human face can here be studied on canvas with every phase of feeling delineated; marine paintings many and excellent, landscapes full of peace and plenty. Altogether it is the finest collection we have ever seen in the Exposition.

Faith and Works.

Prof. Max Müller, in a recent address, said:

"I may claim that in the discharge of my duties for forty years (as professor of Sanskrit in the University of Oxford) I have devoted as much time as any man living to the study of the sacred books of the East. And I venture to tell this meeting what I have found to be the one key-note—the one diapason, so to speak—of all these so-called sacred books, whether it be the Veda of the Brahmins, the Puranas of Siva and Vishnu, the Koran of the Mohammedans, the Zendayesta of the Buddhists,—the one diapason, the one refrain that you will find through all, is salvation by works. They all say that salvation must be purchased, must be bought with a price; and that the sole purchase money must be our own works and deservings. Our own holy Bible, our sacred book of the East, is from beginning to end a protest against this doctrine. Good works are, indeed, enjoined upon us in that sacred book of the East far more strongly than in any other sacred book of the East; but they are only the outcome of a grateful heart—they are only a thank-offering, the fruits of our faith. They are never the ransom-money of the true disciples of Christ. Let us not shut our eyes to what is excellent and true, and of good report in these sacred books, but let us teach Hindus, Buddhists, Mohammedans, that there is only one sacred Book of the East that can be their mainstay in that awful hour when they pass all alone into the unseen world."

When the welfare of the soul is made to depend upon something else (no matter what) than downright effort toward upright life, the spiritual energies weaken by disuse. Faith may grow strong, but the soul's best faculties will grow weak. Christ may appear larger, as bearer of the burdens of a world; but the souls of men, no longer struggling for that which has been purchased for them by another, will dwindle and grow small. If the opinion of Professor Müller were not biased by previous theological education, his statement would place the Bible far below the Oriental scriptures in point of ethical value. We can but feel that this Orientalist has given fresh study to other bibles, and traditional acceptance to the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures. Is not Micah's "What doth the Lord thy God require of thee but to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God," a native strain in Hebrew prophecy? And did not Jesus strike the central note of his gospel when he said, "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, but he that doeth the will of my Father?" What means the parable of the Good Samaritan, and the Sermon on the Mount?

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

Insight.

The doubt of man is uttered loud,
With reason bold, in language proud;
His insight is the spirit's word,
Whose still, small voice the few have heard.

It has no logic to persuade,
Nor lofty theories to aid;
It soars above the schools' pretense,
Itself its only eloquence.

"I am," it breathes, "and Thou must be,
Both of one vast immensity,
The one in all, the all in one,
Never to end, never begun.

"Of one with heaven's most distant star,
The grain of sand, the prism's bar;
The life of love, the death of hate,
The destiny of small and great.

"We live, and live, and ever live!
We give, and give, and ever give!
Till the vast, teeming circle ranged,
And I and Thou no more estranged,—

"Till I and Thou no more are known
In the fixed wholeness of the One."
Above, beyond the schools' pretense
This, insight's simple eloquence."

SARAH E. BURTON.

Was It Honest?

In UNITY of August 6, we had an editorial under the above title which has awakened some discussion, and already has been referred to briefly in our columns by different correspondents. The principle discussed is an important one, and we make room gladly, therefore, for the two following communications, printed in their order of reception. We wish we could go on with the subject. Indeed, it was our intention at first to follow these communications with a discussion somewhat at length, perhaps in two or three articles; but we must defer it for the present. We, however, earnestly invite thought to the matter; and we will simply put these questions: If a manufacturer has to hire workers, there are two questions he can ask himself; one is, How little can I get them for? the other is, How much can I pay them and leave myself a fair margin of payment for my time, my work, my knowledge, and my risk? Now we ask,

1.—Are these questions always identical?

2.—If not, which is the right, just and noble question? J. V. B.

EDITOR OF UNITY:—Is it dishonest to take advantage of another's ignorance?

Is it dishonest to buy a corner lot for a thousand dollars and sell it for two or five or ten thousand? Is it dishonest for a numismatist to take an old coin for its face value and sell it for its market value?

I am in a horse car and hand the conductor a dollar. He gives me in change an old cent which I recognize at once as rare—worth perhaps several dollars, (no matter how much—more than a cent at any rate). The conductor doesn't know its value, but I do. Is it dishonest for me to say nothing and keep it? If he gives me too much (making a mistake in counting), all would agree that it would be dishonest in me to take it; but isn't there an essential difference in the two cases?

To come nearer to the case in hand: Suppose I should buy up a library of a widow (poor or rich, it makes no difference), her husband's library. I buy it in the lot. I send it home and find in it one rare book which would sell for a large sum; more perhaps than I paid for the lot. Is it dishonest for me to keep it and say nothing to her of its market value?

And even if I know when I buy the library that such a book is in it, and the widow did not suspect its value, if I pay what she asks, is it a dishonest act?

Suppose I deal in stocks. I learn from private sources that the value of a certain property is more than the selling price of the stock would indicate; am I dishonest if I buy that stock at the asking price, even though I may be sure that the special information which I have concerning it will soon be public property and the price of the stock be advanced in consequence?

In short, may not the question, "Is it honest?" apply to many transactions which daily pass unquestioned?

Is not the sagacity of merchants in every line of business dependent on the knowledge which they have?

Say I am a dealer in rubber, or coffee, or oil, or tobacco. I learn in advance of my neighbors in my line of business, something about the crop or the supply which leads me to expect an advance in price, and I quietly buy up all I can of the commodity, knowing very well that if they knew what I know they would not sell at present prices. Is it dishonest in me to take advantage of their ignorance?

And is not that the whole question? If it is the question (and I think it is), I am afraid that many business transactions which are not criticised would be open to it.

I do not say that you are not right; and it may delight your heart to see that the pregnancy of your thought is recognized. I believe you meant and mean just that—to arraign the methods of business in the Court of Conscience. And if, on a fair trial, the case cited in UNITY can be adjudged "dishonest," "ignoble," "mean," "base" and "fraudulent," (and to my mind the first term includes all the others), then I think all the others cases which I have supposed must be placed in the same category.

I do not admire the attitude of the poor man whose act you placed against the acts of the scholars.

He purchased his book of a merchant who got all he could out of him for it, and there seems something pitifully morbid in the act of the poor fellow returning to give back what was really his. Fair dealing doesn't require that we should give our neighbor more than his due; and the bargain was fairly made.

G. B. F.

EDITOR OF UNITY:—Your issue of Aug. 6th contained an article with the heading, "Was it Honest?" which questions business methods and principles, and draws inferences from given business incidents which, in my judgment, are not warranted in reason and common sense. Having waited a reasonable length of time for some professional writer to show the fallacy of the position assumed in the article referred to, without seeing anything on the subject, I feel constrained to reply to the article as best I may, from a business standpoint.

If we were to follow the kind of honesty recommended by the writer, we should put the world back a thousand years, make the grossest injustice the rule of life, and offer a premium on ignorance.

The honest possessor of property, or anything valuable, has the right to determine the terms upon which he will dispose of it. Take the case mentioned by the writer of the article. The keeper of a second-hand book stall, in the course of business, has become the possessor of an old book which cost him but a trifle, and he decides that it is worth to him ten cents, and sells it for that sum, making a satisfactory profit on the transaction. The purchaser happens to know an old book crank who will give a large sum for it. The whole question seems to be, who shall reap the benefits of knowledge? If not the possessor of it, who has, mayhap, come into possession through years of patient, plodding study, and the consumption of much midnight oil, who should? To illustrate: A minister has qualified himself to write instructive sermons through years of study, observation and heart culture, and he finds a congregation that is able and willing to pay $100 for each sermon delivered on Sunday morning. Another minister, equally able in every way, only succeeds in disposition of his sermons at $10 each. Has he not the right so to sell them? Who shall say nay? "They are worth $100 each, and you shall not commit the injustice of giving that congregation a sermon worth $100 for the paltry sum of $10." Does the fact that his wares are sermons cut any figure? In the book sale referred to, it was the information that brought the money, not the book.

A doctor cuts off a man's leg, and gets $250 for it. It was done in an hour. What brought the money? Not the hour's labor, but the knowledge of human anatomy.

An attorney is consulted by a client. One hour is spent in the consultation, and a fee of $100 is received. Information was imparted in the transaction, and brought the fee. Was it honest? The aged bibliophile with his gray hair and spectacles possessed information, and that was what brought the money. He had honestly come into possession of that information. Should he freely give to a sluggard what has cost him years of work, and thus foster laziness? Such a course would have been in direct opposition to the rules recommended by the charity organizations which, as we understand them, require that objects of charity, even, shall be compelled to honestly earn what they receive.

The writer of the article referred to strenuously opposes the rule of values that "a thing is worth what it will fetch."

Was the old book referred to worth $500, simply because it sold for that sum? Very likely, some of the friends and heirs of the purchaser, when they heard of the transaction, said, "We will have a servitor appointed for grandfather—he has softening of the brain; he actually threw away $500 on an old worthless pamphlet, bought at a second-hand book store for ten cents; there will not be one cent of his large fortune left to bury him with if he is permitted to go on at this rate throwing away his money." Take the case of the dishonest knave (the writer of this article puts him in another category) who sold a customer, who had confidence in him, a book for three shillings more than it was worth, and then feeling conscience-stricken after sleeping on it, undertook to mend matters by dividing his ill-gotten gains with the wealthy merchant from whom he bought the book. I think the case bears the stamp of improbability, as such a knave and fool would never have had money enough to have bought a book upon which he could have made three shillings in addition to a fair profit. Let us see the papers in the case.

To my mind, the article, to put it mildly, savors of a sentimentality that would condemn to total destruction all fishes that live upon each other, and compel us to eat the poor trash that obtain their food by sucking up mud from the bottom of the stream; that would destroy all birds of prey, because they destroy the weaklings and thus make progress possible; that would override the laws of the Almighty that decree "the survival of the fittest."

Is it "dignified" for a man to know? I say it is dignified to know; and so long as the necessity to live is upon us, it is as dignified to obtain a living by our knowledge as by handlabor.

In neither of the cases cited did any one "get something for nothing." The facts do not warrant any such conclusion, and "repeating it over and over again" will not make it true. "A man is not heard for his much speaking." How much worse is it to get a book for $7 that may be sold for $30, than to get a jack-knife or a stew-pan from a friend in the business, who will sell at wholesale price to us, and thus cheat some unknown retail dealer out of his legitimate profits? If there was dishonesty in one transaction, there would be in the other.

Is every person who shops all over a city hunting for "bargains," because their necessities and purses are of unequal length "mean," "base," "ignoble?" No. It is commendable to obtain by fair means the most we can for our money, because it means health, comfort, information and power for ourselves and families.

Emerson says, as we believe with great force and truthfulness, "it is as impossible for a man to be cheated by any one but himself as for a thing to be and not to be at the same time." But let us suppose that the looked-for millenium has arrived, when no man will sell a thing for more than it is worth, or receive it for less than it is worth. Mr. A. has a horse for which he has no use, and desires to dispose of it. He is young, sound, gentle and speedy. He meets Mr. B., who desires to purchase such a horse as is owned by Mr. A., and inquires the price. $150 is named by Mr. A. as the value of his horse. Mr. B. says the horse is worth $250, and I will give you that for him; but Mr. A. is conscientious and refuses to take more than a thing is worth. Mr. B. is equally conscientious, and refuses to receive a thing for less than it is worth, and as they are unable to agree, they part—Mr. A. to continue to keep a thing which he does not want, and Mr. B. to go without a thing which he does want—that each may indulge a monumental conceit in regard to their judgment of values. What a millenium that will be! It is a satisfaction to us to know that we shall not live to enjoy it.

THE UNITY CLUB.

Fifty Years of Emerson.

"THE AMERICAN SCHOLAR." (1837.)

"THE DIVINITY SCHOOL ADDRESS." (1838.)

All in the class are supposed to read each essay before the meeting and to memorize some great line from the portion taken for the evening's study. To make the reading careful, better write out a brief analysis of the essay.

The page references are to the recent "Riverside" Edition of Emerson's Works. As editions vary, it is a good plan to number the paragraphs. Both the essays to be studied are in Vol. I. The recent editions of the "Poems" contain sixty pages of poems not found in earlier editions: where such poems are referred to, the page is named.

General references on Emerson and the Transcendental Movement in New England:—

Cabot's Memoir of Emerson, by far the best.

Cooke's Memoir of Emerson.

Holmes's Memoir of Emerson.

Genius and Character of Emerson. (The Concord Lectures for 1884.)

Conway's "Emerson at Home and Abroad."

Frothingham's "Transcendentalism in New England."

Emerson's own essays: "Transcendentalism," (Vol. I.); "New England Reformers," (Vol. III.); "Historic Notes," and "Chardon St. Convention." (Vol. X.)

The Theodore Parker, George Ripley, Alcott, Thoreau and Margaret Fuller books.

Essays on Emerson by Morley, Matthew Arnold, Grimm, Lowell (in "Study Windows,"), Whipple, Stedman, Burroughs, Bartol, Harris, Mead, and others.

"The American Scholar." (1837.)

"This Address was our Intellectual Declaration of Independence."—(Doctor Holmes.)

"An event without any former parallel in our literary annals. What crowded and breathless aisles, what windows clustering with eager heads, what enthusiasm of approval, what grim silence of foregone dissent!"—(Lowell.)

FIRST EVENING, pages 83-100 (paragraphs 1-29).

Introductory Poem. "The Song of Nature," read aloud, with interpretation.

Paper. "American Literature Fifty Years Ago."

Great Sentences. A quick, round-the-classes exercise. Each from memory give the noblest sentence he finds in these eighteen pages.

Analysis of Essay. Its three parts. Two of the class read their outlines of the essay, the others comparing their own.

Discussion on "Self-Education, the Upbuilding of a Man":—

(1) The three teachers. Has he not left out one? Which is the head teacher? Is a rounded, complete man becoming more possible or less possible?

(2) The human passion for unity. (Here he speaks of nature as the source of man's science; as source of his poetry, see "Literary Ethics," pp. 162-4, in this same volume.) What is Emerson's constant doctrine of the highest unity?

(3) World-books,—spite of what he says, are there none? Bibliolatry: public idol books? any private ones? (Lowell's poem, "Bibliolatres.") Book-gluttony, and its remedy. (Bacon's essay "Of Studies.") Too busy reading to think of.

too busy thinking to read. What, according to Emerson, is the sole use of a book? "I see that Plato has some of my thoughts." What have been the three most creative, epoch-making books to you in your life? Tell the truth about it!

(4) The "unconscious cerebration," the mental chemistry, that transmutes experience into wisdom,—what can you say about it? Does your experience confirm p. 97 (paragraph 24)?

(5) How many words, probably, in your daily vocabulary? Shakespeare was Shakespeare with how many words?

(6) Are our leaders in America usually "self-educated" men? Are "practical" men and women the best thinkers? And reverse that question.

Closing Poem. "Culture."

SECOND EVENING, pages 101-115 (paragraphs 30-43).

Introductory Poem. "Musketaquid."

Paper. "Concord: One Little Town and its Great Men."

Great Sentences. The noblest sentence each one finds in these fifteen pages,—from memory.

Discussion on "Self-Reliance:"—

(1.) Self-reliance a constant emphasis of Emerson; does he exaggerate it? Is it the mother of all virtues and of the best service? "Whoso would be a man must be a non-conformist." Is lack of self-trust the mark of the American? What, on the other hand, is the great New Testament emphasis? Has Emerson an equal sense of this? Are "individualism" and "otherism"—each for all—opposites? Which of the two is the growing emphasis to-day? Do you understand his "reason" for self-trust (paragraphs 35, 36)?

(2.) One's potentialities. With conscious, sub-conscious, unconscious powers, do we "know ourselves?" Is it true—or too good to be true—that every one is a poet, a genius, a hero, in posse? "Our chief want in life—is it not somebody who can make us do what we can?"

(3.) Hero-worship,—has Emerson rightly read the secret of it?

(4.) The Hero-Scholar: note his stern self-discipline, his lofty functions; for this is autobiographic of Emerson's own ideal. Did he make his ideal real? Seer, prophet, poet, philosopher, scholar, reformer, saint,—what name best fits him?

(5.) "The milk in the pan:" is literature growing poetic and religious, then? The poet as the seer of the world. Do the book-keepers know of the "eternal law" exemplified in ledgers? (See "Compensation" in Vol. II. p. 111.)

(6.) The best age to be born in? Is ours an age of "introversion," and of "revolution?" Have the "auspicious signs" of 1837 come true?

(7.) Can you understand the impression caused by this Address, the "breathless aisles," etc.,—Lowell's and Holmes's words above? "Declaration of Independence" from what?

Scripture Passages. Are there any passages in this essay noble enough for pulpit-reading? What is the quality that makes a "Scripture" passage?

Closing Poem. "The Titmouse."

Unity Club Day at the First Annual Sunday-school Institute.

The idea of a Western Sunday-school Institute, under the auspices of the W. U. S. S. S., is a happy one, and implies more practical, thorough study and work in all directions, and will be of especial value to Sunday-school teachers. And the Unity Club session will also mean institute work for that new, lively, and growing organization. What is the Unity Club for? how is its work done? who will tell us how to study Browning, the masters in art, or Emerson? these are the questions eastern people are constantly asking. Probably the west has got beyond these preliminary and commonplace questions; possibly, some are among inquirers for light; and if so, it will be a grand opportunity for officers and committees of Unity Clubs, and all interested members, to get help by attending the Chicago Institute, to be held in the Third church, Rev. J. V. Blake, pastor, Nov. 8-10. Unity Clubs should be organized where not already in existence, in order to be represented at the Chicago meeting, and to join the Bureau. Every church should have a Unity Club, as it should a Sunday-school, or a charity organization. There are several weeks to elapse before the institute meets; but it will take all that time for the clubs to get organized, or re-organized, for the season's work; and, at least, on the intellectual side of club work, the western men will have something most excellent in the proposed exhibition of eight types of Unity Club studies, to present to clubs new and old. The topics are, Emerson, Social Politics, Art, Travel, Philosophy, Browning, Great Novels, Miscellaneous. What a feast for the gods will be here! And besides these studies, we shall learn something of the undeveloped sides of Unity Club work, which we suspect will give us even grander conceptions of the Club, and its work in the churches, and in the community, as a social and a religious factor. Perhaps we are too far away from the Unity Club hub to catch the inspiration of its life and work, and may not indulge sufficiently in hope and confidence in its importance in the churches, but with the prophets and apostles of all good and growing things, right on the spot, there will be no failure in club representation at the Institute, and no lack of purpose and of point in the spirit and work of the meeting.

Proverb Sermons.—III.

Proverb.—Look not a gift horse in the mouth.

But why not? Proverbs I think are a kind of moral scripture, for they come out of the human heart when long enough it has applied itself to life; which is to say that they have a sacred source and a sacred object. Therefore it is not well to flout any proverb, but to search into it, for it is like to be truth and wisdom good for us to follow. Nor, I think, have I met any which are only worldly-wise, crafty or selfish. Wherefore I shall not be like to err if I take my text freely on trust, and ask simply why we should not look a gift horse in the mouth,—believing that truly it is so, since the human heart has said it in a proverb, though in a way a little both rough and humorous.

To look a horse in the mouth is to look for his age by means of his teeth, which is to search narrowly into his value,—how strong he may be, how long likely to live, and what he will fetch in the market. Now, if he be a gift horse, then to go straightway to his mouth is to be busy more with the value of the gift than with the good will of the giver. For to run to the horse's mouth is to run apart from the friend who has given the horse, which no man will do if he think more of the stem of love than of any fruit that buds on it. Therefore the proverb is a homely form for this precept, that we should be busy with gratefulness for the giving and not with looking for the value of the gift. The proverb is a part of the scripture of gratitude, wherever that be found written.

What virtue is richer or more comely than gratitude, or better to moor to if one wish to be steadied amid tossing waves? A man may be honest and hateful; for he may give every one his due and pay what he owes while he begrudges it. But if a man be of grateful spirit, I see not how he can be very perverse in any way, nor how his frailties, though they be many, can be hateful or cruel ones. Shakespeare has a good saying—"Thanks, the exchequer of the poor,"—which fastens close to Jesus's parable of the widow's mite; for though thanks be a poor man's payment, not all the riches of the rich can pay so much.

Ungratefulness is the sin of a soul which yet is in a mean and little state, not having come to good size and shape. Persons who get kenneled, if so I may speak, in this state suffer a long puppy-hood; for often I have marked that young dogs, when they have lost their first floss and grace, have an ugly, awkward, shorn and (whatever be their blood) currish season, before they get the ease, motion and mantle of full growth. Now, though the body goes straight along its way to become adult, the soul may stay half made, or even very little made, a long time; then it will be ungrateful for good things given, snapping at them currishly and swallowing them too greedily to taste the flavor of love in them. Now this I say not as first I thought it; for at first I said to myself—Ingratitude is the sin of a mean soul. But I like not to admit any mean soul, but only unmade persons. Now if an unfinished house could help finish itself, and would not, then its half made state would be a mean state. So an unmade soul which works not to finish itself is in a mean state, and ungratefulness is a trait of it. There are faults of large states of soul, like sins of ambition, of over-generosity, of education or love of learning, or of whatever other noble trait may be mentioned; for all may be turned awry; but ingratitude is the sin of a little and mean state which has nothing noble in it, but is all groveling and base.

Now what, in a word, is this mean state of soul? It is this—to be locked up in self, as a puppy not yet has grown into duty to his master nor to a sense of having a charge nor indeed to ought but his sleep, his play, his milk and his bone. Is it not plain that the mean state of a soul is its being turned wholly to itself? For here it stands in the midst of immensity spread on the earth, and of infinity in the heavens and in man; yet it chooses to be busy with just itself, turning from the immensity to a very little portion. Surely this is a great meanness.

Now of this mean and paltry state of the soul there are two sorts. The first sort is simply selfishness. This always makes a man ungrateful; for it will lead him straightway to the mouth of the gift horse to see what his value is, and by this he will judge of the gift, thinking how much he has gotten, and what it will bring him at a sale if he wish. But when he has looked into the mouth of the gift and settled its price, whatever feeling he may have for the giver I know not how to name and mayhap our language lacks a noun for it; for surely it is not gratefulness, but a kind of payment which he has measured by the teeth. True gratitude is a leap of the heart to meet the heart that lies in the gift. A shrewd observer has said that "every one takes pleasure in returning small obligations, many go so far as to acknowledge moderate ones, but there is hardly any one who does not repay great obligations with ingratitude." If this be so (though a sadness to think it is), this is because of looking the gift in the mouth, which is the same as pricing the favor and not the heart in the favor. He who receives knows not how to return the benefit with love, and he will not render an equal bounty, because that would deprive himself; thus great benefits he is content to receive with great selfishness. Also when selfishness puts out gratitude, this will be shown by the forgetting of past good turns if any ill turn be done. But as Confucius's disciples said of him that "if he saw one good in a man he forgot a hundred evils," so, conversely, the eye of a grateful disposition soon will cease to see an ill done us against the light of many past kindnesses. If, having received benefits, we are not helped thereby to bear with the hurt, of what effect are they?

The second sort of meanness is vanity, conceit, foolish pride and vainglory, which the apostle has called well the thinking of ourselves more highly than we ought to think. For humility is not to set ourselves at naught, to make light of ourselves, or abase ourselves, as some think, but with pure justice of mind to set oneself in one's true place. Does anything more affect a man's thoughts through and through than his way of esteeming himself? For if he think of himself too highly, he will esteem others too little, which is blindness both to justice and to gratitude! and if he be wholly well pleased with what he has in his mind, he will miss the wisdom and knowledge spread around him, which is to be ignorant. Now if a man by reason of his own vainglory be unjust, blind to greatness, and ignorant (a sorry lot of bad things to be heaped in one person), how can he give sweet and tender gratitude? If he have no humility, but float high on his own thoughts of himself, it is hard to see how he can be grateful; for he will think the favors he gives very fine and precious by reason of his own fine state; but what he has from others, he will think not so worthy, and no more than he deserves, if indeed so much. Therefore, it is sure he will exact much gratitude but render little.

Some will have it that obligation is a kind of shame. At least, if not in words they declare such a rule, yet they act by it, and seem unhappy to be beholden to any one, as if they had gone into prison or restraint. But in this point a double wisdom is needed; for sometimes to accept obligation is noble, and sometimes base. To be ashamed of obligation to a friend is very ungenerous. Seneca said well that hurry to repay a benefit is a kind of ingratitude; and a preacher has written that "the grateful person being still the most severe exactor of himself, not only confesses but proclaims his debt"—which is true, and also a high saying; for if it be a beauty, grace or goodness in our friend to benefit us, not only we are ungrateful if we feel it not in our hearts, but if we bear it not in our mouths to the spread of his good name, we are thievish. Either take no favor from a friend (which surely is not good friendship), or be glad under it.

(Concluded next week.)

Didn't Like the Kite.

A flock of wild geese flying over Waterbury, Conn., the other day, saw one of the kites which the Waterbury boys were flying. This particular kite was up very high and the geese objected to it. They circled about it two or three times, and then four of their number, seemingly delegated for the purpose, attacked the kite and tore it into shreds, and then went on their way.—New York Sun.

HE preached to all men everywhere
The Gospel of the Golden Rule,
The New Commandment given to men,
Thinking the deed, and not the creed,
Would help us in our utmost need.
With reverend feet the earth he trod,
Nor banished nature from his plan,
But studied still with deep research
To build the Universal Church,
Lofty as is the love of God,
And ample as the wants of man.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Wichita, Kan.—It is nearly 800 miles from Chicago, as the road runs. And here a Unity Sunday Circle was formed at the close of the afternoon service, October 2. A president, secretary and treasurer, and an executive committee were chosen, and several resolutions were passed. It was voted that the proceedings be reported in UNITY, from which you will probably hear later. The western secretary, J. R. Effinger, was present by invitation, and will return to them on Sunday, October 9. The congregations were unexpectedly good, numbering about 50. The singing was hearty, and the esprit de corps of the people was delightful to witness. This interest had been carefully fostered for months by the P. O. Mission from our Chicago headquarters and from Geneseo, and the results so far are most encouraging. Wichita is already the largest city in Kansas, according to my informant, and growing "at the rate of a thousand a month." It is claimed that it lies in "the garden spot of the world," and that Kansas is destined to be the richest state in the union. It is none too soon to begin our work there.

Chicago.—Freiberg's opera house on Twenty-second street, between State street and Wabash avenue, was the scene last Sunday afternoon of an event important and novel,—nothing less than the inaugural meeting of the first African Unitarian society in the world. Rev. Bird Wilkins, a young colored preacher, who came to Chicago about two years ago as pastor of the Bethesda Baptist church, has worked his way out of the popular theology, and carried the bulk of his congregation with him. A few weeks ago some dissension was stirred up in that church by the efforts of influential Baptists on the outside, and Mr. Wilkins wisely chose the independent course of resigning his pastorate. Three-fourths of the members of his church have followed him, and the attendance last Sunday afternoon included over a hundred of his own people, with a sprinkling of sympathizing friends from the various Unitarian churches of the city. The principal address was delivered by Rev. James Vila Blake, who stated with depth and comprehensiveness, as well as earnestness and simplicity, the leading principles of the new faith to which the people before him are aspiring. Rev. David Uter followed with a few well chosen words of sound advice, after which Mr. Wilkins read the articles of fellowship of the new church, which were stated in language taken substantially from the resolutions passed last May by the Western Unitarian Conference. He also read letters of sympathy and encouragement from Mrs. Prudence Crandall, Rev. Thomas G. Milsted and others. The outlook of the new movement seems most encouraging, and it starts out with the full sympathy and co-operation of the Unitarians of Chicago. We shall hope to give further news of Mr. Wilkins and his church ere long.

—Union Teachers' Meeting, Monday noon. Subject, "Jesus Entering on His Ministry." Mr. Jones, leader. Luke iv, 14-30. The synagogues were simple buildings, erected so as to look toward Jerusalem. The organization of the congregation was very simple. The priests never had anything to do with the synagogues; they were confined to the temple at Jerusalem. The passage from Isaiah read by Jesus in the synagogue seems not just the same as it now stands in the Old Testament, but still it is plain what passage is meant. Noticeable that Jesus stopped just where he did; for if he had read on he would have read, "And the day of the vengeance of our God." But Jesus never preached this. It seems as if he stopped short of this clause because he did not wish to read it, not liking it. Attention was called to the Pauline, pro-Gentile character of this story, for it was the assertion of Jesus that a Gentile man and woman had been preferred by the prophet to Hebrews that seemed to stir up the small riot that followed. The principle that a prophet is not known in his own country must not be pushed far; a very great and true prophet is revered by those close about him.

Arcadia, Wis.—The October session of the Wisconsin Conference of Unitarian and other Independent Churches closed on Thursday evening, October 6. In addition to the ministers of the state of Wisconsin, there were present S. M. Crothers, of St. Paul, H. M. Simmons, of Minneapolis, H. D. Stevens, of Indianapolis, George Batchelor, of Boston, and J. R. Effinger, of Chicago. The opening sermon was by H. M. Simmons, on Tuesday evening. Wednesday forenoon was given up to business, including reports from the churches and the field at large. The agent of the American Unitarian Association and the secretary of the Western Conference were called on, and responded briefly. They struck hands cordially, and even slept in the same bed without falling out. There were sermons by Batchelor and Crocker, and essays by Forbush, Earl, Stevens and Crothers. Unavoidably we were delayed in reaching the conference, and were hurried away in the midst of Mr. Stevens's interesting essay, missing Crothers and Crocker. But it was good to be there for a day. It was evident that painstaking, earnest work is going on in Wisconsin. The two leading ministers work together admirably, throwing their united strength into the new movements and the weaker churches. One side incident of the conference was the planning of a meeting in St. Paul on the 17th of next month, to mature plans for the organization of a Minnesota Conference. So let it be! Let us educate a state consciousness of responsibility for organized aggressive work wherever we can. The opportunity before us is full of encouragement. Shall we rise to meet it?
J. R. E.

Chicago Preachers.—The last Sunday issue of the Syracuse (N. Y.) Standard contains extended sketches of Doctor Thomas, Doctor Noble and James Vila Blake, of the Third Unitarian church, accompanied by counterfeit representations of their faces. Of Doctor Thomas it says: "His peculiar views on the inspiration of the Bible and future punishment brought him into a conflict with his superiors in the church, which terminated in 1881 with the historical Thomas heresy trial. Doctor Thomas held that there was no eternal punishment for unbelievers, that Christ was not crucified to save man, and that the Scriptures contained various errors. The trial, which lasted several weeks, ended with his expulsion from the Methodist church and the formation of a strong religious society, styling itself the People's church. . . . Commencing his career as an ardent Abolitionist, he has ever had a helpful hand for the poor and struggling, and this noble devotion to the cause of humanity and justice is probably the keystone of his success as a man, a minister and a lecturer."

Of our fellow worker, Mr. Blake, it says: "He graduated from Harvard in 1862 with the degree of bachelor of arts. The day after his graduation he entered the service of Governor Andrews, of Massachusetts, as one of his private secretaries, and remained with him until July, 1863, when he entered the divinity school at Harvard. . . . Mr. Blake is equally well known as an author as he is as a clergyman, having written and published a volume of lyrical poems, a book of essays and a series of clever articles on manual training. He is an ardent enthusiast on all matters pertaining to education, and works faithfully and incessantly to effect practical changes in the somewhat impractical curriculum of our public schools." These merited words of praise somewhat atone for the libelous character of the portraits.

Boston.—The Unitarian missionary to Japan purposes to meet the Japanese civilization as the peer in some respects of the highest European civilization, to own the value of Japanese arts, literature, morality and habits of inquiry. He will offer respectfully to that nation, as he would to a competitive school of religion in America, whatever he thinks is superior in Christian beliefs, hopes and morality over the faiths he finds held by the educated or the ignorant classes of Japan. This may prove to be the most successful method for a mission to any advanced people. —Our very useful body, called the Union of Sunday-school Superintendents and Teachers, will hold its first sociable meeting a week hence. The delegates and guests have a pleasant gathering in the parlor of our First church, which is followed by a sociable collation. Then in the chapel the large audience listens to several essays and a discussion. Social and religious services open and close the exercises. The present is the fifth year of the life of the Union, and its vigor still increases. The Sunday-school methods of our city and suburbs are made more intelligent and uniform by this frequent contact of devoted workers.

Merrill, Wis.—Rev. A. N. Somers writes: "Things look favorable for the organization of a society within a few weeks. I find here a dozen Unitarians who are anxious for a society, and a large number deeply interested in anything that is liberal and tolerant." Mr. Somers, formerly of Jamestown, N. Y., has gone to Merrill for the purpose of opening a field for Unitarian work at that place.

The Illinois Conference of Unitarian and other Independent Societies will meet at Hinsdale, Ill., on October 25, 26, and be the guests of the little church lately formed there. The conference will be twenty-five years old and its host seven months' old,—but big enough to give a warm welcome to all its ancestry. Further announcement next week.

Jamestown, N. Y.—Sunday, October 2, Doctor Townsend's people observed with appropriate services the second anniversary of their church organization. Dr. Townsend preached morning and evening to large congregations.

The Evangelical Alliance of the United States assembles at Washington on December 8. Among the speakers will be Chief-Justice Waite, Associate-Justice Strong, of the Supreme Court; Bishop Cox, of the Protestant Episcopal Church; President McCosh, of Princeton; Senator Joseph R. Hawley and Bishop Hurst, of the Methodist Church.

Tarsus.—Some New York gentlemen with Dr. Howard Crosby at their head, are moving to build a monument to St. Paul in this ancient city. It is to take the shape of a training school for orphans. $2500 have already been raised. This is a practical and radical recognition of the worth of one who seemed to glory in his bachelorhood.

St. Joseph, Mo.—A word from this point says, "We are slowly gaining ground." It is pleasant to think that the pastor, C. E. Roberts, is soon to have his brother, Rev. J. E. Roberts, as his nearest ministerial brother and exchange at Kansas City. We shall expect the Roberts family to hold high the banner of liberal thought in the Missouri valley.

[NUMBER 8.]

EDITORIAL.

IN the conduct of the intellect, Emerson says, "the ground position is, that the intellect grows by moral obedience."

THE illustrated London News, republished in New York for October 15, contains a pretty picture of Lea Hurst, the present home of Florence Nightingale, in Derbyshire, England. Miss Nightingale is now sixty-seven years of age, and though impaired in health still continues her studies of charitable institutions, upon the conduct of which she is one of the best authorities living.

Miss C. J. Bartlett recently preached a sermon to All Souls church, of Sioux Falls, Dakota, over which she ministers, upon "Creeds: Their Use and Abuse," which has been published as a broadside, and from which we clip a suggestive sentence:

"Yes, one of the central and inspiring articles of his faith is in the spiritual evolution of humanity—that the spirit of God is abroad in the hearts of men to-day as much, yea, more than ever in the past time; that ever the light of God's holy truth is shining through wider and wider rifts in the clouds of men's ignorance and fear and brutality."

THE newly amended scientific temperance instruction law in Michigan took effect September 9. It provides that instruction shall be given in physiology and hygiene with special reference to narcotics and their effect upon the human system. The instruction shall be given by text-books where the pupil is able to read, and as thoroughly as any other studies pursued in the school. This is a move in the right direction. The welfare of the body has too long been placed below the education of the mind. In view of the revelations of science with respect to the relations of health to morals, we consider this measure to be of the highest importance.

A HINDOO convert to Christianity, in an address before the Evangelical Alliance, uttered these words:

"The elementary branches of an English education ring the death knell of the Hindoo shastas. The student soon sees that on a globe 8000 miles in diameter, there can not be a mountain 128,000 miles high, as these books affirm. With the whole surface of the earth mapped down, and with the various waters properly located and designated, there is no room for the seas (the 'sea of candy' and the 'sea of honey') of the Hindoo mythology; nor is that forest likely to be found very soon whose falling and decaying fruit produces a river larger than the Indus or the Ganges, the perfume of which can be perceived for thousands of miles."

A certain Presbyterian clergyman, quoting the above in a sermon, asks: "Why is it that there are in the Bible no absurdities like these, to be swept away by advancing knowledge?" We can conceive that a devout Hindoo, not converted to Christianity, might find in our Bible and in current theology much to which the "death knell" has been rung by even "the elementary branches of an English education."

WE clip the following from the Religio-Philosophical Journal:

"The scheme to put God in the United States Constitution—which may be called an effort to put God on paper instead of putting goodness in the soul—has little vitality, but Rev. Dr. Gregg, of Park Street church, Boston, lately preached a sermon in its favor, of which a paragraph will show the quality:

"If we interpret the Constitution according to its plain reading, it is assuredly a non-religious document. The true God has no standing in it. It offers no more protection to the religion of Jesus Christ than to the religion of Buddha. The oath which the President takes in assuming office has no mention of God in it, although an appeal to God is the very essence of an oath. The absence of the religious character was noted from the very beginning, and was the subject of consideration by God-fearing patriots. What is our duty as Christian citizens in regard to the non-religious character of the Constitution? We should do that which our fathers failed to do; we should crown our God and Christianity in the very first sentence of the Constitution. We should make it read: 'We, the people, in the name of God, accepting the Son as our ruler,' etc."

Park Street church is the place where the clergy had a prayer meeting in Theodore Parker's day, and one of the brethren prayed that the Lord "would put a hook in his jaws, or if need be, remove him out of the way." About the time the good Father puts hooks in the jaws of such men as Theodore Parker, we may look for God in the Constitution, but not before."

THE Christian at Work says:

"In the columns of the able, and we may say admirable organ of the Unitarians, the Christian Register, we find a correspondent repudiating the claim that Unitarianism is founded on the sacred Scriptures. These are his utterances:

"Unitarianism no longer bases itself on the Word of Scripture; but the Word of Scripture in the past has been, for many of us, one of its corner stones, and is now and always will be a powerful contributor to its religious life, is the best stepping-stone from other fields into our ranks, and on all these accounts is deserving of having its real meaning brought out by us distinct and clear."

Our contemporary declares that the Catholic church holds the Scriptures in the same way; and it congratulates its Roman Catholic and Unitarian friends on the fact that they both use the Scriptures as a stepping-stone. It fails to state, however, that for the authority of an infallible Book the Catholic church substitutes the authority of an infallible council or Pope; while the Unitarian knows no infallible authority of any sort, but rests its doctrine in the soul's perception, which, though fallible, is the only torch by which our mortal feet can be safely guided.

THE September number of the Antiochian is before us and contains some extracts of Professor Orton's address at the funeral of Albert Lester Kellogg, one of the faithful Antioch friends and trustees who with Artemus Carter and many others, now of blessed memory, held up the hands of Horace Mann. For many years Mr. Kellogg has been a resident of Yellow Springs. We let Professor Orton speak for us the words that will not only be grateful to the friends of Antioch but helpful to all our readers:

"He had been successful in business. . . . Two children were growing up beneath his roof. Their education must be provided for. A new college, on a new basis, viz., an anti sectarian basis, was just being established in Southern Ohio. At the head of it stood that princely orator, scholar, statesman, educator, Horace Mann, head and shoulders above all the teachers of his time."

"This was the opportunity that our friend was waiting for, and which he could not fail to accept at whatever cost. He followed Horace Mann to Yellow Springs, to Antioch College. . . . His heart was bound up in the college, and he experienced his full share of sorrow over the irreparable loss by the untimely death of Antioch's first and great president."

"He has gone in and out among us with kindness and helpfulness and good will for all. He has stood loyally by every good work that has been going forward in the state and nation, watchful and observant of public affairs and strengthening the entire community by his steadfast courage."

"The halls of yonder college can testify most eloquently to this persistent love of knowledge on the part of our friend. Term after term and year after year, in one or another of the lecture-rooms of the college, even after they had passed through their three score years, Mr. and Mrs. Kellogg would find their places as regular and faithful and prompt in their attendance as any members of the classes that were required to be there. What an encouragement to the young people that sat beside them there!"

"Duty is the strongest and sweetest word in the language."
"It was the same love of righteousness that colored all his religious thought, that led him to break with the narrow and arbitrary theological school in which he was brought up, and to find a broader and more reasonable faith.

"He believed in a power in the world that makes for righteousness. The world is a good world; the evils of life are mainly remedial evils; the light that is shining now will shine more and more to a perfect day. These were the happy optimistic views that our friend delighted to cherish, and in the light of which he went bravely and cheerfully forward to his journey's end."

THE Pacific Coast Conference of Unitarian and other Christian churches, will hold its fourth annual session at Oakland, Cal., on November 20-23. The day sessions will be held at Odd Fellow's hall, northwest corner of Eleventh and Franklin streets, the evening sessions in the larger Hamilton hall. The Oakland church extends a cordial invitation to all delegates, and will provide suitable homes for all. The opening sermon will be preached by Rev. Grindall Reynolds, General Secretary of the American Unitarian Association, of Boston. Hon. Horace Davis will preside, and will read a paper on our mission to the Japanese, whose discussion will be opened by Rev. A. M. Knapp, the newly appointed missionary of the Unitarian body, now on his way to Japan. Rev. A. W. Jackson will speak on "Books and Morals;" Rev. B. F. McDaniel on "The Religious Sentiment;" Rev. T. L. Eliot on "Marriage and Divorce, and its Legislation;" Doctor Stebbins on "The Future of California Society;" Rev. E. M. Wheelock on "The Evolution of Providence;" Rev. C. P. Massey on "Our Unitarian Need;" and addresses and papers may be expected from Judge M. A. Luce, C. A. Murdock, C. W. Wendte, George H. Greer, and, it is hoped, from Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, of Boston.

THE conservatives in the Congregational church evidently do not have the whole of public sentiment on their side. Doctor Parker, of London, under the auspices of the Evangelical Alliance, recently addressed an immense congregation in Tremont Temple, Boston. At this meeting Mr. Joseph Cook offered prayer, in which he besought the Lord to keep error out of the schools of instruction. Doctor Parker in the course of his address rebuked the partisan spirit which expresses itself even in prayer. Whether or not the audience perceived the application of the rebuke to the prayer just made by Mr. Cook, it evinced sympathy with the sentiment by loud applause. Doctor Parker declared that hardly a Congregational clergyman in England now teaches the doctrine of endless punishment, and when he affirmed that "the Lord's mercy will be found to be larger than the devil's malignity" his words were greeted with tremendous applause. The intolerance which finds such free expression in the councils of orthodoxy has evidently not found its way very largely among the people. When a certain doctrine or line of church policy is in danger there can always be found zealous controversialists to defend conservatism. But the quick feelings of the great public heart respond to the sentiment of a larger freedom. Ecclesiastical councils are the last and strongest bulwarks of conservatism, yet even these are fast crumbling before the sweeping tide of public sentiment.

THE New York Independent prints, on its first page, a somewhat startling article by Maurice Thompson, in which the Russian Count Tolstoi, whose writings are attracting so much attention, is declared to be nothing short of a socialist, a crank, and worse than all, an infidel. The following extracts will show the general tenor of the article; from which it is evident that although a man teach the very doctrines of Christ himself, if he be not in accord with the strict canons of orthodoxy, he may be denounced as a pernicious teacher:

"Lately criticism has gone to the extent of making a Christian hero of a man who openly denies the divinity of Christ, rejects the orthodox view of the atonement, and substitutes a refined socialism for the faith, hope and charity of the Word of God. . . . If the Bible is true, Christ is the very Son of God, born of Mary, as told in the simple story, and he it was who died that men might live. The divinity of Christ is vital to Christianity. Without divinity Christ could make no atonement for man. The sermon on the Mount and the Lord's Prayer are meaningless if Christ was a mere man with only a genius for sweetness and light. . . . Tolstoi is not only a socialistic crank, but as well a man whose teachings are subtly infidel and wholly subversive of government, of property rights, of courts of justice, and of personal liberty and safety. . . . Moreover, he rejects the personality of God the Father, and cares nothing for the Holy Ghost. . . . Tolstoi's religion and philosophy is being spread broadcast among us, with the sanction and approval of high critical authority and labeled as containing the true spirit of Christ."

Secular Press Comment.

It is interesting to note the comment of the secular press upon the recent meeting of the American Board at Springfield. The press is the great reflector of public sentiment, and as theological weather vanes the following paragraphs are significant:

What hangs upon the action of the American Board is not the advance or retardment of what is called liberal theology. The movement of thought in this age is as indifferent to the vote of church councils as an ironclad to a peashooter. What is at stake is simply the future of the board itself.—Springfield Republican.

Fifty years ago the Congregationalists lost their heads over a misstatement of the doctrine of the Trinity in unity, and prepared the way for the party of Unitarian Congregationalists. It looks as if a similar folly were about to be inaugurated among the same people to-day.—Boston Herald.

The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions seems to be demonstrating that there is need of considerable missionary work at home, beginning among the members of the board itself. Not only bitter, but even personal, discussion, full of insinuations, have been lugged into a debate upon the question as to whether or not man passes through a probationary state after death. It is clear that theologians who indulge in such senseless argument concerning something so utterly beyond human demonstration are fit subjects for a little probation in this sphere before they cross over to the unknown and unknowable.—Omaha Herald.

The conservatives should use the power which is theirs by force of numbers as not abusing it, and should remember that there is no more effective conquering than that of conciliation, especially among the children of the same household of faith. If the liberals think that the conservatives have manifested any illiberality or intolerance, let them show how liberal they can be toward what they deem illiberality, and how tolerant they can be of what seems to them intolerance. If the change in policy and methods which is sought is of God, it will come in due time, and meantime, the thing for every constituent and friend of the American Board to do is to banish non-essentials, and vie with each other in carrying onward and forward the standard of the cross.—Springfield Union.

The future probation opinions of the present Andover theologians and their friends demand recognition by this venerable board of missions. When the issue is joined, if the vote was confined to New England alone, there is reason to fear that Andover would carry its point, since these states, the former home of the theology of Edwards, Bellamy, Hopkins, Dwight and Emmons, have now measurably lost sight of the old paths. At the present time the religious thought of New England is largely permeated with Unitarianism, pure and mixed with rationalism, Universalism and agnosticism, while the Boston mental science healers are going back to the old pantheism, and to the foggy mysticism of India, for both philosophy and religion. But the majority of Congregationalists in the middle and western states still, we believe, hold to the faith of their fathers, and no doubt will stand by the board as against Andover.—The Interior (Pres.).

Robert Browning.

While so many people who might be in better business have been reviving of late in our Unitarian circles, the meaningless and, to a great extent, the baseless sarcasm at the writings of Robert Browning and those who are trying to profit by the same, it is refreshing to come upon the deliberate word of so careful and competent a judge as Rev. Francis Tiffany on so significant an occasion as the opening of the Ministers' Institute recently held at Princeton, Mass. We have had no time or desire to try to answer the jeers that would indicate the non-religiousness of an interest in Browning, but we are glad to make room for the words of our Massachusetts brother, who refers to Browning as:

"A poet,—the most religious poet, indeed, since Dante, and yet a man abreast with all the science of the day,—no material philosophy has ever had power to bring him down from that free flight through the empyrean. He feels his birthright through the very dower of wings. Of him we may proudly say,—

'Vainly the fowler's eye
Might mark thy distant flight to do thee wrong,
As darkly painted on the crimson sky,
Thy figure floats along.'

"I speak, of course, of Robert Browning, a teacher at whose feet it would be of priceless advantage for us ministers to sit,—nay, to engage in Jacob's wrestle with, till the morning breaks, and we wring the blessing. His is 'the electric power to emancipate our spirits through making us believe in the grand diapason of our entire divine human organ, all the stops pulled out; through making us believe, not in its intellect alone, but in its passionate yearnings, its devouring affections, its splendid audacities of spiritual courage.

"Take, for example, his magnificent poem of David seeking to charm away with song the melancholy and madness that have overwhelmed the mind of Saul. It is the glorification of the essence of human tenderness and redeeming mercy, as the Jacob's ladder of ascent to what is kindred with, yet infinitely higher than themselves. First, the youthful harpist chants in lyric rapture all that bounteous life has given of power, glory, joy, splendor of service, to the broken-hearted king. But the day is past for these to recall more than a surface light-gleam on the gloomy deep of the monarch's mind. And so despair sets in on the baffled consoler's heart, the despair our own breasts so piteously know when our yearning to succor and help goes to pieces on the shoals of human impotence. No help in man, is there help in God? Sure of his own love, is there no refuge of surety in a diviner love, which is also infinite power? Shall the created surpass the Creator at the crowning point? No answer does he find to this last, short of the everlasting 'No!' of a soul revolting from the impious contradiction of the thought. But it is enough. The bands of despair are broken, and his spirit leaps in exultation:—

'I believe it! 'tis thou, God, that givest, 'tis I who receive;
In the first is the last, in thy will is my power to believe.
Would I fain, in my impotent yearning, do all for this man,
And dare doubt He alone shall not help him, who yet alone can?
See the King! I would help him, but cannot, the wishes fall through.
Could I wrestle to raise him from sorrow, grow poor, to enrich;
To fill up his life, starve my own out, I would,—knowing which,
I know that my service is perfect. Oh, speak through me now!
Would I suffer for him that I love? So wilt Thou! so wilt Thou!"

Where Are We?

The "American Board Extra" of the Springfield Republican is before us, containing sixteen compact pages of the proceedings and speeches, thirteen solid columns of the names of the distinguished attendants, D. D.s and LL. D.s without number, presidents of colleges, professors and editors of fame,—and still the burden of that hot week of discussion and controversy related to an obscure theological doctrine, upon which no light of scientific evidence or experimental proof has ever been thrown or can be thrown, and the weight of the Board of Foreign Missions is thrown overwhelmingly upon the side of an antique, cruel and infamous doctrine. A doctrine that implies that the power that gave being to the teeming millions of struggling, stumbling human souls, has so limited their scope and prolonged their existence that inevitably an overwhelming majority of the human souls that have lived and are now upon the earth must be doomed to endless woe, because, perchance, they have not heard of the name and fame of Jesus. And to most of them, through no fault of their own, this knowledge has been impossible. We rub our eyes to assure ourselves that we are awake. We ask ourselves if we are living in an age both of science and philanthropy. And still these men are right. They are honest, consistent interpreters of a system based upon a book, and pledged to creeds that can be changed only by discarding them. If any body wants to know the conditions upon which the great Congregational body of America will send a messenger of good tidings to benighted realms, let him read the following:

MEMORANDUM FOR CANDIDATES.

A perusal of the following brief outline of doctrine may perhaps be helpful to candidates in stating their doctrinal views.

OUTLINE OF DOCTRINE.

1. The existence of one God, infinite in all perfections, revealed as Father, Son and Holy Spirit.
2. The divine authority and inspiration of the Holy Scriptures.
3. The divine purposes and providence extending to all persons and all events, yet so that individual human freedom and responsibility abide unimpaired.
4. The universal sinfulness of man, by nature destitute of holiness and alienated from God, and so exposed to righteous divine condemnation except through redeeming and regenerating grace.
5. The incarnation of the son of God, and his propitiatory sacrifice upon the cross, the just for the unjust, as the only ground of forgiveness of sin.
6. The resurrection and mediatorial intercession and reign of the glorified Lord and Savior.
7. Salvation provided for all men on condition of repentance toward God, and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ.
8. The work of the Holy Spirit in the regeneration and sanctification of men.

9. The institution of the visible church, whose sealing ordinances are baptism, to be administered to believers and their infant children, and the Lord's Supper.

10. The observance of the Lord's day, the Christian Sabbath, as a day of holy rest and worship.

11. The immortality of the soul, the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, the resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust, and the final judgment, the issues of which will be determined by the deeds done in the body; so that the wicked will go into punishment, and the righteous into life, both of which will be without end.

NOTE.—Should there be doubts in relation to any of these doctrines, will the candidate please mention the fact in replying to the second question of the manual, in order that opportunity may be given, should it seem desirable, for further correspondence or conference upon the matter.

E. K. ALDEN, Home Secretary.

The Meeting of the American Board.

The recent annual meeting of the American Board of Foreign Missions, at Springfield, Mass., (Oct. 4-8,) is of such interest as a "sign of the times," that we give a somewhat extended report of the same, and of the issues in debate.

The Board was established in 1810. It has grown in wealth and resources, and in the extent of its missionary activities through all these years, until now it disburses annually nearly $600,000. Its revenue is collected mainly from the orthodox Congregational churches, though some contributions come from Presbyterians. The Board is a close corporation of 220 members, filling its own vacancies. It holds, therefore, a very peculiar position in a Congregational body. While drawing its revenue from the churches, the latter have no direct franchise in the Board. This plan of organization seems to have been adopted for greater security of doctrine, the organization having originated at a time when there was great apprehension from the "new departures" in religious thought, and a corresponding reaction in favor of the established creed. It started also in a company of students in the Andover theological school, a school established but a little before with the special aim of maintaining the old Calvinistic theology, and whose professors, as Mr. Ingersoll once humorously expressed it, were enjoined to make solemn promises every five years that "They would learn nothing new!" Through all these years the Board has carried on its constantly increasing work, and carried it on probably to the general acceptance of the churches supporting it. But if the Andover school, with all its guards, could not keep out the "new orthodoxy," still less could the more popular organizations of the churches do so. Close corporations, however, change less easily. The early traditions are continued through this self-perpetuating policy. And thus there has recently come an open clash between the Board and a very considerable part of its supporting constituency. The administration of the Board is in the hands of a Prudential Committee of ten, and a Secretary. Some three years ago this committee began to discriminate in its appointment of young men as missionaries, rejecting such as seemed to have been touched by the "new orthodoxy," and more especially declaring itself against any theory that involved a future probation. It was not enough that the candidate should disavow actual belief in such probation for the heathen; he was not to hold it as a bare hypothesis. In short, he was required to know that to those who died out of Christ, God would open no door of salvation hereafter. To the statement of one woman applicant that she "left the heathen in the hands of God," which, in a finite being, would seem a very proper thing to do, the Secretary of the Board is reported to have replied that this was not "adequate!" More positive knowledge was required on her part as to what God would do with them hereafter. Such agnosticism was intolerable to the Home Secretary!

According to the Secretary's report for the past year, one hundred and one persons have been presented to the committee for appointment, of whom seventy-one have been accepted. Of the thirty not appointed, the reasons for rejection are confessed to have been doctrinal in the case of seven; one was advised to give more time to his opinion upon the conscious existence of the wicked after death, in the light of Scripture; two were poisoned with a belief in the final salvation of all men; one had doubts as to the personality of God; and three had become infected with the hypothesis of a future probation. The meeting at Des Moines a year ago had shown as never before the attitude of the Board towards the movement of freer thought in the fellowship. The discussion at that time helped to define the issues involved, and to clarify thought on both sides. The conservative party triumphed. A resolution, however, was adopted, which was calculated to meet the grievance felt by the minority. This resolution recommended to the Prudential Committee to consider the expediency of calling a council of the churches in difficult cases turning upon doctrinal views of candidates for the missionary service, and instructed the Committee to report upon said resolution at the next meeting of the Board. This, if passed, would take away the present aspect of a theological court on the part of the Board, and would be in conformity with the usage of the churches in the matter of ordination and installation in the ministry at home. It would remove what to many, and justly, as it seems to us, appears to be an anomaly in the congregational polity; a close corporation sitting in judgment upon the doctrinal views of young men offering themselves as ministers in the missionary field, and rejecting persons who would be accepted as ministers in many of the pulpits at home. The report of the Prudential Committee on this resolution, therefore, was to be significant. It would show whether that Committee was to yield its assumed functions, as a court of orthodoxy, in favor of the free councils of the churches, or was more determined than ever to retain them. The result was what might have been anticipated from the temper and tone of the meeting at Des Moines, and the temper and tone of most of the stronger journals of the body the past year. The Committee reported adversely upon the resolution. The report went before the meeting, and after earnest discussion, the recommendation of the committee was indorsed by a very large majority (110 to 19). This was a special report of the Prudential Committee, and the indorsement of it scored a victory for the conservative element in the Board. The next day came the report of the committee appointed to pass upon the Home Secretary's general report for the year, which had already been read before the meeting. Here again the issue—what in a double sense may be called the burning issue—came to the front. A majority and minority report were presented, the former by Doctor Boardman, of Chicago theological seminary, the latter by Professor Fisher, of Yale theological school. It was five to two. The five heartily indorsed the general report of the secretary, and sustained the action of the Prudential Committee in all its efforts to keep out "heresy" from the foreign field. The two dissented from sections of the report, and especially from the assumption of the Prudential Committee to be a court of final authority in pronouncing upon the theological soundness or unsoundness of candidates for the foreign field.

Upon these two reports there followed a long and earnest discussion; not always close to the issues involved, but in the main clear, forcible and interesting. There were strong men on both sides, men of logic and with the eloquence of passion. At the close the majority report was adopted by a vote of 95 to 43 (for the minority), 29 not voting. This was probably the most representative vote on the main issues involved, and marked some gain of the liberal party as compared with its showing one year ago at Des Moines. But it was a decided victory for the conservatives, so far as victory can be said ever to lie in a count of votes when the great questions of religion and the soul are under discussion. These questions do not long remain settled by the votes of any council or synod. Truth is not a corpse on which men sit and hold inquest, but a living thing constantly presenting new aspects and developments. One thing more remained to be done. The committee on nominations for the ensuing year presented a majority and minority report. Here again the conservative side carried the day. Just before this the committee on the election of new members presented thirteen names—not one of them, it is said, representing the liberal side! It is said that on Tuesday morning, before the opening of the Springfield meeting, there was a secret conference to which those, and those only, who were known to be opposed to a more liberal policy of the Board were invited and received by tickets, and at which the plan of action afterwards carried out was adopted. If so, it is by no means the first time in history that the methods of the political caucus have been adopted by ecclesiastical bodies, and it will probably not be the last. Your ecclesiastic as well as your politician has a genius for "fixing things" and seeing in the success of his carefully laid schemes the voice of the people or the voice of God. None so loudly devout as they who doubt the sufficiency of the human soul, and think that truth has no power to commend itself to men.

And thus closed this important meeting of the American Board at Springfield. It was a victory for the old school within the fellowship, but a victory that time is sure to reverse. It has served to emphasize more than ever the divergent thought in the Congregational fold, and which indeed exists in all the great fellowships. It marks the tide of more liberal ideas setting in upon the shores of inherited creeds. It has provoked discussions anew, beginning in the meeting, reported over the land, renewed by many a fireside and carried on upon many lips—a discussion that, instead of closing the questions at issue, will only more and more open them to the light of intelligent and free judgment.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

The Woman's Medical College.

The "Woman's Medical College of Chicago" is an institution with a history, and a very interesting one, too, embodying the tale of many obstacles, all bravely overcome. At first it did not even own a home, and during the opening course of lectures, given in 1871, moved so often that this might have been called the session on wheels. And once, after the great fire, it was forced to take refuge in a barn! This must have been a droll experience, for, of course, the arrangements were extremely primitive. The lecture-room contained only a bare kitchen table at the end where the professors sat, and two rows of chairs for the students; and the museum consisted of a few tumors, badly preserved, and very obtrusive as to odor. But now better times are come, and the college is well established in a building on Lincoln street, opposite Cook county hospital. There are four floors. On the first is the free dispensary, and on the second the general lecture-room. There is another lecture-room in the third story, and a chemical laboratory besides; and the fourth contains that chamber of mysteries, the dissecting-room. The nearness of the Cook county hospital is a great advantage, for the students are allowed to witness the surgical operations there, and to hear the clinical lectures. Then, at the Hospital for Women and Children, they have the opportunity of studying the diseases of the inmates, and at the Illinois Eye and Ear Infirmary they learn how to treat the organs of sight and hearing. So they have plenty of chances to acquire the practical application of the science they have chosen.

The faculty has elected Dr. William H. Byford for its president, and that is quite as it should be, since he was one of the founders of the college, and has been its good friend always. He is professor of gynecology, in which branch he is renowned as a specialist, and about which he has written several books. And next comes Dr. Charles Warrington Earle. The students must enjoy his clinics, for he has to do with the diseases of children; and it is the prettiest thing to see him treat "these little people," as he loves to call them. He is very sympathetic, and very funny, also, and seasons the dry facts in his lectures with bits of jest which quite convulse the class. Doctor Earle is treasurer of the faculty, and a very warm friend of the college. Then there is Dr. Daniel R. Brower, with his long title—"Professor of Diseases of the Nervous System and Clinical Medicine." He is well known as a legal expert, and has been connected with various insane asylums. He has a particular talent for instructing. I attended one of his lectures the other day, and, though I had never considered the subject at all absorbing, I quite forgot myself in hearing about the convolutions of the brain, and the fissure of Sylvius, and which part of the brain it is that does our seeing for us, and which has the control of our arms and legs. Dr. Isaac N. Danforth is the professor of renal diseases, and is a fine pathologist. He is particularly interested in the lady medical missionaries! Mrs. Danforth is as anxious as her husband that the college shall succeed, and has written articles for the papers, and aided the cause in various ways. I must not forget Dr. David Graham, the professor of surgery, who has been connected with the college a long time, and who has held posts of honor in many medical organizations,—even the presidency of the Chicago Medical Society; nor Dr. Henry M. Lyman, the professor of practice of medicine, who was once rather skeptical about lady physicians, but has become a thorough convert now. Nor Dr. E. Fletcher Ingals, the fastidious professor, who always looks as if he had stepped directly out of a bandbox, but who, nevertheless, lectures admirably about diseases of the chest and throat, and has written a book upon the same. But after all, I think the college should be proudest of the lady members of its staff, for they are all its children, except Dr. Mary Thompson, and she was one of its founders. She it was, too, who established the Hospital for Women and Children, of which she is now the surgeon; and she is one of the leading lady physicians of the country. Then there are the four graduates of the institution,—Dr. Sarah Stevenson, Dr. Marie J. Mergler, Dr. Mary E. Bates and Dr. Eliza H. Root. Doctor Stevenson is a fine lecturer, and a very brilliant woman altogether. Doctor Mergler, who went, after graduating, to study in Zurich, is regarded as an expert in gynecology, in which branch she instructs the students of her alma mater. She is the secretary of the faculty, too. She is an especial favorite with the girls, and so, too, is Doctor Bates, who is the youngest member of the faculty, and who lectures upon anatomy with an animation which makes it quite interesting. Doctor Root is professor of hygiene and medical jurisprudence, and has a position on the staff of the Woman's Hospital.

Putting aside those who are actively connected, the college has plenty of good friends. There is Dr. Rosa Engert, who has established an annual prize of $50 to the student who passes the best examination in microscopy. Doctor Dyas and his noble wife, who aided Dr. Mary Thompson in the founding of the Hospital for Women and Children, have always done much to further the cause. Mrs. Grace Chandler, of Detroit, has established a perpetual scholarship, that medical missionaries may be educated. Is it not beautiful to be able to do such things? There is nothing I would enjoy better than to play the fairy god-mother to a college like this,—bestow a library on it, endow a chair, or do anything that would enlarge its capacity for usefulness.

Dr. Mary Reynolds, the first woman who ever secured a position in a Wisconsin insane asylum, is a graduate of this college. So, too, is Dr. Delia Howe, who has charge of the female patients in the Kankakee asylum, and who, when she held a similar post in Jefferson, was instrumental in introducing many reforms there. It is our students, by the way, who so valiantly assailed the hospitals of Cook county, and made it possible for women to hold positions in them. These were monopolized by men, until four members of the class of 1879 boldly presented themselves to be examined for places in the Jefferson insane asylum. It was an ordeal, of course, and the young men laughed at them dreadfully; but they had their triumph, for they did best of all, and one of them received an appointment. She didn't get the place; through some political intrigue it was given to a male relative of one of the Cook county officials,—a stupid young man, who wasn't even required to pass an examination. But the ice was broken, and since then women have repeatedly secured positions.

Students who wish merely to take up special branches are very welcome at the college. They are beginning to come in, for girls are getting interested in such things now, and their parents are learning that chemistry is more useful than crayon work, physiology more important than French, and that not even the study of art is so productive of good results as the study of anatomy.

The Divinity School Address (1838).

"In how many churches, by how many prophets, tell me, is man made sensible that he is an infirmit soul; that the earth and heavens are passing into his mind; that he is drinking for ever the soul of God?" (The Address, p. 134.)

"Which caused a profound sensation in religious circles." (Doctor Holmes.)

"The Unitarian ministers debated whether Emerson was a Christian; some said he was not; some that he was an atheist, while others earnestly defended him. And still others called him pantheist." (Cooke.)

FIRST EVENING.—Pages 119–127 (paragraphs 1–11.)

Introductory Poem. "Worship," read aloud, with interpretation.

Paper. "Ralph Waldo Emerson at thirty-five,—a life sketch." (Include the occasion of the Address and its incidents.)

Great Sentences. Each one give from memory the sentence he likes best in these nine pages.

Analysis of Essay. Its three parts. Two of the class read their outlines, the rest comparing their own.

Discussion on "The sentiment of virtue is the essence of all religion." (p. 121.)

(1.) What are his five "classes of facts in which the moral sentiment is conspicuous?"

(2.) "These laws execute themselves." Do his four illustrations illustrate that? For other illustrations see essays on "Worship," (vol. vi., 206–220), and "Spiritual Laws," (vol. ii.).

(3.) "The sublime creed." To understand it better, read the essay on "The Over-Soul," (vol. ii.).

(4.) "This sentiment is divine and deifying. It is the beatitude of man. It makes him illimitable." Is the sentiment of virtue the essence of all religion?

(5.) It successively creates all forms of worship." The difference between theology and religion.

(6.) "An intuition," and never "second-hand." The difference between "truth for authority" and "authority for truth,"—between "intuition" and "tuition."

Scripture Passages. What passages in these nine pages worthy of pulpit reading? Select Bible passages to go with them. Is it the beauty of the sentences, or the morning quality about the thought, that makes new readings of the essay such delight?

Closing Poem. "Astræa," with interpretation.

References.

By permission of Mr. Emerson's family and the publishers, this Address has been printed as a tract, No. 8, in the "Unity Mission" series. Published at UNITY office, 175 Dearborn street, Chicago. Price, 5 cents; ten for 25 cents. Before long another tract, combining great passages selected from Emerson's works, will be printed.

By all means read in Cabot's Memoir, chapters vii. and ix. The kindred essays by Emerson, illustrating this Address (both evenings on it), are among his very noblest:—"Worship," (vol. vi.); "Sovereignty of Ethics," "Character" and "The Preacher," all three in vol. x.

Kindred poems:—"The World-Soul;" "Wood Notes" (the close of the second); "Brahma."

Incidents connected with the Address:—

For his "prayer without pronouns," before it,—see the Unity Mission tract, p. 11.

For the omitted passage,—see Concord Lectures, p. 159.

For the commotion caused by the Address, 'Professor Norton, Professor Ware, Emerson's letters, etc.,' see Cabot's Memoir, pp. 330–344, 685–694, and Cooke's Life, pp. 66–76.

SECOND EVENING, pages 127-148 (paragraphs 12-35).

Introductory Poem. "The Problem," read with interpretation.

Paper. "The Semi-Centennial of the Address: the Transcendental Movement and its Results."

Great Sentences. Each one from memory give the sentence he finds noblest in these twenty-two pages.

Discussion on "The Errors of the Prevailing Christianity, and the Remedy."

(1) Emerson's first criticism,—is it as true for to-day? His estimate of Jesus,—is it below your own, or above? Is Jesus degraded, or exalted, by insulation?

(2) "The soul knows no persons." Person and individual,—is there any difference? If so, which does Emerson mean? Why was Dr. Ware alarmed?

(3) "Miracle and Monster." "Why should one ask me an opinion about miracles?" he once said: "look into the diamond eyes of that child, and see her hair of sunshine. What is a Jewish or a Christian miracle beside it?" "The commonplace of miracle." (Lowell's "Cathedral.") Tennyson's "Flower in the crannied wall."

(4) The second criticism. His test question for the churches,—what church can best stand that test to-day? Yours?

(5) "Decay and almost death of faith:" is our time a November, or rather an April, of faith?

(6) Emerson's remedy for these defects. His definition of true Christianity,—would Jesus have put it so? The "immanence" of God—what does it mean? Priests by nature, priests without the office,—do you know any such?

(7) "The new Teacher" and his full-circle gospel. In an age like ours is another "Christ" likely to appear,—will the Teacher be again one individual? (See "Character" in vol. iii., 111-113.) Was he one eighteen centuries ago? Try now to sum up Emerson's contribution to that growing gospel,—his leading thoughts about the Over-Soul, Nature, Man, Society.

(8.) Why the commotion caused by this address fifty years ago? To-day it is a Unitarian tract; yet is its mission ending, or but just begun?

Scripture Passages. Select for pulpit-readings from these twenty-two pages, and match them from the Bible.

Closing Poems. "Bethlehem Star" (p. 276). "At Rome" (p. 301).

ST. LOUIS, MO.—On the Sunday preceding the beginning of our Unity Club work, Miss Safford spoke on the "Religious Value of Culture." On the Thursday evening following was the first meeting of the Longfellow Section. There is to be a series of papers in this section on the Mission of Poetry. Dr. R. H. Brown read the first of these papers at this meeting; his paper was enjoyed so much by the club that they requested it for publication, and it appeared in Sunday's Journal. The subject for the evening was the "Poet's Home." Short poems were read, followed by an interesting conversation about the city of Cambridge and the Charles river. This last led to a discussion of the favorite rivers of the different poets, as revealed in their poetry. The leader of this section has prepared programmes for fifteen evenings. One evening being given to a dramatic representation of "Courtship of Miles Standish," another to the story of "Evangeline," three to the "Golden Legend," etc. The leader is under great obligation to "Gannett's Outline for the Study of Longfellow" in preparing the year's work. The Longfellow section alternates with a Shakespeare section, which is to study "Macbeth" and the "Merchant of Venice."

THE "Lincoln Life," in the forthcoming November Century, has to do with the period after Lincoln's election, and before his inauguration. In this installment will be given to the world for the first time fourteen letters of President Lincoln. These are written to men like General Scott, Mr. Seward, Mr. Raymond, Mr. Gilmer and others.

THE STUDY TABLE.

The Fair God: A Tale of the Conquest of Mexico. By Lew Wallace. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

This book has occupied the field of literature for some time, the copy before us being one of the thirty-second edition, and though the reading of it has been delayed, yet we find that the volume stands the test prescribed by Emerson and ranks among the books one wants to read.

In this story the author, better known, perhaps, from his famous production "Ben Hur," has seized upon a tragical period in the history of the Aztec race, and given us another demonstration of his power as a dramatic writer. For the sake of the attractiveness which a story gains thereby the author assumes the attitude of a translator of manuscript attributed to a writer who lived at the time of the events described. With the charm of elaboration which distinguishes the story-teller from the mere historian, we are made acquainted with the ancient civilization, which, even at that early day, in many ways surpassed that from which the conquerors came. Human ambition, love and passion are vividly set before us. The nature of the sad-faced monarch, Montezuma, is exhibited from every point of view; the just and tender side, as well as the stern and unrelenting. For instance, in the trial scene, in Book III., where the accused man is one who has lately risked his own life to save that of the monarch, the gratitude of the latter overcomes every other emotion. Even the knowledge that the man was the follower of the banished Guatamozin had no effect to lessen his regard for his preserver. A stern sense of justice leads him to a public acknowledgment of the act and to declare judgment in favor of the accused as against the noble chief of high rank who is accuser. This is a powerful passage. According to the story, the familiar tradition and prophetic belief which prevailed at that time regarding the promised return of the wise, good and powerful deity who brought peace, plenty and universal happiness to the valley, was now about to be fulfilled. Rumors of the appearance of fair-haired men circulated through the country. They were thought to be descendants of the Fair God, and endowed with his mysterious power. It was said to be a part of the tradition that the royal line of Aztecs was to end with Montezuma. The monarch was consumed with dread and superstition.

The progress of the conquerors towards the capital, the attendant victories and final conquest over the weak and vacillating sovereign, the mingled emotions of the people as they saw their monarch relinquish his rights in favor of the strangers,—are all most graphically and picturesquely described. Love and romance, with noble self-sacrifice and perilous daring, find expression in the lives of the young chiefs and the noble princesses. The characterization of the lovers shows the poetical power of the writer's pen. The historical points in the story are entirely faithful to authentic accounts of the conquest, and the book may be accepted as a valuable addition to existing volumes on the subject.

The New Christianity. An Appeal to the Clergy and to All Men in Behalf of its Life of Charity. By John Ellis, M. D., author of "The Wine Question in the Light of the New Dispensation," "Deterioration of the Puritan Stock," etc., etc. New York: Published by the author.

This book is by a Swedenborgian doctor, not a doctor of divinity, but of medicine, as would appear by his published title. The writer seems to have a hobby, or rather a connected series of hobbies, which he can not forget or let alone for a moment if he speaks at all. His chief or central hobby is intemperance, or the use of intoxicants, upon which question he takes the extreme position that it is sinful to use fermented wine for communion purposes, and also that a part of intemperance consists in the use even of tea and coffee. Of course tobacco and opium, and many other drugs, come in for a share of his unsparing denunciation. But he does not stop here; fine wheaten flour is, to his penetrating vision, a fertile source of many of the ills that our flesh is heir to.

and among the ills to which our flesh is not heir naturally, our author enlarges particularly upon the matter of tight lacing among the female portion of our population. This book is of a sort that can do little good. It will be read with not only cordial approval, but with intense feeling by a certain class of persons who sympathize with its sentiments, but they will only be confirmed in opinions and feelings that already sway their lives; the book will convince nobody. Those who might profit by its facts and its counsel will be so soon disgusted by the extreme positions of the author that they will not read. Religiously, the book is written from the Swedenborgian standpoint.

Picture Pages for Little People. By the Sunday-school Association, Essex Hall, Essex street, Strand, London, W. C.

This is an attractive little English book of about 86 pages, containing 42 good full-page pictures. On the page opposite to each picture is a short story explaining it. The stories are told in the simple style so entertaining to little people, and often are instructive. The book is printed in good plain type, on cream-tinted paper, and would be a very welcome gift to every little one.

GEORGE H. ELLIS, publisher, Boston, has in press a 16mo book of 137 pages, entitled "Science and Immortality." The work is a reproduction of the discussion by many eminent scientists on "What Science says about Immortality," which attracted such wide attention in the Christian Register of April 7. The contributions have been carefully revised by their authors, and the work has been enriched by additional contributions from Prof. A. Graham Bell; Gen. A. W. Greely, of the United States Signal Service; Prof. Joseph Le Conte, of the University of California; and Prof. Edward C. Pickering, of Harvard Observatory. In addition to the "Symposium," there are included biographical notes, giving a brief outline of the scientific career of the writers.

THE HOME.

Proverb Sermons.—III.

(Concluded.)

The other side of the double wisdom is to observe that gratitude demands a raising of itself to a great height, even into a measure of love; for obligation to one whom we value not is a loss of freedom. I remember well (for it sunk deep into me) what was said to me by a wise elder friend, while yet I was young as a preacher and teacher, namely, that never I should accept great gifts. "For," said he, "from friends they are needless, because much love will pack in little gifts; and if a public man receive rich favors, he parts with so much of his liberty as must weigh down the value of them." This wisdom the more grounded in me that afterwards I saw considerable example of it; for I met a good man who had given a lad his education, and afterwards the lad went to one side of a public question and his benefactor to the other, each by his own conscience and reason. Then did I hear the good man grumble at the ingratitude of the youth whom he had educated; which, I say, was a warning example to me of the wisdom of my elder friend after the dear voice of it had withdrawn into the sky. Therefore, in this point I would differ from the proverb, and even go straight against it; for I would look the gift horse in the mouth, not to see whether he be young and good enough, but to make sure that he be not so young, strong and fiery that he will run away with me altogether and throw me from my seat of freedom.

I have a caution for wise conduct to set down here; and, indeed, it were strange if knowledge of gratitude led to no better safety and wiser walk in life than without it we could have. For as it were but a vain astronomy, and of little account, which measured, weighed, and mapped the stars, but gave no man use of the heavens to track his way over the deep, so has gratitude but half its office if it show us no way over the deep of life into ports of love and friendship. Therefore take this rule of sailing by the star of gratitude,—In choosing of friends beware of any ungrateful person; yea, and watch narrowly, for in this matter a little sign means much. Wherefore, if thou hast observed that a person repays not a benefit with his heart, or, which is worse, if thou hast seen him shortly forget it, or afterward, which is the worst, beheld him give back some ill turn, though it be no more than a slighting word or unheedingful act, then, I say, beware of him and have him not for a friend. For if so he return a benefit, it must be because either he is selfish or he is vain, and like enough both, for these two go twinned like painted wings, seeming aerial but lifting nothing. Such a one surely will fail thee if thou venture with him; for either, being selfish, he will think only of his own interest—which bars love; or being vain, he will think every benefit his by right of desert—which bars love. But this I have said before. Yet I warn thee again, if thou see one ungrateful to another, though it be never so little, hold off from him; and if thy heart has begun to go to him, turn it away; for he will fail thee or hurt thee or trick thee as surely as night follows day. And if thou fall once into the darkness of his heart, it is night without a dawn; for ingratitude is a bottomless pit. A man's first care in life is to keep himself right; but after this what so weighty business has he as to choose his loves well? And if, for this, there be any sign or guide so good as gratefulness or so warning as ungratefulness, I have not found them; and truly I have learned this as a man barefoot might obtain a golden treasure hid among thorns, with many wounds. Also I pray thee observe nicely whether a man show much gratefulness for small good turns; for this is a main sign, and very notable. Though it is said wisely that "it needs a great nature to bear the weight of a great gratitude," yet it is wiser still to think a soul is small and ungrateful which has not a lively gratitude for little things, since love is love and of great price, though it go forth in a small sign or but in a breath, as a word.

So much of gratitude to men; but now also we have to speak of gratitude to God. Gratitude to God!—what a theme that is! To preach of it forever were to do no worse than to take up every hap of daily life to show whence it comes and what it means—surely a useful thing and full of matter. Gratefulness to God makes the good haps, how lowly soever, into warm joys; whereupon these good things are found to be as many as the sands of the sea in number. A friend writes me, "You used to contend that there was far more of joy than sorrow in life; I wonder if you would say so now." Ay, that would I! And never more than now; for never have I seen better that a thankful spirit makes all joys very great joys, and a humble spirit, which goes with thankfulness, so takes sorrows that they turn to peace. Now if one turn happy things into great joys in God, and sorrows into peace in God, what is this but to turn the whole world into hope and light? If a life be very full of sorrows or overcast with some deep dusk so that it seem night-like, gratitude to God is like going out into the night under the sky; for then if there be but one star, it holds the eye more than all the dark space. But there are hosts of stars, so that the eye wherever it turn is but a quiver for their darts. Then thereto comes reason, teaching that in the infinity of space every line whatever shooting out betwixt the stars is but a track to a star beyond our vision; whereupon the heavens blaze at every point, and all the sky is at noon. Truly Herbert's prayer is good,—"Thou that hast given so much to me, give one thing more, a grateful heart;" which is but as if a man blind, or of dim and blurred vision, but by report or by faint shapes catching at the glories about him, should pray that he might see well.

Here an end. As concerning gratitude I have spoken to thee out of my very heart, so I pray thee take my words into thine; for thus thou canst bless me with gratitude for a joy among the greatest joys, namely, that I serve a fellow being. For these truths touch life very nearly. In sum—Give gratitude without stint, for this is thy duty to others and thine own rightness in thyself.

Lift thy gratitude on high to God, for this makes all joys great joys, as all streams become vast in the sea.

If thou see any one thankless, howsoever little, beware of him; open not thyself to him. But if thou see one grateful, and in especial for little things, thou mayest "grapple him to thy soul with hooks of steel."

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Geneva, Ill.—The society has decided to have "lay services." Their financial energies are to be directed towards a parsonage. T. P. Byrnes, recently of the Meadville Theological school, preached there last Sunday, and made such a good impression that, notwithstanding the plan for lay services, he was engaged to preach for three Sundays.

Greeley, Col.—Rev. N. S. Hogeland's relation as pastor terminates here November 1, at his own request. He leaves the society in a very prosperous condition. The Sunday-school has been reorganized, and its superintendent is a well known business man, who is also a graduate of Ann Arbor. His assistant is one of the ablest primary teachers in the public schools. Mr. Horton's graded plan of study has been adopted, and is considered a move in the right direction.

La Porte, Ind.—A Unity Club has been formed in La Porte for the study of Emerson, taking the essay on "Domestic Life" for the first topic; has a very fine class and starts out with the most encouraging prospects; several have joined from other churches. The Free Kindergarten Association, of La Porte, have one school in active operation, and are devising means for the support of another in a different quarter of the city. A Lend a Hand Club has been organized among the young people of the Unitarian Church and their friends, to assist the above association in its work.

Philadelphia.—The opposition manifested towards Unity church, Camden, by the orthodox clergymen of that place, is something quite pretentious. By sermon, speech and letter, from the pulpits and through the newspapers, a very bitter animosity is expressed, though always ignorantly. Mr. Haskell has replied directly to certain of these strictures in one thoroughly dignified sermon, and has in various ways indirectly made clarifying affirmations. The consequence of the assaults has been at once seen in an increased attendance upon the Sunday services.

—Moncure Conway is to address the Contemporary Club at its November meeting upon some subject touching the form of our government and the wise changes that might be asked for it.

—A supper recently given at Unity church, Camden, was attended by informal remarks from May, Mangasarian and Haskell, as clergymen, from Mr. Galvin, connected with the Germantown society, from Thomas B. Harned, prominently identified with the Camden movement, and from Mr. Sharp, whose wife directs Unity's Kindergarten, but who is himself orthodox in sentiment. The excitement aroused among the Camden ministers was pleasantly alluded to by several. After the supper the Ethical Association held its regular monthly meeting in the parlors above.

—Weston has been invited to speak in Chadwick's church in April next on "The Ethics of George Eliot."

—Unity Journal is to be the name of the monthly sheet projected from the Camden church. The first issue will probably appear within a fortnight. Editorially it will be in charge of Mr. Haskell and perhaps one other. Two young members of the church, Collingham and Kettler, will probably attend to the business requirements of the venture. Mr. Haskell's sermon in reply to some of his Camden minister-critics will be the principal feature of the initial number.

Chicago.—The noon teachers' meeting was led last Monday by Mr. Blake, the lesson being on Luke iv., 31 to 44. He began upon the geography of the lesson. Capernaum was a prosperous little city, the center of a group of several that have passed out of existence, among which were Bethsaida and Chorazine. These might be called the "Jesus Circuit," with headquarters at Capernaum. He next dwelt upon the significance of the expression, "He taught as one having authority," not as one relying upon authority. Others depended upon priests, traditions, he upon himself.

Then came a discussion of the healing power of Jesus, the power of spirit over matter, and of spirit over spirit, which is ever in danger of being underestimated, and of the recent theories as to the power of mind over body. Did Jesus have in the universal belief in unclean spirits and demoniacal possessions, or did he accommodate himself to that belief without attempting to correct it? The class seemed inclined to the former opinion. There is no evidence that Jesus did not share in the common, scientific and philosophic conception of the times. Among those present were Rev. Bird Wilkins, of the new liberal movement among the colored people, and Rev. Eliza T. Wilkes, of Sioux Falls, Dak.

Boston Notes.—The trenches dug in our streets to receive telegraph wires reveal the earlier and later filling in of soil upon the edges of our original peninsula. The lines of beach of 1630 are now in the heart of the city. On our western side the ancient marshes are now fast being converted to solid soil or into blocks of brown stone fronts.

—It is definitely agreed upon to try Sunday evening theater meetings at the south end near the location of Rev. Mr. Hale's late church. Series of sermons by Messrs. Hale, Herford and Savage will cover the entire winter. Abundant music will be provided,—singing of effective hymns will be a marked feature. The detail arrangements will be undertaken by the new young men's "Channing Club."

—The more enthusiastic admirers of the ways of "Toynbee Hall" facilities are dreaming of a plan of inviting Rev. C. A. Bartol to become a preacher to the multitude, and of transforming his meeting house and spacious grounds into a popular hall and gymnasium and garden.

—Our "parting guest," the prominent English clergyman, Rev. James Green, will sail for home this week with very pleasant impressions of the religious independence and earnestness of all our denominations.

—Art and ingenuity combined have produced in the "Garland Stoves and Ranges" an article of household utility, which for elegance, durability, economy and convenience is unexcelled. The "Garland Stoves and Ranges" cost no more than is often asked for worthless imitations with which the market is flooded.

FIRST ANNUAL INSTITUTE

OF THE

Western Unitarian S. S. Society.

It has been for a long time felt that the crowded week of our Western Anniversaries has given little chance for the adequate discussion of Sunday-school and Unity Club work among our western churches. The directors of the above society have concluded to make a beginning in a wiser way and to hold, this fall, the first of a series of annual institutes. The meetings are to be held with the Third church, where all visiting attendants will be cordially entertained. Below we give a tentative programme, printing only the names of those who have accepted. All the parts have been assigned, but the correspondence is not yet complete. The directors are confident that the programme will be carried out essentially as given below. A full and revised edition of the programme will be printed and circulated as soon as possible.

PROGRAMME.

Tuesday, Nov. 8.

8 P. M., J. Vila Blake in charge. Opening sermon, Rev. Reed Stuart, of Detroit, Mich.

Wednesday, November 9.

9 A. M., J. L. Jones in charge. S. S. Institute work. Questions and discussions.

2 P. M., in charge of C. H. Kerr, Chicago. Unity Club Session. 30 minutes Essay, "Unity Clubs, their methods; the Bureau, etc." Rev. A. J. Rich, of Fall River, Mass.

Four types of Unity Clubs. 15 minute outlines of study courses and methods.

a. Emerson. J. C. Learned, St. Louis, Mo.

b. Social Politics. J. Vila Blake, Chicago.

c. Art History. W. R. French, of the Chicago Art Institute.

d. Travels, etc.

8 P. M., Musical Evening, led by Prof. W. L. Tomlins. J. Vila Blake in charge.

Thursday, November 10.

9 A. M., in charge of Rabbi E. G. Hirsch, Chicago. Old Testament work.

a. "The mythical element and its use in Sunday-schools." F. W. N. Hugenholz, of Grand Rapids, Mich.

b. "The ethical element." Dr. H. W. Thayer.

EDITORIAL.

FELIX ADLER pleads for a workshop in connection with the school for just the same reasons that a chemical laboratory is connected with every college.

CORNELL University starts out this year with a freshman class of 400 students, supposed to be the largest class that ever entered an American college at one time.

THOREAU says that whoever can discern truth has received his commission from a higher source than the chiefest justice in the world who can discern only law. He it is that delivers sentence. He finds himself constituted judge of the judge.

IN view of certain bibulous events which have occurred in Boston, the Unitarian Record suggests with some anxiety that this city may yet be known as the "Tub" rather than the "Hub." There is too much of the "tub" in all of our cities.

MAYOR ROCHE has lessened the number of licensed saloons in Chicago by a hundred, but there are thirty-eight hundred of them still left. We take heart in the thought that we are headed in the right direction, even though we make slow progress.

A QUERIST in the Christian Union thinks that religious truths have come into the world in the past rather through the poets, the seers, the idealists, and the prophets, than from the philosophers, the reasoners, the creed-makers, and the theological dogmatists. May this not be also true in the present?

IT is estimated that in 1850 the church members in America gave one and one-tenth mills to the dollar to missions; in 1860 they gave nine-tenths of a mill; in 1870 eight-tenths, in 1880 six and one-half tenths. Thus in thirty years the missionary potency of the converted dollar has been reduced nearly one-half.

LAST month the School Journal suggested a public school exhibit as a feasible attraction to the county fair. Why has not this become more general? Should not the school-house yield products as interesting as the garden to farming men and women; and are not bright boys and girls as attractive as fast horses? The county fair is a power in rural districts, but it is not always a power for good. Farmers have brains; let them be cultivated.

A CHICAGO daily, the other day, printed welcomes to President Cleveland in twenty different languages, thus voicing in their vernacular the citizens of Chicago. Doubtless there were many more who did not find their mother tongue represented. This suggests the gravity and the promise of the problems we have in hand. International communities must have interdenominational sympathies; in the merging of races creeds will get badly mixed.

MRS. LOUISA S. ROUNDS, president of the Illinois W. C. T. U., has recently declared that she was tired of hearing the old, threadbare cry, the long-harped-on tune of "woman's rights" preached by the godless women who had been leaders in the cause. She says she is first a Christian and then a temperance woman, and has heard too much about Emerson, Mill and Spencer. Evidently she does not care about having any devils exorcised except it be in the right name.

THIS sentence from Beecher's speech on his withdrawing from the New York Congregational Union should be kept going the rounds until it is fully realized that with the advent of evolution into the thought of man the old Biblio-centric theology was doomed and the new re-theology based upon the eternal growth and the ever inflowing life, began:

"I am an Evolutionist, and that strikes at the root of all orthodox theology, such as the fall of man in Adam, and the inheritance by the posterity of his guilt, and, by consequence, of any such view of atonement as has been constructed to meet this fabulous disaster. Men have not fallen as a race, men have come up; no great disaster met the race at its start."

AN orthodox exchange comments upon the statement of Doctor Atwood, that "there is no way of escaping the retributions of God. They are joined with the sin as effect with cause. It is a tremendous fact; but it is beneficent." Our contemporary asks:

"What shall we say to the poor penitent who, upon a bed of death, asks us what he must do to be saved? What, according to the above view, can we say but, Dear friend, you are in a pitiable case; you have lived many years in sin and are dying in sin; the only thing for you to do is to put on as brave a face as you can, and understand that there is no escape for you; you must suffer full retribution; you are on the way to the prison, and you can not hope to come out thence till you have paid the uttermost farthing of a debt which you have been all these years accumulating."

We cannot think of a better answer.

AT a recent installation in Brooklyn, Robert Collyer said in his sermon: "My old mother was a Baptist right down to the water, and she took great comfort in the 'green pastures and beside the still waters' in which she had been immersed. I was baptized in the Episcopal church, and I am strongly drawn to it yet. I tell Bishop Potter he is my bishop and he cannot disown me. I was brought up in an old-fashioned Congregational Sunday-school. I was a Methodist for ten years, and Methodism was a good nurse and spanked me well, and I go back to her for good bread and milk. So you see I have gone all around and I can't say that I am all right and that they are all wrong. But I stay at home in the Unitarian church and visit the others."

THE Northwestern Christian Advocate evinces a most commendable spirit in the following:

"Some good brethren are distressed about the question of wine at the communion table. Shall it be 'fermented' or 'unfermented'? We opine from the length and vigor of the present discussion that the settlement on the basis of the original material used at the first institution is still a long way off. In the meantime may we not suggest a compromise on water? The advantages are obvious. It could offend no one; we should be able to guarantee its honesty, and it is hardly conceivable that our Lord puts any emphasis on a particular element. He made water wine for hospitality's sake, and he would doubtless have made wine water if it had even suggested an occasion for contention. There is something repulsive in the thought of controversy about such trivialities. The end of the communion is not bread and wine, but love and Christ. We have to get pretty low to think of either being limited by grape juice, fermented or unfermented."

EDWARD EVERETT HALE gave the closing lecture in the Old South series this year. His subject was George Washington. This must have interested the bright girls and boys in his audience:

Washington rode much, boated, danced and had other exercises of the kind. As to the apple tree story, no doubt it was absolutely true, only the apple tree was a cherry tree. [Laughter.] The boy had to earn his own living. It was natural for one fond of mathematics and of the open air to turn to surveying. The notes Washington took in this expedition had been preserved, and were very interesting. Among them were two poems to a certain beauty. The worst, on the whole, the lecturer ever saw. One of them began, "Oh, ye gods, why should my poor resistless heart?" In the second "Cupid's dart" was made to rhyme with "feel the smart." Yet this was the boy who later came to be called so justly "first in war, first in peace and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

THE Union Signal has recently published a letter from Mrs. Livermore concerning the Bible doctrines of women preachers. She says that in her early and doubting days she sought the help of Professor Boise, then teaching Greek in the Chicago University. She says:

"He helped me to the right interpretation of the Scripture texts, regarded as hostile to woman's enfranchisement, and proved to me that Paul did not oppose woman's emancipation, nor her preaching the gospel. 'If Paul were in the world to-day, and held the views which were his when he wrote his Epistles, he might accept the position of president of the American Woman's Suffrage Association for any evidence there is to the contrary in his writings,' were the concluding words of Professor Boise."

Her husband, Rev. D. P. Livermore, also arrived at the same conclusion, and is the author of a helpful tract on the subject. This is well. But what if Paul would not look with favor on a woman in the pulpit, is that any valid reason why Mary A. Livermore and her associates should hide their lights under a bushel?

THE School Journal has the courage to say a good word for the much abused and often misinterpreted "crank." It says:

"Every member of the old Continental Congress, and every signer of the Declaration of Independence was a crank, in the opinion of George III. George Washington, and Benjamin Franklin were first class cranks, judged by the aristocrats of the old world. Socrates was a wicked crank in the opinion of a majority of his fellow-citizens; so was John Bunyan, and John Milton, and Savonarola, and Columbus, and a host of equally honored names, of whom the world was not worthy. Comenius was the first crank, who dared to publish an illustrated school-book, and Pestalozzi was the first of his race who had the courage to teach boys in accordance with the principles of Baconian philosophy. Your sleek, proper man, who takes off his hat and begs leave to apologize to the world for his thoughts, is a hypocrite of the first class. He isn't a crank, for he hasn't either brains or heart enough to be one. Every progressive teacher will be called a crank. Let him denounce mechanical teaching of spelling, unpractical arithmetic, senseless grammar nonsense, and unnatural reading, and the whispered word goes round, 'Don't you think he's a little cranky?' The educational world has occasion to return hearty thanks for the existence of this maligned class. Thank God for cranks!"

PUCK turns the stream of its satire upon one of the evil practices of the modern lecture bureau,—that of putting forward people who have nothing of real value to offer the public, but who have been brought into a temporary notoriety by some sensational act or accident:

"The lecture field will welcome during the coming season a number of new and brilliant minds. We are able to announce the names of a few of these newly discovered stars, and the manner in which they were found. The Pettis County Bugle says:

"Mrs. Mary C. Beggs, of this city, has just completed a crazy-quilt containing 14,862 pieces of silk and 149,694 stitches. Mrs. Beggs is in her ninety-eighth year, has eleven sound teeth and eats without glasses. She will soon start out on an extensive lecturing tour.—New Jersey Herald.

"Professor Tramp, who recently rode all the way from San Francisco to New York on the trucks of a freight car, has prepared an illustrated lecture which he will deliver at reasonable rates.

"Miss Sarah Jane Pillsbury, better known by her nom de plume of 'Ivy Leaf,' who has had two poems published in the Kansas City Stock Yards Journal and one in the Soap Manufacturers' Record, will this fall enter the lecture field with three lectures entitled: 'True Ethics of Poetry,' 'Longfellow's Lack of Poetic Inspiration,' and 'Faults and Failings of Shakespeare and Browning.' Miss Pillsbury will, at each lecture, read and have for sale a volume of her own poetry."

THE ever inventive and consequently suggestive John Page Hopps writes an interesting letter to the Inquirer (London) concerning readings in public worship from non-biblical sources. We quote the following:

For many years, worshipping with very varied audiences, I have read "Lessons" from books other than the Bible, and feel absolutely sure that only good has come of it. We need to remember that liberty increases responsibility, and calls for special care. In these alternative "Lessons" we shall sink and not soar unless we take pains to secure readings which, by the depth of their seriousness, the fineness of their feeling, and the greatness of their thought, prove their inspiration by their power to win the conscience, and to touch the heart. My own experiences began with the use of "The Imitation of Christ," identified with the name of Thomas à Kempis, and, since then, I have found much help in "The Koran" (new translation by E. H. Palmer), "The Meditations of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius Antoninus," the ancient religious books of India, some of the great Roman writers, and our own Dr. Rowland Williams. In all cases, the first great need is selection; the second is classification. If anyone tried to read "Lessons" from "The Imitation of Christ," or from "The Meditations," without selection and classification, he would soon get into trouble. It took me nearly six months to dig from that one little book the twenty-four "Lessons" which find a place in my book, "Readings for Public Worship and the Home;" and I am fully persuaded that if we are to read "Lessons" for genuine edification, and not merely as a survival of Bibliotry, we must select and classify even when we read from the Bible. But even they do that to some extent, who think it necessary to keep to the Bible, but who persistently ignore hundreds of chapters and read only a safe few. Discontented with that, as both indolent and wasteful, I have given a serious portion of two years to the framing of over one hundred Bible lessons, selected and classified, and thus far have found them distinctly tend to interest and edification. The passages for each lesson had, as a rule, to be taken from various books and brought together; but it is astonishing to find how these widely scattered, but really kindred, passages, when brought together, combine to illumine and press home some great thought or theme.

THE platform of the United Labor Party, adopted at Syracuse last August, is good reading for those who see in this organization only the turbulent workings of revolutionary forces. It asks that municipalities should supply their inhabitants with water, light and heat, establish a postal telegraph and savings bank system, reduce the machinery of courts and elevate and protect the voting system "since the ballot is the only means by which redress of grievances is to be sought." They further add:

"We do not aim at securing any forced equality in the distribution of wealth. We do not propose that the state shall attempt to control production, conduct distribution, or in any wise interfere with the freedom of the individual to use his labor or capital in any way that may seem proper to him and that will not interfere with the equal rights of others. Nor do we propose that the state shall take possession of land and either work it or rent it out. What we propose is not the disturbing of any man in his holding or title, but by abolishing all taxes on industry or its products, to leave to the producer the full fruits of his exertion and by the taxation of land values, exclusive of improvements, to devote to the common use and benefit those values, which, arising not from the exertion of the individual, but from the growth of society, belong justly to the community as a whole. This increased taxation of land, not according to its area, but according to its value, must, while relieving the working farmer and small home-stead owner of the undue burdens now imposed upon them, make it unprofitable to hold land for speculation, and thus throw open abundant opportunities for the employment of labor and the building up of homes."

There must needs be much earnest thinking and wise legislation along these lines in the next twenty-five years.

The Unity Hat.

We have never sent the UNITY hat around in vain. Whether it was in behalf of the colored people in the south, a cyclone church in Minnesota, Post-office Mission in Kansas or the building of a church in Chicago, the response has always been generous and prompt. Now our hat goes around in behalf of the new church movement in Sioux Falls, Dakota, the first and only Unitarian church in the territory; a church that heroically faces the large possibilities that await a free and progressive movement for religion in a new country; a church, too, that has sprung largely out of the heart and brain of woman. Sioux Falls is the home of Rev. Eliza T. Wilkes, under whose fostering care the movement came into being. The first pastor of the church is Miss Carrie Bartlett. The church building was begun last spring, and is modeled after the pretty Unity church of Topeka, Kansas. The local friends have contributed $3000, the Loan Building Fund has put in $2500. Last May Mrs. Wilkes was in the east and raised $1069 more, in the parishes of Revs. Herford, Savage, Dole, Collyer, Camp and others. Now the church awaits the final $500, without which it will not be completed; for they are pledged to avoid the paralysis of debt. Mrs. Wilkes is now in Chicago in the interests of this fund. Last Sunday she stood with the pastor of All Souls church in the pulpit, and although the rainy day made the audience small, the contribution of $87 was made on the spot, and that church will make it $100. It is hoped and expected that the older and abler churches of our city will give in proportion. But we want UNITY to have an interest in this church. It is a child of its inspiration. The money at All Souls church came from at least half as many people as there were dollars. We do not expect one UNITY reader to send us $100 for Sioux Falls, but we do expect that inside of a fortnight a hundred readers will send us a dollar or more each. Let those of our readers who have many privileges thus enrich their capacity for enjoying them by remembering those who have few. Let those who have not the privileges of a liberal church partially satisfy the hunger of soul by helping to establish this outpost in the prairie territory, and thereby hasten the time when their turn will come. In our announcement column we open this week our acknowledgment account. Any money sent to the senior editor of this paper will be promptly acknowledged in that column and duly forwarded. Friends east and west, let us hear from you. These fraternal touches have in them values other than financial. They give a sense of comradeship and nurse the family feeling. The roll is open.

100 x $1 = $100.

The Sunday Question.

A Christian convention for securing Sabbath observance is to be held in Elgin, November 8 and 9. The call is signed by many ministers and others, including most of the pastors of Elgin Association, by Bishop Mallilieu, of the Methodist church, all the presiding elders of Rock River Conference, and by business men of Chicago and other points. The convention is called for the purpose of securing united action for the recovery and preservation of the Sabbath day. The meeting is not called too soon nor without sufficient reason. Our railroads, newspapers, factories and stores have trespassed more and more upon the holy day. Places of amusement, theaters, base ball parks and the like are more boldly defying the laws of the land. It is time that the churches of the country united in calling for the due enforcement of the law. This they can do if they will; if they will only unite heartily in the doing of it.

The above notice, clipped from an exchange, shows that the Sunday problem still weighs heavily upon the mind of the church. That it is a serious problem no one should deny. On the one hand we must recognize the necessity of rest and recreation in the midst of our busy nineteenth century life. We are living too hard and too fast. We need to stop occasionally, and draw breath and let the recuperative forces have a chance to work. This, from the standpoint of physical health, is a weighty argument for a periodical rest from labor.

A still greater argument lies in the spiritual necessities of our nature. The man who spends the whole of his time in the midst of business cares,—studying how to buy for one price and sell for another,—is not living the whole of his life. There is a world of spiritual realities whose merest boundary is not crossed by such a man. The soul has its needs, as well as the body, and woe unto him who neglects the greater for the less. "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" These are deep words, and full of meaning. Shall not the soul have one day in seven? This is a vital question.

On the other hand, to arbitrarily adopt the rule of setting aside all secular affairs on every Sunday would produce endless confusion. Our complex civilization can not be subjected to the same rule as a people wandering in a desert, apart from the rest of the world. The wheels of modern life are too many, and too many interests revolve with them, to allow of stopping for twenty-four hours every seventh day. Railroads, telegraphs, steamships in mid-ocean, sail vessels propelled by the winds of God,—all these argue the impossibility of adopting any strictly arbitrary rule. We need not believe that the God of ever-active nature has made any law to block the wheels of civilization. The question cannot be discussed from the old standpoint. It must be brought before the bar of reason, illumined by the Spirit.

We shall find that every arbitrary law is based on a principle which can be applied flexibly. It is not the seventh day or the first day, but some day that should be devoted to the claims of the soul. It is not the seventh portion of time, but a just portion, which God demands from man. A man who must work seven days of the week may give a part of his evenings to the higher life. The soul's hunger is not periodical, like the hunger of the body, but it is as real, until blunted by long denial. Every man may find some time to feed the soul. No man should live by bread alone.

Whether the interests of the spiritual life can be best served by arbitrary Sunday laws, or by teaching the sacredness of daily life and the ever present need of spiritual food, is the real question at issue. How best to secure co-operation in rest and renewal as well as in work and investments. S. L.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

The Merciful Man.

In straight and simple lines his pathway ran.
Little of books he knew. The strife-frenzied world
Beyond his circling hills roared on unheard.
And, so he died—the gnarled, old, workworn man!

His unshaped thought had been—"Alone I've lived;
Alone I'll wander to that life beyond.
Others have friends—wife—children,—When I come
To that strange land, O who will welcome me?"

No grieving tears fell when he passed away.
A hireling's hands arrayed him for the tomb.
A neighbor lingered decently, as fell
The clods above him in the twilight gray.

Yet, as they fell, along a pathway sped—
Beneath celestial blooms his boyhood knew—
The earth-freed spirit; and about him flew
The little joyous birds his hands had fed.

And when before a gateway, flower-bespanned,
He humbly paused, nor dared to pass or turn,
A dog he once befriended bounded forth
And with a joyous whine caressed his hand,

And walked before him, showing him the way.
The old horse he had loved—he too came forth,
And pressed his head against his master's breast
Uttering a welcome in his glad some neigh.

And all about him pressed a loving throng
Of birds and beasts most gentle-eyed and kind.
(Since this new world held neither pain nor fear.)—
And all about him rang a joyous song:

"Oh, soul so merciful, we welcome thee!
Unto all life thou hast been ever kind.
Unto the deathless Life we welcome thee!
Pass on, beloved, and thy rewarding see!"

In trembling, thrilling hope he forward pressed.
Before him swung a portal grandly fair,
And the young mother he had never known
Flew forth and caught him to her yearning breast.

The Man of God.

When the sincere man receives the truth of God into his soul, knowing it is God's truth, then it takes such a hold of him as nothing else can do. It makes the weak strong, the timid brave; men of slow tongue become full of power and persuasion. There is a new soul in the man, which takes him, as it were, by the hair of his head, and sets him down where the idea he wishes for demands. It takes the man away from the hall of comfort, the society of his friends,—makes him austere and lonely; cruel to himself, if need be; sleepless in his vigilance, unfaltering in his toil; never resting from his work. It takes the rose out of the cheek, turns the man in on himself, and gives him more of truth. Then, in a poetic fancy the man sees visions, has wondrous revelations; every mountain thunders; God burns in every bush, flames out in the crimson cloud, speaks in the wind, descends with every dove, is All-in-all. The soul, deep-wrought in its intense struggle, gives outness to its thought; and on the trees and stars, the fields, the floods, the corn ripe for the sickle, on men and women, it sees its burden writ. The spirit within constrains the man. It is like wine that hath no vent. He is full of the God. While he muses the fire burns; his bosom will scarce hold his heart. He must speak or he dies, though the earth quake at his word.—Theodore Parker.

Immortality.

"Things which eye saw not, and ear heard not, and which entered not into the heart of man."

"O, may I join the choir invisible
Of those immortal dead who live again
In minds made better by their presence: live
In pulses stirred to generosity,
In deeds of daring rectitude, in scorn
For miserable aims that end with self,
In thoughts sublime that pierce the night like stars,
And with their mild persistence urge man's search
To vaster issues.

So to live is heaven."

No doubt George Eliot has in the well known little poem, whence I have quoted, touched—and made give forth their very best tones—the noblest, divinest strings Nature has strung in our human hearts. Ay, so to live is the purest, sweetest heaven we can conceive. We would gladly, O so gladly, fling away an eternity of personal existence in the brightest heavenly courts to let our life sink into and swell a little that Blessing Power which streams through All, and causes all good and joy; to know that our life should exist forever "in pulses stirred to generosity, in deeds of daring rectitude;" to be "to other souls the cup of strength in some great agony."

If to-day, by giving up all the remainder of my personal life in time and eternity, I could be allowed and enabled to focus all that is best in me upon some great, central thought, till it flamed out into a song,—a song that would be dear to common human hearts and cheer and inspire and strengthen them,—it surely would not take many minutes to decide for personal annihilation, for transformation into that song, for such absolute absorption into the Divine; and surely I should plunge into nothingness—my song written—with a joy such as in itself, it seems, would burst the bands of personality. Surely this is the highest, purest heaven we can conceive. Compared with this all else I know of seems low and mean. "Eternal personal existence?" Why? Could there be hope in it of another good such as I had tasted? Hope of greater good no one has conceived. Why then continue my personal existence after I have reached the highest, its culminating point, and all my personality has trembled with complete satisfaction? Personal annihilation under such circumstances would contain no single element of regret,—pure unlimited joy alone. And the moment's joy would amply, amply repay us for all preceding struggles and hardships. We should die confessing that God had blessed us as fully as our hearts could desire. May not this, therefore, be the only "life to come?" If so, there will still be abundant motive for the highest and noblest living, and abundant reward, if only before death we thoroughly succeed.

Indeed for those who struggle as they may and do not reach that "purest heaven," the world would in that case seem a rather hard and sad one; and we could hardly help mentioning to God that a little more kindness to these, a few more years or lives given them to reach the goal, would hardly be more than one could expect of a god. As for all the rest of mankind, who never even feel this high aspiration—not to speak of its sublime fulfillment—well, they would have to make the best of a poor thing, I suppose; and there being no Divine Justice and Mercy for them, they would have to work the harder to make human justice and mercy Divine. But one could hardly help looking sour and cold at a god, who, for instance, to this woman who for years has toiled, struggled and suffered amidst terrible difficulties, with such humble, sweet faithfulness to God and man and duty, might have given some noble reward, such as we would like her to have,—might have done so, but did not; cut her life off in the midst of her sufferings and hardships. One would like to suggest to such a god the propriety of building a little bright and happy heaven for this woman (and her like) "beyond the clouds and beyond the tomb." With all reverence for Him who has made all things, one would like to suggest to him such a thing, if he had not done it. One wants a god to be generous to those who serve him well and obey him the best they can.

But of course there may be many heavens. There may be immortality for all souls; prolonged life until by struggle and fiery trials they are made ready for that "purest heaven" George Eliot describes, and which yet may be the final end of all and to be striven for; other immortality being only opportunities for the gaining of this final absorption in the power for good, in the "music which is the gladness of the world." And, I repeat, he is a mean soul to whom such end were not goal shining and charming enough. Yes, conceive life as an everlasting circular process: from God, through individualized life, back into God; souls born out of everlasting being into personality and led by a Divine vision through all the vicissitudes and struggles of our common life up to likeness and sameness and oneness with God as the wave is one with the sea;—conceive it thus, and all is beautiful, all is perfect. Indeed we can conceive of nothing more beautiful; at least I know of no conception that surpasses it. Buddhism is made beautiful by that conception: the living again and again until the soul is all cleansed and is all love, and then the final plunge into the Divine Life, Nirvana. The soul seems to be climbing a mountain, high and higher, that it may reach the glory which rests on its summit; at last it is there; a moment we see it glorified, the next moment we see only the glory, the soul has melted into it and adds to its beauty forevermore. It is the highest we can conceive. The mind of man can see no further, thinks no further. However we may try, we can not conceive an individual life-course lasting beyond that glorifying moment, because, however we conceive it, it becomes smaller than in that moment of Divine re-absorption. And we could not conceive of individual life reaching that climax afterwards to decrease. No, when we follow an individual life-track so far, there is a dazzling light and no paths beyond, only a sea of light, the glory of God and no personal glories.

But because our mind can not see further, because our vision ends there, dare we call it the end? May there not within that sea of light be individual paths we now can not descry? Shall we say that our mind and conceptions measures the entire power and plan of God?—that we have sought out all the possibilities of existence, and have discovered the point beyond which God's power to bless ceases,—the high water mark of His ability to "make good the life of man?" Shall we not rather say: Beyond the highest bliss I can conceive, it may yet be in God's power to give greater bliss; beyond the highest, fullest, noblest life I can think, there may be higher, fuller, nobler life still; beyond the best that eye has seen or ear has heard, or that even hitherto has entered into the heart of man, there may be a Better still? The following words of George Eliot herself,—amongst all her noble words, I almost think the most significant and noble; a sort of marginal note to all she ever wrote or said; to her work what the spire is to the church, the last upward shooting thought which at once becomes the most important part,—are to the point: "All the while I gather a sort of strength from the certainty that there must be limits or negatives in my own moral powers and life experience which may screen from me many possibilities of blessedness for our suffering human nature. The most melancholy thought surely would be that we in our own persons had measured and exhausted the sources of spiritual good."

I can not conceive how, if I might sing my song to-day as I would, God could find such work and life and joy for me after that, that much prolonged existence would not become more and more of a burden and weariness, because the best would have been;—eternal existence unbearable. But might not that very feat give me new powers and show me new opportunities I do not hear and do not see to-day, and hence make still greater blessedness possible? We know such has been our experience hitherto; the end we strove for and thought of as a sufficient and fitting end, proved, when reached, but a low hill, whence we looked forward and upward to higher, fairer hills, it had hid from our sight before. So it has been with us more than once; may it not be so again—and again? When my little song is sung, perhaps I shall see other tasks worth individual living, other "ends," even fairer heavens still. Buddhism holds a suggestive thought for us here. When Buddha, after innumerable individual lives, with their appointed good works and gradual rising to higher and higher nobility and blessedness, was at last ready to take that last final plunge back into the divine life whence he came, he halted, bethought him, and said, "No, please, one more individual life first, for I've something to be done, I must do." Perhaps he did wisely. And if I wish to be "to other souls the cup of strength in some great agony," were it not almost a healthier sentiment—given the freedom "to wish,"—to want to be also for ever a hand to present it, and a face to accompany it with sympathy, and a heart to tremble forever with fellow-feeling? I mean: Is not, after all, the desire for personal immortality a healthier desire than that for impersonal immortality? May it not in every respect be as noble and even nobler? Is there not in the desire for impersonal immortality a little bit of selfish impatience and weariness? Impatience and weariness over the slowness with which our stubborn self becomes good, God-like, and therefore the desire that that struggle were over and only the good in us, the good impulses, might live on? A divine impatience with our slow selves, if you will. We would be "the cup of strength," but not that poor heart whose poorness so often spoils the beauty and blessedness of the act, or hinders it. And does not personal immortality also imply a grander faith, a worthier trust in God? And if so, it is of course nearest the truth; for our grandest faith in God's goodness must surely still fall below the faith He deserves; the "things prepared by Him for us," will surely astonish even those who believe the best of Him.

No, the end of all individual life is surely not its cessation. "You" and "I" are more than things who ought to be ashamed of being "something," and to hurry all we could to become nothing or everything. I think "you" are more than all the good in you,—of more value than it. I think "you" are something more than the sum of good and evil in you. And I think that which "you" are, besides these two factors in you, is the most sacred and valuable part of you. And that "youness," I think, will live just as long as goodness; and we should not despise it, but worship it, as of all things existing the most precious and beautiful. Your personality, I mean. I think personality is a more precious thing than goodness, though comparisons here are odious. And the end of all life and living can hardly be just to return to the beginning. God must have some rational purpose in his creation; the end must be more than the beginning, for it can not all be "vanity and vexation of spirit," to result at last in Nothing. If we are at last all to return into God, God at least must be made better for our having passed through individual existence. Still, it remains true that George Eliot has painted for us the very highest heaven it ever entered into the heart of man to conceive. And therefore I yet say, speaking with all the wisdom and foresight God has granted us: I will sell my immortality at once for "power to sing my little song, and now and then to make glad my brothers, whom I may meet in the worldly throng." But, as matter of fact, I think God will give the song (or something better), and keep alive and exalt the singer as well.

Our Reading.

Most men do not know that any nation but the Hebrews have had a scripture. A man, any man, will go considerably out of his way to pick up a silver dollar; but here are golden words, which the wisest men of antiquity have uttered, and whose worth the wise of every succeeding age have assured us of;—and yet we learn to read only as far as Easy Reading, the primers and class-books, and when we leave school, the "Little Reading" and story books, which are for boys and beginners; and our reading, our conversation and thinking are all on a very low level, worthy only of pigmies and mannikins. We are under-bred and low lived and illiterate; and in this respect, I confess, I do not make any very broad distinction between the illiterateness of my townsman who cannot read at all and the illiterateness of him who has learned to read only what is for children and feeble intellects. We are a race of tit-men, and soar but little higher in our intellectual flights than the columns of the daily paper. It is not all books that are as dull as their readers. The at present unutterable things we may find somewhere uttered. These same questions that disturb and puzzle and confound us have in their turn occurred to all the wise men; not one has been omitted; and each has answered them, according to his ability, by his words and his life. Moreover, with wisdom we shall learn liberality. The solitary hired man on a farm in the outskirts of Concord, who has had his second birth and peculiar religious experience, and is driven, as he believes, into silent gravity and exclusiveness by his faith, may think it is not true; but Zoroaster, thousands of years ago, traveled the same road and had the same experience; but he, being wise, knew it to be universal, and treated his neighbors accordingly, and is even said to have invented and established worship among men. Let him humbly commune with Zoroaster, then; and through the liberalizing influence of all the worthies, with Jesus Christ himself, and let "our church" go by the board.—Henry D. Thoreau.

The Value of the Beautiful.

FROM AN ADDRESS TO THE UNITY CLUB AT SIOUX CITY.

That man can not live by bread alone has stood the test of time as a spiritual figure. It is equally applicable to mental and moral themes. The ceaseless cramming of the brain with facts and principles, or that pursuit of business which deprives one of healthful leisure and recreation, leads as certainly to mental and moral as to dietetic dyspepsia. The all-absorbing race for wealth incident to our new country, where brains or lineage are alone no passport to social recognition, to a great extent precludes the devoting of much time to any æsthetic pursuit. It in fact creates a false utilitarian atmosphere unfavorable to such development in those whose tastes and powers might otherwise lead them to a higher plane through systematic study of the refining arts.

But it is not of this obvious line of thought that I wish to speak, broad as is the field and abundant as the gleanings might be. I desire to speak, rather, of a principle or law of the beautiful, which lies away down deeper than our own consciousness, and far back of ourselves or of our human ancestors. It is a principle so deeply implanted that we can not entirely rid ourselves of it if we would. This attribute beauty has always been present both in the organic and inorganic world. Even before there was a man to behold it, brilliancy of color and gracefulness of form were as universal as to-day. When silurian seas were writing their record, when God alone spoke in the voices of the elements, and not one conscious ear interpreted the utterance, when no differentiated brain appreciated the imperfect retinal image, then as now the atoms obeyed the laws of their loves and built up the symmetrical crystal, then as now the molecules decked the scene with all the splendors of form and color now beheld among the countless denizens of ocean. All this could not have been merely a design to gratify the eye of a yet-to-be-created man and administer to a depraved and vitiated taste. It must have subserved some ever present use, a use that in all cases may not be clear to us, but still a powerful force, determining, under the laws of selection and survival, the future plane of existence of the organisms of which it was an attribute.

In like manner all art can be traced from its rude beginning to its present perfection. Architecture and landscape gardening, sculpture and painting, music and poetry, stand as so many materializations of an idea implanted "in the beginning," and nurtured through all time. The spider-crab, decking himself with bright algæ; the savage, painting his face with clay; the belle, arraying herself for the ball, and the student laboriously elaborating the principles of a fine art, are, in common, manifestations of the idea of the love of the beautiful, behind which lies the knowledge of its power.

Under the changed condition of our complicated civilization, natural laws and tendencies may be for a time perverted.

More powerful influences may temporarily suppress them. So we have developed in our midst a widespread sentiment in favor of the immediately practical. Men are willing to spend fortunes upon the education of the young, but they demand the rigid exclusion of those things which do not lead directly to dollars and cents. They regard all else as puerile or effeminate, belittling alike to body and brain. Wealth being the end sought, their thoughts stop with its acquisition. Did they but carry their reasoning further—and so far as it goes it is by no means wholly to be condemned,—they would see that the wealth for which they are striving is but the means of acquiring in some form the very objects despised, and which they are finally very illy prepared to enjoy. We see them reaching out to acquire beautiful horses, beautiful carriages, beautiful houses, located on beautiful grounds, beautiful pictures, or often pictures in beautiful frames, because unable to discriminate, and more frequently still beautiful library rooms well stocked with mediocre books, but all in beautiful bindings. They may be unable to appreciate the best of that which they have, but they never lose the clear intuitive idea that the possession of these things gives personal importance to the owner.

We may regard it as settled that the devoting of some portion of our leisure to the cultivation of any of the refining arts is working in harmony with the unchanged and unchanging laws of our existence, and that those who would suppress the inward promptings are but placing their feeble wills athwart the divine plan.

Did we take up any fine art other than poetry, and pursue it systematically, the result achieved would be similar, but under conditions presented, poetry alone is available. Architecture and landscape gardening from their very nature demand more of wealth and leisure than all here can afford, and the daylight hours are essential to their pursuit. Sculpture and painting require long courses of technical training in their devotees before they can be pursued to advantage in hours of recreation. Music, like some of the others, depends largely upon inherited special faculties which many of us do not possess. Poetry alone, dealing with the arbitrary signs of language, has a universality of adaptation which brings it within the range of all without special training other than that possessed by all. The concrete developed products of beauty are represented in the fine arts, and of these poetry is the universal one and the one adapted to our use. It is therefore appropriate that the Unity club, as no unimportant factor in the educational interests of this "The Corn Palace City," should devote an alternate weekly evening to the systematic study of our most representative American poet, and gather for its members some greater portion of the sweetness stored by one of nature's noblest workers.

CORRESPONDENCE.

An Ellsworth Zouave at Camp Sheridan.

EDITORS UNITY:—I have visited Camp Sheridan, of Chicago, and was much pleased with the display of skill and precision of the encampment. We might as well accept the situation, and realize the fact that we must have soldiers with us, for, until the millenium comes, they will always be necessary. The prizes awarded to the different companies and bands, proportioned to their comparative excellence, aggregated about $40,000. I had a large experience during the war as a drill officer, and taught the manual of arms, regimental, battalion and company movements to over 40,000 soldiers, and I therefore was much interested to see what changes and improvements had been introduced. The first thing to attract my attention was the greater simplicity in the manual of arms, mainly owing to the introduction since the war of breech-loading rifles. When there is another war (which I hope will be far distant), if any of us old soldiers are alive, we will find fighting much more convenient for us,—in fact, too convenient. The "beginning of the end" of all wars is commenced with the invention of dynamite, breechloaders, "peacemaker" boats, etc. We are not likely to see the end in our day, therefore my advice to all parents who have sons is to encourage them to join some good military organization and continue in it for at least one year. It is a very necessary part of their education, and will do them good, mentally and physically. To use a slang phrase, "it will put a head on them," and a good, strong and graceful body under it.

It was my good fortune, 27 years ago, to belong to that celebrated company, the United States Zouave Cadets, of Chicago, under command of E. E. Ellsworth. The extent of the movements in our drill can be realized, to some extent, when I state that there were nearly 900 movements (or different positions), and that it consumed over four hours' time to go through it all; but it was not the extent and perfection of the drill and discipline which made our company so celebrated, but the moral and strict temperance rules under which we were governed and controlled. We belong to a nation which, thank God, is at peace with all the world, and if there ever was a nation founded upon the principles of peace, justice, and good will to all mankind, it is ours; but notwithstanding that, we may at any day need the services of every young man in the country, to save it from destruction. Up to the time of the centennial we had already been engaged in war, either internal or foreign, fully one-quarter, or twenty-five years of the time. Where is the bold prophet who will dare to say we may not need soldiers again?

EDITORS OF UNITY: If Jesus' idea of religion be correct, viz.:—supreme allegiance to the Good and fraternal love of our fellows, then the Ethical Culturists should be included in Christian fellowship. Though they cast out devils not in Jesus' name; yet "he that is not against us is for us." Theological opinions are the leaves on the tree of religion, which are cast off in the fruit-bearing season of each year, to be followed by more in the spring, a season which, though beautiful, produces "nothing but leaves."

THE STUDY TABLE.

Connecticut. A Study of a Commonwealth-Democracy. By Alexander Johnston. Cloth, pp. 400. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

This is one of the series called American Commonwealths. It is accurately called "A Study of a Commonwealth-Democracy." The preface says: "This volume is not meant to deal mainly with the antiquarian history of Connecticut, with the achievements of Connecticut men and women, or with those biographical details which so often throw the most instructive side-lights on local history. . . . Its purpose is to present certain features in the development of Connecticut which have influenced the general development of the state system in this country, and of the United States." The writer states that Connecticut, by her peculiar free town system, by her constitution of 1639, by a remarkable union of local autonomy and central power in that state, and by the marked influence of the Connecticut delegates in the convention of 1787,—exercised a very great influence on the federative ideas and structure, which developed into the union of states. The book has 20 chapters, treating of the physical geography of Connecticut, the first settlements of Connecticut, the Saybrook attempt and its failure, ecclesiastical affairs, 1636-1791, financial affairs, 1640-1763, the stamp act and the revolution, the adoption of the federal constitution, industrial development, Connecticut in the war for the Union, and many other points of interest. There is an appendix, giving the constitution of 1639 at length, in its antique form and spelling, also a bibliography of the subject, a list of the governors of Connecticut with their dates, and an index. The book is well made, the type clear and of good size, as in all this series.

Miss Ludington's Sister. By Edward Bellamy. Ticknor Paper Series. Boston: Ticknor & Co.

The latest issue in the Ticknor Paper Series is a reprint of "Miss Ludington's Sister," a characteristic story by Edward Bellamy. It may not be one of the best of the series, but it is interesting reading and will find new readers in this form. These books are printed in clear type, on good paper, and are sold for fifty cents apiece.

Jack Hall; or, The Adventures of an American Boy. By Robert Grant. Boston: Jordan, Marsh & Co.

The opening chapters in Jack Hall's adventures seem to denote a story too much like "Tom Sawyer" to be attractive to mothers, but the style improves as it goes on. Jack is a real boy, full of mischief and inclined to shirk work and lessons, but he leaves school in the last chapter third in his class and ready for hard work at college. The book contains enthusiastic descriptions of base ball and rowing contests.

THE HOME.

One Halloween.

The old fashioned, rambling house was the accretion of many years and many occupants. First and central in this architectural collection was the capacious log kitchen, with its immense fireplace, almost as large as the alcove of a city front chamber, enclosing within its jams not only the long crane with its numerous pothooks of various lengths, but also the mouth of the great brick oven with its fascination of blaze, long slender rods of "live coal" and its "after glow" of hot gingerbread and apple turnovers. As the family increased and needs and means grew, so grew the house. A large "family room," back of the fireplace in the rear of the kitchen, came next; and when the street was widened and properly located and the adjacent land laid out in village lots, double parlors were thrown out in front; it fell into other hands and a pretentious dining hall with a great circular topped window was sent athwart the garden; so room after room and closet and chimney and fireplace was added here and there, as the caprice or the comfort of various owners suggested, until the old house became that curious and interesting conglomeration that only such a building can be. It represented almost every phase of architecture, in a bungling way, somewhere. Every room had an individuality about it peculiarly its own. Nowhere was there a repetition, not even in windows and doors.

The parlors, with their carpets, modern fireplaces and general primness, had little to attract us, in comparison with that kitchen, where the crackling blaze of hickory logs threw a glow of warmth and light all through the room and out the shadeless windows into the garden beyond. There are few such kitchens in "these degenerate days"—a great square room, with its smooth, white pine floor, its great brick hearth, a large closet on one side of the fireplace, a deep recess on the other, with a door leading to the aforesaid family room; at the opposite end a cook stove, for which a brick flue had been built, a door leading to the dining room on one side of the stove, and one leading to the attic over the kitchen on the other. On the side toward the wash house was a window; on the opposite side, opening upon a porch, from which a path led to the door-like gate, was another window and a door.

On winter evenings the kitchen was a child's paradise. Could anything be more enchanting? Especially if father and mother abandoned the parlor and came out and told stories of their childhood. Mother's stories were of the old ancestral English home, built three hundred years ago; its thick walls and strongly made doors; its court enclosed by high, solid brick walls with a postern gate, built for defence as well as refuge, its queer furniture and old pewter plate. Father's were of American pioneer life and its hardships. And so our garden and fence made for us a walled-in court or a stockade, as we imagined ourselves pressed upon by a Robin Hood or surprised by Indians. If company kept our parents away from this enchanting spot, Mike and Biddy would tell tales of that wonderland, "auld Ireland." Of course we believed implicitly every word of their remarkable experiences, and I've no doubt but that notwithstanding they were often manufactured for the occasion, they more than half believed them too.

One Halloween we sat up a little late, listening to the wonderful tales of what had happened on this night in green Erin, how Biddy's sisters had each had their first vision of their future husband at midnight Halloween, and Mike assured Biddy she would be sure to have the same good luck "this very night." We had cracked and eaten nuts enough to give us visions of the past, present or future. The cabbage, beets, etc., had been garnered during the day, and the boys carefully barred out of the garden by the ever watchful Mike. He chuckled now and then as he heard their boisterousness on the streets, and exclaimed exultantly, "Och, ye spalpeens, ye! I faxed ye airy. Ye don't get in here wid yer nonsense," which sally was sure to draw an admiring glance and responsive giggle from Biddy. The guests departed, the family retired, leaving the two up to talk "just a bit o' dear ould Ireland, of course," and for the face of Biddy's "future."

About midnight the family were awakened by a succession of shrieks. Scrambling into a garment, "the misther" rushed to the rescue. As he opened the family room door he found himself enveloped in a cloud of smoke, soot and ashes. The porch door flew open, a figure shot out, bringing the door to with a bang after it. Standing in transfixed amazement, trying to collect his wits and fathom the mystery—was it a nightmare or a reality? The cloud began to settle, and the old chimney, true to its purpose, drew up the smoke. Then came the revelation. Backed up against the stove stood Biddy, with clasped hands, distended eyes and open mouth, filling the air with shrieks. Round and round the room, with all the speed wings and legs could make, with neck stretched to its utmost, sped a goose, adding its voice to Biddy's in a fearful duet. At the window by the outside door, on a background of midnight darkness, was the blanched face of poor Mike, with hair erect, eyes and mouth wide open, and shaking as though in an ague fit. At the opposite window, on the same black, fathomless background, were three juvenile faces, wreathed in mirth and mischief. There is no use my trying to produce a pen picture of those faces. They would bring Brown or Eastman Johnson a mint of money, transferred to canvas.

Mike's very precaution was the source of his defeat. The carefully cleaned garden, the early barred gate, the well understood feeling of perfect security was an irresistible temptation. Like many victorious invaders before them, they came down the water way; to be sure it was deep and cold and long, but the difficulty only added zest to the effort. Then the reconnoitre. There sat Biddy and Mike, so comfortable and cozy; the chimney was wide and low. One of the boys knew a sturdy old gander he could get. He could easily climb to the roof and drop the old fellow down. It would be such fun. And it was—to the boys.

Of course we small people were very curious next morning. We had gone to bed quite sure that with the rising sun we should be enlightened as to Biddy's future fate,—who he was. We never alluded to that night in Biddy's presence but once. Her nose flew up, her eyes flashed, her back stiffened. We knew the symptoms and retreated in good order. Poor Mike! He was glad soon to seek new quarters, for if Biddy bridled at our alluding to that night, what didn't she do at sight of Mike, who came slinking in next morning, the personification of meekness. "Indade, mum," said Biddy savagely, in reply to an attempted apology for the forlorn fellow, "to run out and pull the door too after 'im, and haul it, too, yes, and haul it too,—for I tried to open it,—lavin me, a poor, lone woman, shut in to be devoured by that dreadful baste, a'rushin' round and a'squackin' loike a roarin' lion! Oche, the brute!" And Biddy marched round the kitchen at her work with the air of a youthful captain on dress parade. There was nothing weak about her.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Brocton, Mass.—The Old South lecture system of Boston is spreading. An important course of lectures on the American Revolution is arranged for at this place.

Washington, D. C., has been selected as the site for the great Roman Catholic College of America. About a million dollars have already been raised for the project. We look with hearty interest to the success of the undertaking. A great Catholic institution within sight of the noble capitol building of a great republic can not but add thereby to its catholicity.

Moline, Ill.—Rev. Henry D. Stevens, of Indianapolis, has accepted a call to the Unitarian church of Moline, and will at once remove with his family to the chosen field. We give Mr. Stevens cordial welcome to the brotherhood of earnest ministers in the state of Illinois and wish for him abundant success. He takes a young charge that has proven its right to be by its energy and persistency and practical wisdom. The society is to be congratulated on having secured the services of Mr. Stevens.

Philadelphia.—The Young People's section of the Ethical Society has been organized, with S. F. Weston as president, Miss Demmon as secretary, and Hugo L. Hund as treasurer. Meetings are to be held on the first and third Tuesdays of each month. As the section has appointed a Philanthropic Committee to work with the like committee of the society at large, it may be seen that its programme is not a narrow one in any respect.

—The liberal societies of this section are planning a class for the study of the fundamentals in religious literature. It is to be a fixture, controlled by a board of trustees, and to meet twice in each month, probably the second and fourth Fridays. It is likely that Mr. Ames will be the presiding officer. A meeting on the 28th, at the rooms of the Spring Garden Society, will perfect its organization. Whether the Christian Bible specifically or some more general study is to be taken up at the start, I believe, is not yet fully decided upon.

—I think Mr. Haskell and Mr. Ames, the latter in some address, participated in the dedication of the new Universalist church at Hammononton, N. J. Universalists like Bisbee and Shrigley in this city are willing to fellowship Unitarians, but there is one other minister who, with many privates, can be fairly deemed adverse to such a step, wherever taken.

—"M. P.," the press literary critic, uses this phrase in regard to Emerson: "Saving alone the supreme and sacred instance of Christ, the life of no great man so powerfully and profitably reminds us we can make our own sublime as does that of Ralph Waldo Emerson." Which is tantamount to saying something more, had the writer of the sentence but paused to think of it, as perhaps he did. But the word is gratifying, as going forth in one of our great dailies to a constituency not generally open to such intimations, if they come from known radical sources.

—I was in error in regard to the date of Clifford's address for Chadwick, which should have been stated as the 23d.

—The first number of Unity Journal, just issued, and dated October, contains Mr. Haskell's sermon in reply to one of his Camden critics, and other articles, relating to the local and general work of the Unitarian church.

—The Unitarian speakers of this section have arranged for a series of union meetings for the winter. They have also planned a series of exchanges, by which it is intended on one Sunday out of each two months to have all the liberal pulpits occupied by speakers from other congregations.

—Mr. Mangasarian's society has started on its third year.

—The Spring Garden Society's busy Unity Club have mapped out a characteristic scheme of work for the winter, which includes pretty nearly all things in the line of mental and social entertainment.

H. L. T.

Chicago.—All Souls Church.—Rev. S. S. Hunting was in the pulpit last Sunday with the pastor and Mrs. Wilkes. Mr. Hunting is on his way to Philadelphia to attend the Woman Suffrage Association meetings in that city, and is as earnest and true as ever. The Sunday before the ever youthful and indefatigable Mrs. Cogswell, of North Platte fame, was in the congregation, on her way to North Platte. She is minister extraordinary to Nebraska, and we will look for news and vitality all along the line now that she is again west of the Missouri.

—Union Teachers' Meeting on Monday noon. Mr. Utter was leader. Lesson, the 5th chapter of Luke. We should make the children familiar with the geography and scenery of this incident. It is a picturesque incident with which the chapter opens, and very natural—the pushing off from the shore. As to the draught of fishes, of course it might be an opportune happening, but it is no less plain that Luke means it for a miracle. The command to tell no one of the healing of the leper shows the dogmatic intent of Luke; this is Luke's way of explaining that Jesus did all the great works and yet had not the reputation in his life time which from the works we should expect. The passage about the fasting, that the disciples naturally would not fast while the Master was with them but would fast after his removal, is a touch of the aftertime. After Jesus' death the Christians fasted, yet found no example for it in Jesus' life or words. So this grew up as the way of accounting for the omission.

Boston Notes.—Rev. J. F. Clarke finds his health so well recovered as to sustain easily his weekly church work.

—Rev. H. B. Carpenter, of Boston, is supplying the pulpit in Buffalo, N. Y.

—The sentence of fine upon Rev. Mr. Davis for preaching upon the Common was sustained upon his late court appeal.

—Frosts have spared our garden flowers till this week, when our city Flower Missions closed.

—Dr. John Parker, of London—orthodox—so well championed the popular new theology party in our Congregational churches as to provoke Rev. Mr. Cook to answer some of his aspersions upon the orthodox beliefs and acts. He assumed fully and aroused frequent applause by thus assuming the Unitarian view of the Andover controversy, viz., that the professors should not strain the plain meaning of the ancient creed, but if they disagree from it they should come out and leave it. As for the non-missionary tenet of no probation after death—he preached that the Father holds in his loving hands all heathen souls the moment after death as in the moment before death. He stated that scarcely a prominent orthodox minister in Boston could go as heathen missionary under the present ruling of the American Board.

—The latest industrial church branch is a class for teaching girls to set types. A well taught girl can immediately earn eight dollars per week and can fast increase her wages.

Kansas.—The recent accession of Rev. J. W. Caldwell, of Uniontown, to the Unitarian ministry, opens new possibilities of work in southern Kansas. Mr. Caldwell was a minister of the Christian church. He was offered an appointment in Kansas as district missionary of his denomination, the state being divided into districts and assigned to as many different workers. Feeling that he could no longer work in harmony with the Christian denomination, he declined to accept the trust offered him, and sought and obtained fellowship in the Unitarian ranks. He has many friends who are in sympathy with his new position, and are willing to stand by him. In Uniontown, where the doors of the Union church were closed against him, he has established a congregation, and organized a Sunday-school of forty-five members. On the evening that I preached for him, a weekday evening at that,—one hundred and thirty of the four hundred inhabitants of the village came out to hear me, when at the same hour a special preaching service was held in the Union church, and special efforts were made to weaken our attendance. Mr. Caldwell is a self-sacrificing man, deeply in earnest, with a strong missionary instinct, who "likes to undertake a hard job," as he puts it, and who proposes to hold on where he is, and help evangelize all the country about him. He accompanied me to Fort Scott, seventeen miles from his home, where, making headquarters at the hotel, we spent two days canvassing the city, and arranging for an evening meeting. At this meeting one of the most noteworthy incidents was a brief conversation with an orthodox woman. When asked if she would be interested in Unitarian services, if they should be started, she replied: "That depends on circumstances; I should like to talk with you further." And then she went on to say: "I am a member of an orthodox church, but I have been reading Unitarian literature, sent to me by some ladies of Boston, which quite satisfies my soul. I want to know if Unitarians are as good as their literature. Let me find once a church in which their high and beautiful principles are embodied in individual lives, and I'd leave twenty orthodox churches, if I belonged to as many, in order to join it!"

"—Knowest thou what argument

Thy life to thy neighbor's creed has lent?"

We found in the county recorder's office the record of a good building lot, said to be worth $4000, deeded to the Unitarian society, but no society—its friends scattered and much discouraged, one of them holding in trust a tax-title to the Unitarian lot, for the church which it is hoped will some day be reorganized. There are signs of prosperity in the city, with its population of 15,000. It is the seat of a Normal School of some three hundred students, and there is every reason why we should be represented there by a live, liberal church. Word comes from Mr. Caldwell that he preached there on Sunday, Oct. 16th, and that he returns to preach again Nov. 6th.

From Ft. Scott, over the K. N. & D.,—a branch of the Missouri Pacific system,—a ride of 130 miles, through a fine section of the state, brought me to the capital,

Topeka. The Sunday morning congregation here, in the Unitarian church, was good in quality and in numbers, showing evidences of growing life and interest. In the afternoon quite a different congregation met my eyes in the state reform school for boys, situated outside the city limits. Nearly 200 boys, ranging from eight to eighteen or twenty years of age were before me. It was a heart-moving spectacle, and if the preacher's word only went home to them as did his sympathy we may hope that "some seed fell on good ground." The superintendent, Mr. Buck, is a genuine man, a gentleman admirably fitted for his work, and aided by that best of all helpers, a wife in hearty sympathy with him in all that he does. Topeka is making rapid strides in substantial growth. Its

EDITORIAL.

THE delay in this week's issue of UNITY was unavoidable, on account of a general strike among compositors.

"A COLUMBIA of thought and art is the last and endless end of Columbus' adventures," says Emerson.

RED JACKET once said: "The Great Spirit taught the white man to talk on paper, because he knew he could not remember things. The Indian never forgets. He don't need books. He keeps everything in his heart."

A SISTER who knows hard work in the mission field herself, writes: "Here is my dollar for the Unity hat; wish I could make it ten. I want at least a window pane in that church in Dakota. I want also to send my warmest congratulations to Sister Wilkes and a blessing to the child of inspiration."

THE meeting at the Central Music Hall last Sunday evening in the interests of the Illinois Industrial School for Boys was addressed by Judge Jamieson, Doctor Boardman, Professor Swing, Doctor Thomas and J. Ll. Jones. Over a thousand dollars was subscribed and contributed to the support of the school.

THE Christian Life, published in London, speaking of two-hundred and thirty-nine excursionists being arrested and fined for wholesale slaughter of birds at the Farne island, through the activities of the "Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals," adds: "With too many of the upper classes, to be killing something appears to be synonymous with amusement." Yes, but to us there appears to be something wrong about the adjective. Are such classes "upper"?

THERE are so many people who are willing to advise an editor, and who are kind enough to tell us how to "make UNITY attractive to the masses," that it is refreshing to find one who is pleased with it, even though we do not succeed in putting a quart of milk into our pint measure every week. A correspondent writes: "Number Nine is before me, and I have marked five of the items on the first page as especially fine. Some of them I shall use as texts."

A PRESBYTERIAN church has been built and paid for in the central part of Illinois by women. The church is in a prosperous condition, but it has not male members enough to make the legal board of officers as required by the canons of the Presbyterian church, and the Bloomington Presbytery is much puzzled to know what to do with it. Probably the last thing they will think of is the first thing they ought to do, viz., to reconstruct their laws so as to recognize the rightful claims of woman.

THE Unitarians of Boston are about to hold a farewell meeting on the occasion of Rev. A. N. Knapp's departure to Japan as missionary of the A. U. A. This mission of Mr. Knapp's possesses great interest. For the first time in the history of Christian missions, we suspect we see a missionary going to treat with a so-called pagan nation as equals, expecting to be taught as well as to teach. He goes to interchange spiritual commodities. We have reason to believe that he will be received in the same spirit. America has much to teach Japan, doubtless Japan has something to teach America also. An exchange tells us that a Chair of Sanitary Engineers has been established in the Imperial University of Japan, and that this is the only chair of the kind in the world.

THE first volume of the Massachusetts Quarterly Review, in a bound copy that was once in the library of Theodore Parker and then the property of the faithful Hannah Stevenson, has found its way to our table. The editor's address to the public in the initial number for December, 1847, was written by Ralph Waldo Emerson. His words then still ring with prophetic reassurance in faithless ears: "In the rapid decay of what was called religion, timid and unthinking people fancy a decay of the hope of man; but the moral and religious sentiment meet us everywhere, alike in markets as in churches. A God starts up behind cotton bales also."

CHARLES H. KERR & Co. have just issued in neat pamphlet form a secular edition, without the Sunday-school and Unitarian imprint, of the three series of Ethical Lessons that stand at the head of the Western Sunday-school Society's publications, namely, Corner Stones of Character, by Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells; Home Life, by Mrs. Susan I. Lesley and Mrs. Elizabeth L. Head, and School Life, by Mrs. F. B. Ames. This edition is published for day school work. A hundred copies of them go at once into one school in one of our western cities. Once more we take pleasure in commending them to the attention of teachers. They have been used with marked success as the basis of the general exercises at the opening of the day or the last ten minutes before going home. Try them.

As the eleventh day of November draws near, the shadows of the gallows upon which it is decreed that seven men should hang in this city, become more consciously felt. Felix Adler, Rev. H. M. Simmons, of Minneapolis, Rabbi Hirsch, William Salter, James Vila Blake, and the pastor of All Souls church have recently made their protest against the death penalty, and have pleaded for the commuting of the sentence. In the Third Unitarian church of this city, last Sunday, over a hundred people signed the petition to the Governor, and Rev. J. Vila Blake, J. N. Wanzer and Judge Russell officially carried the petition to Springfield to present the same to the Governor. The Conservator, in this city, recently expressed in an epigrammatic form the practical wisdom which ought to persuade, even where the humanitarian and religious argument fails. It says: "Let the anarchists live that their cause may die."

THE difference between the cautious "progressive orthodoxy" of the liberal element in the Congregational church and the theology of outspoken Unitarianism is well illustrated in the reply made by the Christian Union to a correspondent of a liberal and inquiring turn of mind:

Question.—What can be said to one whose rest in the faith of the Incarnation is disturbed by the claims made for Buddha and other incarnations of divinity through the past centuries? Our Supreme God is the Father of all these countless millions, and does it not rather incline a catholic mind toward a form of Unitarianism? Shall we deny all anterior incarnations and truths revealed, as claimed, from the Invisible to the children of men?

Answer.—Incarnation and inspiration are quite distinct. We see no reason to doubt that God's Spirit has dwelt within and influenced the good, the wise and the true of all eras, epochs and races, and that every man who has testified to the truth and inspired to a higher and nobler life has been illuminated by that Light which lighteth every man. But one needs only to glance at the stories of Buddhistic incarnation to be satisfied that there has been but one incarnation in the world's history; that there is but One in whom God tabernacled, making himself manifest to humanity in the flesh. Why the story of this incarnation has not spread more rapidly over the world is one of the mysteries of history. We can only say that it is the plain duty of every man who believes in this incarnation to fight to the death every apathy, apostasy and division among Christians which hinders the more rapid diffusion of its glad tidings.

We print in our Unity Club column to-day an official appeal to our Unity Clubs asking their interest and co-operation in the work of the National Bureau. To this appeal we wish to add our word. Friends, do you realize how easy it is to appropriate the labors of others and to thrive upon other people's thoughts and toil without giving any return? The Unity Club in every locality has had peculiar opportunities to profit by the labor and experience of other clubs and club workers. Most of them this winter are following programmes which have been more or less elaborated in this co-operative way. The organization of the National Bureau has already given much new stimulus to this tool-making and help-multiplying activity. Outline studies on Ireland and Dickens' Tale of Two Cities are the last leaflets. The latter numbers twelve in the series. Others are in course of preparation. We hope that our western clubs will be prompt in making themselves members of this National Bureau. Indeed, we do not see how they can honestly withhold the $5 that will link them to their fellows. Please don't forget it.

A CONFERENCE of representatives of progressive theology was held in one of the parlors of the Palmer House, Chicago, Tuesday and Wednesday. A number of prominent Universalists, Unitarians and Independents were present, and various plans for co-operation were discussed at length. There were some differences of opinion as to methods, but an essential unity of spirit and aim. A Ministers' Alliance was organized, with the following officers:

Prof. David Swing, President; Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, Vice-President; Rev. Thomas G. Milsted, Secretary. An Executive Committee of five was elected, consisting of Dr. H. W. Thomas, of Chicago; Dr. J. G. Townsend, of Jamestown, N. Y.; Rev. David Utter and Rev. Charles Conklin, of Chicago; and Rev. A. N. Alcott, of Elgin. Further plans are to be evolved, and much good is hoped for from the movement. Among the members of the Alliance are Dr. H. W. Thomas, Rev. J. T. Sunderland, Rev. George Batchelor, Rev. Theodore W. Haven, Rev. Oscar Clute, Mrs. E. T. Wilkes, and Solon Lauer. It is expected that many others, not present at the meeting, will join the Alliance.

A BRIGHT omen was the announcement in our Sunday papers this week that Dr. D. K. Pearsons had concluded to administer his own will, and within the last week he has given away to the Presbyterian Hospital property valued at $25,000 to the Y. M. C. A. of Chicago $30,000, to the Woman's Presbyterian Board of Missions $20,000, to the Chicago Theological Seminary, Presbyterian, $50,000, to the Union Park Theological Seminary, Congregational, $50,000; making in all $175,000. In all this the wife's name is intimately associated, and these good people have done nothing but what they intended to have done when they were dead; they have simply executed their own wills, thereby reducing the tension of their cares, adding to the potency of their dollars and multiplying their joys. This is a timely and commendable example to Chicago capitalists. There is a congestion of soul causing sickness and misery in many a home because there is a plethora of the pocket book. Nothing but such generosity as Doctor Pearson's will brighten many lives. We know not how many of these congested souls are on the side of liberal thought, but we know there is money enough some where to help Mrs. Wilkes finish her church in Sioux Falls, to send several thousand copies of UNITY a year out on its missionary errands, to make the treasurer of the Western Conference glad by enabling him to pay bills whenever accrued in the cause of freedom, fellowship and character in religion throughout the west. There is money enough in Chicago to establish here a training school for the liberal ministry that will give equipment and inspiration to the fifty young men and women that are ready for a training that is fearless, hospitable, confident and forward looking; a training that supplants the discussion of old doctrines with the study of new problems, and replaces the labored interpretation of texts with the larger and more inspiring interpretation of history. May Doctor Pearson's example be followed, may the old Arabian parable be verified. A fig tree looking upon figs becometh fertile.

OUR Universalist co-laborers have just held their national convention in the city of New York. Judging from the reports, they had a full and hopeful meeting. The interest of this session, as of several preceding ones, centered upon the creed question. A special committee consisting of Rev. C. W. Tomlinson, W. H. Ryder and E. C. Switzer, after two years' deliberation, reported in favor of a new "Profession of Faith," four articles long. The debate upon the same lasted for three hours. Dr. Atwood, of the Clinton university, Dr. Capen, of Tufts college, Dr. Ryder and others strongly favored the change, but the venerable brethren, headed by Dr. Miner, as persistently pleaded for the old, and the convention had to do what they have done for several sessions, refer the same to the next meeting. We give below the proposed substitute to be considered. Definite and theological as it is in its phraseology, Dr. Miner was opposed to it because, among other reasons, "It does not give the least intimation that the several doctrines enumerated are taken from the Bible," and it does not "state that it was a 'Christian' religion that it stood for:"

1. I believe that the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments contain a revelation from God to mankind.
2. I believe in one God, the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth; in Jesus Christ His Son, who is the Revealer of God and Savior of the world from sin; and in His Holy Spirit, the Comforter, through which all disciples of Christ are united in one spiritual body.
3. I believe in the necessity of personal holiness; in the forgiveness of sins; in the certainty of retribution; in the immortality of the human soul; and in the final holiness and happiness of all mankind.
4. I believe that the opportunities, obligations and rewards of religion are in their nature eternal, and that I ought to strive earnestly for salvation by repenting of my sins and diligently using the means of grace which God has provided.

Ramabai Circles.

An appeal has recently come to the women of America, which is equally strong in its delineation of the wrongs to be righted and in the common sense methods of attacking that wrong. Unitarians have never interested themselves much in foreign missions, and there have been good reasons in times past for this apathy. First, they have had all they could possibly do at home to maintain their own footing and assist in the home missions which seemed of first importance. Another reason could be found in their distrust of prevailing methods in such work. Still another and perhaps the most deciding one is seen in the answer of a Unitarian minister to one who inquired of him why we did not send missionaries to Africa. Knowing that his little flock in a country town were hard taxed to keep themselves alive and help in humble home ways, he replied placidly, "You know it is God's Africa." Unitarians have always believed that the so-called heathen were God's heathen, and that until some way could be found of helping them into light without distressing them with doubts of the eternal safety of their fathers and grandfathers, they had better be left in His care alone. Now, however, an appeal for our help in a foreign mission has reached us with such force and justice of claim that it ought not to be disregarded.

The condition of women in India has long moved the sympathies of travelers and missionaries, and it has been plainly shown that missionary efforts, as usually carried on, are inadequate for any extended or deepening influence. They have failed utterly in reaching the high caste woman, from whom most could be expected and whose influence would inevitably affect her sisters in other conditions. No reform ever amounted to much until it had some strength from within. Only a monk could have brought about the reformation. Missionaries have had to begin with attacking the most cherished convictions of the Hindu women, to whom their religion is quite as dear as is Christianity to the Christian. Ramabai, the remarkable Hindu woman, who is now in this country pleading the cause of her country women, has herself become a Christian and sees plainly that only education can bring about intelligent acceptance of the higher theism of the Brahmo Somaj or of Christianity. The great need is for educational homes for the child widows, of whom there are nearly eighty thousand under nine years of age, and whose wretched condition can only be understood by reading detailed accounts. Ramabai will establish at least one such home on her return to India, and her plans are made with a reasonableness of scope and detail that can not but enlist confidence and great hope. It is impossible to relate in the space of a short article any of the wonderfully interesting facts in the life of Ramabai herself or of the work which she is trying to do, but every one can read them for himself in the book she has written. It is entitled "The High Caste Hindu Woman," and can be had by addressing the Pundita Ramabai, 1400 North 21st street, Philadelphia.

Ramabai expects the school to become self-supporting in the space of ten years, and asks help only for that time. A central organization has been formed to help her, with Rev. E. E. Hale, Rev. Phillips Brooks and others at the head. Branch circles are to be formed wherever possible. The one at Cornell university has already a large membership, and several students are preparing to go to India. The little society at Sioux Falls, though yet they have not a roof to cover them, has one which will send seventy-five dollars to her aid. The Ramabai Circles are to exist ten years, present conditions continuing, and membership obtained by paying one dollar a year to the secretary. Such a circle has been formed among us under the auspices of the Chicago Women's Unitarian Association. Fifty-three members are already enrolled, and it is earnestly hoped that more names will be sent in. Names will be received at any time by the secretary, Mrs. E. E. Marean, 3619 Ellis avenue, or orders taken for the book,—price, $1.35, including postage.

New Theology and Old Religion.

Under the above heading Dr. Lyman Abbott replies in the Christian Union to some inquiries of an anxious brother whose theology is evidently not completely adjusted to its environment.

"Shall you remain in the church of your fathers and of your own personal preferences, preaching the new theology? or, shall you go out from it, either to an independent ministry or to some denomination whose creed is of a more flexible, if not of a more liberal character? Your problem is one which is shared by many in our time, and I therefore answer it through the columns of the Christian Union. Many years ago my father said to me 'I am sure that nine-tenths of the theological controversies which have agitated the church have been mere debates about words, and I am inclined to think the other tenth has been also.' This seemed to me a pretty strong statement at the time, but further observation and reflection have tended to confirm it."

Doctor Abbott then examines the intellectual position of different classes of thinkers and shows that the chief, if not the whole difference is verbal and superficial. And of the four examples which he cites he says that whether they will be efficient preachers of the gospel depends far less upon their doctrine than upon their spirit; far less upon what they believe than upon the way in which they believe it. He says:

"Such differences ought never to prevent co-operation, and would not if we did not constantly fall into the mistake of thinking that Doctrine is Truth, and that the world is to be saved, not by the love of God, but by our own opinion about Him. The world needs neither New Theology nor Old Theology, but God, and he who can bring the heart of man and the heart of God together is doing the work of the world's Savior, however imperfect may be the philosophy which he holds. Make it your object, not to present a correct doctrine of sin, but to induce each member of your congregation to cry out 'God be merciful to me a sinner!' not to present to them a correct psychology of Christ, or a correct theory of the incarnation or atonement, but to make each hearer cry out 'Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief!' Some of your brethren will undoubtedly criticize you, look askance upon you, charge you with heresy; they did that to the Master, to the apostle Paul, to Luther and Wesley, to Doctor Finney, and Lyman Beecher and Doctor Bushnell; they have done it to every man who has brought to humanity the water of life in any kind of new vessel. No matter; go quietly on your way, ministering to the needs of men by the medicine of God—love."

The above is very good on general principles, but it is evidently intended as oil for the troubled waters of the progressive party in the Congregational church. As such, it will not have more than a temporary effect. The waves of thought, stirred by the late tempest of controversy, will not be still at the bidding of any, even a master in the church. The old truths are seeking new forms of expression, and the old errors are fading away. Peace is well, but peace at the cost of principle is not desirable. The progress of truth must not be checked in the interests of party harmony. The world of thought has its strifes and conflicts, as well as the world of physical life; and through struggle for existence comes survival of the fittest. Peace is well, but sometimes strife is better. In a time when new truths are pressing for recognition upon the great brain of the world, to ignore or stifle them is treason to the race. Doctor Abbott is a peace maker, but in his efforts to secure harmony for the present he is playing traitor to the future. The higher truths will come. No hand-mop of present expediency will stay the incoming tide. S. L.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS.

A large number of the subscriptions which were transferred from the New Theology Herald to UNITY expire about this time. We trust that our friends are so well pleased with UNITY that their subscription will be at once renewed. UNITY is now the channel through which the editors of the Herald speak to the public; and the wider its circulation, the larger will be the field reached by the ideas and principles of the New Theology for which the Herald stood. UNITY is a growing paper. To encourage and aid its growth is to assist the progress of a broad and spiritual faith. As an inducement for prompt renewal, the publishers offer to those of the Herald subscribers who remit during November the premiums given to new subscribers. (See first page of UNITY.) Subscribers in Jamestown or vicinity may hand their money to Doctor Townsend.

What Can Unitarianism Do for the Heathen?

The following symposium explains itself. It is opportune to the current discussions which are now agitating the orthodox press. Unitarians can, if they will, carry to the Orient the practical efficiency and scientific clearness of the Occident; they can meet the heathen as brethren, and exchange commodities of spirit with them. Unitarians can take delight in the beauties of their scripture as the preliminary conditions of awakening in them an appreciation of the beauties of our own; Unitarians can or should, whenever necessary, subordinate names to things, and in that way find the heathen already half-persuaded to the abiding truths of the holiest gospel; Unitarians can carry to the heathen the slow but only sure methods of education. They can try to embody the Christianity that when formulated in phrases has but little potency; but in Christ-like deeds is irresistible. Unitarians can teach the heathen the nobility of the life that now is, the beauty of this world, the dignity of the human nature to which they belong; and in that way ally them more intimately to the eternal life than can be done in any other way. But we cease that our brethren may speak.

From PROF. C. C. EVERETT, of Harvard Divinity School.

The answer to the question "What can Unitarianism do for the heathen?" would exclude, I suppose, such civilizing and educating agencies as could be used by those professing neither Unitarianism nor any other form of religious belief; and would include only distinctly religious results. Further, it would be hardly fair to point to the work of the Apostles, because, though they were Unitarians, their Unitarianism was not the same type as the Unitarianism of the present day. In direct answer I can only say that, in my judgment, there is a possibility that any man who possesses a profound religious conviction can have this conviction to some extent purified and enlarged; and I believe, further, that this could be done more easily along the line of Unitarianism than along that of any other non-ritualistic form of Christian faith. Of course, everything would depend upon the kind of Unitarian who should represent this belief.

From PROF. GEORGE L. CARY, of Meadville Theological School.

Whatever people can be made, through our instrumentality, to feel, with the English poet laureate, that "All men find their own in all men's good,

And all men join in noble brotherhood," already has half of the best of our intellectual possessions. By ever emphasizing our belief in the brotherly unity of the human family, we may do something toward breaking down the barriers of prejudice and hate which now separate peoples of different faiths. Unitarianism, speaking of man to men, whether they be pure heathen or heathen-Christian, has this prime message: "All ye are brethren."

The other unity which we have to proclaim to all sorts of heathen is the essential oneness, amid almost infinite multiplicity of manifestation, of the creating and sustaining Power of the universe—nay, even of the universe itself. Some of the heathens before the Christian era thought of the earth as a living being: let us restore to the heathen of to-day this thought, enlarged to take in all created things as

"parts of one stupendous whole,
Whose body Nature is, and God the soul."

From REV. A. A. LIVERMORE, D. D., Meadville Theological School.

Unitarianism can do for the heathen what it does for us all. It can give them a Heavenly Father in the place of polytheism and idolatry. It can teach them that the mind and spirit of this Father is in immediate contact with their mind and spirit, and is the Holy Spirit and inspiration that prompts to all life and goodness. It can give them a Saviour, Jesus Christ, who lived, worked, taught and died to free men from the clogs of sin, and uplift them into sonship to God and a divine life. It can give them a Bible, in which the fullest revelations of the character of God, and his dealings with mankind, is made known, and the purest moral and religious lessons are taught on the conduct of life, the glorious examples of prophets, apostles, martyrs and saints are given, and especially the refulgent life of Jesus, that shines like a sun in our firmament, and bids mankind strive for like spotless holiness. It can plant the faith of immortality so deep in these benighted nations that death will be swallowed up of life. Unitarian Christianity can dignify human nature, teach the inconceivable value of every soul, and its dearness and nearness to God; can destroy heathenish castes and contempt of woman, and effect the unity of the race. But, further, Christian Unitarianism in behalf of institutions can establish the church, create worship instead of idolatry, hallow a day of rest, in place of infanticide put Sunday-schools, and confirm all good principles, lofty faiths and noble aspirations, by the power of education, holy association and riveted habits. And lastly, Unitarian civilization can go hand in hand with Unitarian religion and morals. She can give homes, the security of law, the culture of art, science and literature, free popular education, colleges and universities, and all the charms and refinements of the humanities, philanthropies and amenities that rule in our most favored communities. This is what Unitarianism can do, and ought to do, and what she will do eventually, when she has the courage of her convictions, and the sharp edge of will to cut, scimiter like, through obstructions and fears and doubts. This is the work that Dall has done for thirty-one years; this is the work which we hope Knapp will do, and believe he will. And this is the work which noble-souled men, now in Cambridge and in Meadville, are fledging their wings to rise and do—in some high ecstasy of self-sacrifice and Pauline enterprise, to convert and civilize and Christianize the great heathen world.

From REV. J. BRADLEY GILMAN, of Concord, N. H.

I can not do anything about the "Unitarianism and the Heathen." I am working at it in a practical way here. This place is full of heathen.

From REV. F. L. HOSMER, Cleveland, O.

"What Unitarianism can do for the heathen," is fortunately not wholly a matter of conjecture, but has been in some measure already answered by Mr. Dall's manifold ministry in India. It has the advantage of meeting the extra-Christian peoples as Paul met the Athenians on Mar's Hill, recognizing in their forms of worship an expression of the religious nature of man, and in what "certain of their own poets have said," the utterances of the universal heart. Starting from this broad and just basis, Unitarianism can gradually graft the best thought and life of our present Christianity upon the thought and life of outside faiths, which also are rooted in the soil of a common humanity. It can emphasize the one salvation by character, which of itself is calculated to unify diverse systems and creeds; the thought of the apostle when he said that "in every nation he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted of Him." But whatever Unitarianism can do for the "heathen," at present it becomes Unitarians to be modest on this score. They have found their field thus far, with slight exceptions, at home and not abroad; and wisely so, perhaps. When one reads the report of the recent meeting of the American Board, he feels that the missionary work is not yet all beyond the sea, nor even among the unchurched and illiterate of our own land.

From a sermon by REV. M. J. SAVAGE, Boston.

We need to consider that one of two things is true. There is no such thing as the world's being "sort of" lost, "kind of" lost, almost lost, partly lost. One of two things is true; and we need, and the modern world needs, to face it. Half-way Unitarians need to face it. So-called liberal orthodox people need to face it. Either this world is lost and under the curse and wrath of God, or it is not. One of the two is true. Either every man, woman, and child in it is doomed, and justly doomed, to endless misery, or they are not. They are not half-way doomed to endless misery, partly doomed, partly under God's wrath, partly lost, half one thing and half the other. Either this theory is true or it is not true. If it be not true, then the whole scheme of doctrine which constitutes the plan of salvation is something we no longer need. There is no one of the old doctrines of orthodoxy that is not part of the plan for delivering man from the ruin that came upon him from the fall. Now, if there has been no fall, if man is not thus ruined, if God does not look on him this way, and is not going to treat him in this fashion, then there is no reason why this doctrine should be still insisted on as necessary, nor that it should be indefinitely and half-way held. There is no necessity for it, unless the human race is fallen and ruined. What we need to do to-day is to turn square round and accept the other alternative, if we do not accept this. If this is a race that has been developing for thousands of years, beginning on the borders of the animal world and climbing slowly up to our present position; if, under the providence of God, we are going on in the process of education and development,—that is one thing. If we believe it, let us give our money, our thought, our means, the lavish outpouring of our efforts, to the accomplishment of the kind of work that is needed. Only consider the loss of time, of money, of love, of effort, poured out into what are practically useless channels, provided that be not the condition of the human race. If all the ingenuity, all the thought, the money, and the work could be directed to facing the real facts of the condition of man and helping him upward in the pathway of progress towards the real God, who has led him to the present hour, think of the gain, the immense advance, that might be made! Let us see what I believe to be the one necessity of the modern world,—the need of having a working theory of life as real to us as theirs was to them. Let us have a living thought of God, a living thought of his universe, a living thought of the nature of man, his needs, and his destiny. Let us have something that shall satisfy the brain, so that we can respect ourselves intellectually; that shall be motive for the heart, that we may feel there is something worth living for. Let us face the real facts of the universe consistently, earnestly, flinging away the old ideas, if we do not hold them any more. Let us front the new universe, and catch the first rays of God's new sunrise. Let us take hold of the work we are called upon to do to-day, and not content ourselves with criticising the fathers, while we are not half so grand, so consistent, so manly, so true as they.

From REV. J. C. LEARNED, St. Louis, Mo.

Unitarianism can continue to do what it has always been doing for the heathen. It can defend them against unjust aspersions; resist everywhere the irrational and inhuman and diabolical theory that they have been damned to hopeless torment by the million ever since the race began; and deny that they need a belief in orthodox doctrines to be saved. In this way it may exert, as it has exerted, an influence even upon the American Board for Foreign Missions; leading it at length to send out men who hesitate to doom to everlasting perdition all the past generations and all the living multitudes who, through no fault of theirs, have never heard the name of Jesus Christ.

The best work of Unitarians is the work waiting at home—at its own doors; more than it can fitly do. It is by no means ignorant of or indifferent to the interests of the heathen abroad; but it should get as many as possible of the heathen and idolatrous at home into its churches and under its influence. Its business is not to damn men for error, but to teach and save them from their sins.

A woman suggests that the best thing to establish among the heathen would be a Post Office Mission. I endorse this view, and recommend it to Rev. Mr. Knapp's earnest attention for Japan! Let the Japanese or any other nation have Unitarian views in their own tongue for the asking. It is a modern tool for doing missionary work with, but it is proving the best one yet invented, and is wholly in accordance with the spirit and measures of an enlightened age.

From REV. J. C. F. GRUMBINE, Syracuse, N. Y.

The heathen has been made to believe that his future salvation, or his future eternal happiness, hangs upon an acceptance of Christianity as expressed and defined in the creed presented to him, and that by a refusal to receive it he would be doomed to a future of hell or eternal punishment. The schism which has been made in the Congregationalist church about future probation, has created in that church two bitter classes—the one in favor of, the other opposed to, future probation; and the question is not to be settled in conventions or by court, but only before the tribunal of reason. Until the Congregationalists settle the question the poor savage will live in doubt about his own destiny, halting between two presumptions, reluctant to anchor in either of the two conclusions, and drifting as it were toward an end which, like death, will close one door to open another. Into what will the door open, is the inquiry. In the meantime this hesitation, this entering of that new force into theology, this division of opinion about essentials, this coming together of two great opponents in a field held intact by orthodoxy, is the opportunity of liberals, of Universalists and Unitarians. Have we not a version of duty, an interpretation of Christianity, more potent, more real, more divine than the theology of fear? Can we not bring to the savage a gospel more acceptable to him, because more natural and rational than dogmatism or sectarianism—the gospel of the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God? Will we do it? To strike the iron when it is ready to beat and mould is the opportunity of the workman.

From REV. MARY A. SAFFORD, Sioux City, Iowa.

Unitarianism can do for superstitious heathen just what it is doing for superstitious Christians, in teaching rational and humane views of God and man and duty. In showing that men are saved by truth, righteousness and love, whether they are called Christians, Buddhists or Confucians, it can help to break down partition walls and promote that purity of life which is everywhere the world's greatest need.

From REV. GEORGE A. THAYER, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Unitarians ought most effectively to reach those thoughtful, speculative races of the east, like the Hindus, the Japanese, and the Chinese, whom popular Christianity has failed to move; for we lay the emphasis of our teaching upon the morals of religion, upon the right conduct of life as the essence of faith, and upon the nature of God as consisting essentially in righteousness. Buddhism, the preponderant religion among the above-mentioned races, is in most respects practically identical with ethical Christianity, and hence the Unitarian preacher touches at once common ground with a host of oriental believers. But Unitarian theism also offers a remedy for that morbid idea which is so widespread through Asia, and which is also becoming a disease of European civilization, viz.: pessimism,—the conviction that existence here and hereafter is a curse. Unitarianism is essentially optimism, faith in the unbounded, conquering justice and goodness of God, and its philosophy is the antipodes of Trinitarianism, which holds that God's power is divided with the devil, that the earth is under a curse, and that immortality offers only despair to the vast majority of souls. In contrast with the dogmas of despair, Unitarian Christianity might seem to be a new gospel; a veritable glad tidings of great joy to all people.

Illinois Conference of Unitarian and Other Independent Societies.

It was a happy, friendly, warm-hearted time that the "Illinois Conference of Unitarian and other Independent Societies" had at their Hinsdale gathering on Oct. 25 and 26, their thirteenth annual meeting and their twenty-seventh session. Two new churches and two new "Sunday circles" are the growth of the year in Illinois; and as Hinsdale is one of the twin churches, both hosts and guests had the gladness of a christening-hour upon them. But few places outside of Chicago were represented,—that was disappointment,—but neighbors from that city came in force, and, with the interested townspeople, made the little church feel full. Of ministers the roll showed Batchelor from Boston, Forbush of Milwaukee, Judy of Davenport, Mrs. Wilkes of Sioux Falls, Byrnes late from Meadville, for the present at Geneva, Ill., Buckley from Battle Creek, Mich., Bradley of Quincy, Covell of Buda, Gannett, Milsted, Blake and Jones from Illinois, and Mr. Effinger, the Secretary of the Western Conference. Among the other guests was Mrs. Gunning, representing the Ethical society of Keokuk, Ia.

Tuesday evening Rev. George Batchelor, the agent of the American Unitarian Association, opened the Conference with a sermon on "the Evolution of Christianity." It was a fine, broad, outlook and onward-looking statement, but in applying it to Unitarians the speaker seemed a little burdened with the old anxiety about historic continuities and names.

and a little forgot, we thought, that the conditions of an organized success are not the same thing as the sources of spiritual power. Wednesday morning brought its early quiet hour of upward thought together; and then Judge Tiffany, of Hinsdale, gave the welcome of the parish, while Jenkin Jones responded for the conference, and laid its hand of benediction on the new-born church. Rev. Dr. H. W. Thomas, minister of the People's Church, Chicago, gave the first address of the day on a theme very close to his heart "The Possible American Church" that shall unite all our divided liberal forces in one loving family of work and worship—the Church of the Father and the Brother. As for further creed, "I will tell you what I would do, for one," he said: "I would have every member bring his own pet article. I would have a grave dug wide and deep. I would lay each article in the coffin, and, lowering them to their last resting-place, would have the mourners sing 'Asleep in Jesus,' and leave them forever and ever."

"Sunday Circles," that is, the little house-to-house church organized by a half-dozen earnest men and women without hall, without minister and almost without cost, claimed the next hour. Mr. Effinger explained its working methods,—Mr. Judy, speaking from Iowa experience, the spirit which would make those methods successful. At noon, in the pretty home-room down stairs brightened with chrysanthemums and barberries and evergreen, the Conference became a festival and the mothers and daughters of the parish made a graceful "coming out" as hostesses.

Two papers in the afternoon, by Mr. Forbush and Mr. Bradley. The first spoke on "Agnosticism," with such appreciative reverence for its attitude of reverence that he planted a new meaning for the dark word in not a few of the listening minds. Mr. Bradley announced his theme as "What I Found in the Woods." It proved to be a child snared between some bars and moaning in its lonely danger the one word "Mamma." The finder had sought the woods lonely, faith-lost, snared, himself, from reading Spencer and Darwin—their grand thought of the world he must needs accept, but was its grandeur to be the desolation of his heart? The child's moan in the woods gave the hint that saved him,—the hint that the soul's instinctive yearning for "the Father" was itself one of the facts of nature, itself an item and an instance of the "survival of the fittest." Mr. Bradley is a new-comer to the west, and his word will be a real help to us, judging by this sign of its poetry and truth. At the evening session Mr. Covell entered plea for the good pastor,—it took him to make the good preacher; and then, with Mr. Blake to watch the watch and supply the interludes, Mrs. Wilkes led the way back to the morning theme, and half a dozen speakers followed, discussing that "possible American Church."

One of the best moments in the meetings was the "shame" speech by Mr. Blake a propos of the offer of Mr. Effinger, the former secretary, to release the conference from the large arrears of salary still due him. To accept the offer, said Mr. Judy, would be to relinquish the claim that "Unitarianism means a hundred cents to the dollar every time." So the conference then and there began the work of reparation by raising $84.50 of the amount and appointing Mr. Blake and Mr. Jones a committee to search into and report on the details of the debt.

The following resolutions were adopted:

1. That this Conference sends its hearty greeting to the two new parishes organized this year at Moline and Hinsdale, and as hearty a greeting to the two little Sunday Circles organized at Princeton and Buffalo Prairie. The Conference believes that they will strengthen it, and trusts that it will strengthen them.
2. That this Conference offers the hand of sympathy and co-operation to all in the state working, in their various ways, to advance the interests of truth and righteousness and love. We believe that the time has come to unite such workers in a religious fellowship founded on things deeper than the best words and names,—a fellowship that shall embrace the Broad Church elements in the different Churches, with the religiousness of the many now unchurched, and begin to make real the ideal Church of the future.
3. That the Illinois Conference at this, its annual meeting, renews its word of last June—that the next missionary step forward should be the development of the Unity Sunday Circle, the little church cradled in a home parlor, before even the hall is reached; that it believes this next missionary agency may become a worthy second to the Post Office Mission; that it therefore requests the Directors of the Western Unitarian Conference, and those of the Woman's Western Conference, to take this matter into their special consideration as a thing to push this year; and that Mr. Covell, J. R. Effinger and Mrs. C. J. Richardson be our Conference Committee to practically carry out, so far as possible, the above suggestions, in the state of Illinois.

4. That the treasurer pay the balance in the treasury to Mr. Covell for such services as he has rendered or may render as secretary, up to Jan. 1, 1888.

5. That our secretary be employed from Jan. 1, 1888, at the minimum rate of $400 a year, to be increased to a maximum of $750 a year, if the subscriptions and other resources of the Conference warrant.

6. That the Conference hopes that the twenty Unitarian churches and "Sunday Circles" of the state, namely, Alton, Bloomington, Buda, Buffalo Prairie, Chicago—its First Church, Unity Church, Third Church, and All Souls Church,—Geneseo, Geneva, Hinsdale, Mattoon, Moline, Monmouth, Princeton, Quincy, Sheffield, Shelbyville, Tremont, Warren, will contribute to our missionary treasury proportionately to their means,—if it be only the five dollars that will keep warm the sense of a working comradeship; and to this end will themselves communicate with our treasurer.

7. That the Directors of the Conference request the co-operation of the American Unitarian Association in the support of the state missionary work.

8. That J. L. Jones, of Chicago, Prof. S. A. Forbes, of Champaign, and our secretary, be appointed a committee to arrange for a series of lectures and sermons to be given during the winter at Champaign the seat of the Illinois State University; and that to this end they solicit the co-operation of the ministers of the state, and that of the American Unitarian Association.

9. That the thanks of the Conference be tendered to Unity church and the ladies of Hinsdale for their cordial welcome and generous hospitality. We congratulate them on the hopeful outlook, and wish them a rooted and a growing success.

The following persons were elected officers: President, Mayor Roche, of Chicago; Vice-President, James Van Inwagen, of Hinsdale; Secretary, Rev. Chester Covell, of Buda; Treasurer, Mrs. W. C. Dow, of Chicago (473 Orchard St.); Secretary of the Post Office Mission, Mrs. M. J. Miller, of Geneseo; Post Office Mission Committee, Mrs. M. J. Miller, Chester Covell, Mrs. O. J. Richardson, Mrs. E. E. Marean, Miss Belle Tiffany; Directors for three years, Chester Covell, Mrs. W. C. Dow, J. L. Jones; Director for two years, Mrs. C. B. Dupee.

THE UNITY CLUB.

Clubs and the Bureau.

AN IMMEDIATE NEED.

There is a backwardness about joining the bureau which is working injury to the cause. The bureau costs something to keep it in running order, and the membership fee of five dollars is not much for each club; but fifty or a hundred clubs delaying, depletes the treasury, and some private pocket has had to meet the current expenses. Printing bills, traveling expenses, for speakers, and various other outgoes, can not be met long in this way. We know that the delay in joining the bureau, or in forwarding the fee, is not intentional, and many clubs have not started for the season. Some may ask what return they are to get for the money thus bestowed. But we won't be too eager to get all back in dollars; it is to come in a copy or two of each publication, to the club, in the privilege of purchasing plans of study wisely and gratuitously prepared by able men and women, and much more in the larger benefits of association, fellowship and membership in a movement which is to be a blessing to club and church and to the entire denomination. Send to Rev. E. R. Butler, Treasurer, 10 Warrenton street, Boston.

Robert Browning.

"The development of a soul; little else is worth study."

Methods. They only find Robert Browning who work deliberately. The third reading finds what the first misses. Let all try to make the poems their own before the evening, and bring their failures as frankly as their successes. The aim is to study, not to create literature, so let papers be short and earnest, enriched by helps from any sources. Open each evening with quotations from the poems to be studied, given by each in turn, the entire exercise taking about ten or fifteen minutes. Come with questions from the home reading. Bring in outside contributions to the subject from other writers or sources of information.

ume by Whittier, the poet says: "With the possible exception of Lowell and Matthew Arnold, he was the ablest critical essayist of his time; and the place he has left will not be readily filled. Scarcely inferior to Macaulay in brilliance of diction and graphic portraiture, he was freer from prejudice and passion, and more loyal to the truth of fact and history. He was a thoroughly honest man. He wrote with conscience always at his elbow, and never sacrificed his real convictions for the sake of epigram and antithesis." The critical papers in this volume have the titles, "American Literature," "Daniel Webster as a Master of English Style," "Emerson and Carlyle," "Emerson as a Poet" and "Character and Genius of Thomas Starr King." The paper on American literature is in reality a little volume of itself, filling 138 pages. It is a rapid critical review of American literature from 1776 to 1876, the first century of our republic. Probably it is not possible to find in a like space so able and suggestive a guide to our literature as in this paper. There is always a great dignity to Whipple's critical writings, which no one can fail to feel. He seems always earnestly imbued with a sense of the elevation of his task, which must be performed with justice, "setting down naught in malice," and with a keener eye for merits than for faults. May it not be said fairly that whoever exposes a fault benefits craftsmen, but whoever discloses an excellence benefits the whole world?

THE HOME.

Three Friends.

A TRANSLATION FROM HERDER.

Trust no one as friend before you have proved him such. At the board of hospitality you will find more apparent friends than at the door of a prison.

A certain man had three friends, two of whom he loved dearly; the third, who was most disposed to wish him well, was regarded with indifference. Once, being summoned to court where he was severely but unjustly accused, he turned to his friends and said: "Who among you will bear witness for me? I have been harshly accused, and the king is wroth." The first excused himself immediately, saying that he could not go with him, having other engagements. The second accompanied him to the door of the court house; then, fearing the anger of the judge, turned and retraced his steps. The third, upon whom he had least counted, entered, and testified to the innocence of the accused so joyfully that the judge acquitted him with a fee.

A man has three friends upon earth. How do they conduct themselves in the hour of death, when God calls him to the final judgment? Money, his best friend, leaves him first and goes not with him. His relatives and friends accompany him to the door of the grave, retrace their steps, and return to their homes. The third friend, whom he most frequently slights in this life, is his charitable deeds. They alone accompany him to the judgment seat; they go before him, plead for him, and secure for him mercy and grace.

ROSA E. ROEDER.

THE custom of giving girls in the early teens quarterly or monthly allowances for their small current expenses, instead of making all purchases for them, is growing in favor, and is an excellent idea. There is no better way to teach girls correct and methodical business habits, and girls ought to know the value of money and the best way of spending it, for a great part of every man's prosperity depends upon the practical financial ability of his wife.—New Northwest.

Everywhere the new thought is at work, creating the religious belief of the future—a belief which, when it shall come, will be the most practical of beliefs, lifting the human mind into a surer and serener trust, laying upon the human conscience a more effective sense of responsibility for the world's welfare, summoning states to a finer justice, trade to a stricter honesty, and welding society to a more genuine brotherhood.—W. J. Potter.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

The Chicago Women's Unitarian Association met on Thursday, Oct. 27, at the Third church. A large number of ladies were in attendance. It was a missionary day in the association. A paper on the "Reasons why Unitarians have not heretofore been active in the cause of Foreign Missions" was read by Mrs. Effinger. Mrs. Marean followed with a deeply interesting paper on the Pundita Ramabai and the "high caste widows of India," after which a proposition to form a Ramabai circle to aid the Pundita in her work of establishing a school for these child widows was enthusiastically received, a large proportion of those present giving their names as members of the circle. The sum of $45 was reported as received by the secretary of the circle, Mrs. E. E. Marean. The association adjourned to meet on the 17th of November at All Souls church, when a sermon on "The Gospel of Industry" will be preached by Rev. Florence Kollock, of Englewood.

Boston Notes.—Our Female Orphan Asylum held its annual exhibition on Tuesday. The exercises consisted in very good singing and school recitations and a pupils' dining-room tableau before a feast. The institution started in the year 1800, and, after one removal of its location, now finds itself on a valuable piece of real estate, with one large dwelling house, in the heart of the city. —Unity Clubs are joining the National Bureau. The Bureau is preparing manuals on American history, to be written by Edwin D. Mead; on church work, on art, on music, on Unity methods, and on good amusements, to be written by specialists. These manuals will be published in uniform 10-cent pamphlets, as fast as the club subscriptions paid into the Bureau treasury will permit.

—The "lecture talks" at Channing hall for Sunday-school teachers and others will begin on Thursday afternoon next. The teachers will be: Rev. A. P. Peabody, on "Methods of Teaching Bible Lore;" Mrs. K. G. Wells, with blackboard lessons; Rev. C. F. Dole, on "Early Bible Studies;" Rev. F. Tiffany, on "Ethics;" Miss Lucy Wheelock, on Primary Class Work;" Larkin Duntun, L.L.D., on "Principles of Teaching;" Rev. T. R. Slicer, on "Early Christian History." Each lecture talk will be preceded by a ten-minute praise meeting.

Philadelphia.—The first of the union meetings was held on the evening of the 16th, and Clifford, Ames, May and Mangassarian spoke. The latter was this time the host. The next meeting, to occur in November, will convene in the First church. The attendance on the occasion just past was very large. Clifford, in the course of his brief but noble address, expressed his regret that Weston, of the Ethical Society, had not been a sharer with others upon that platform in the fellowship there enjoyed. The subject in hand related to "Religion and Life."

—The address delivered by Mr. Shrigley, at the Universalist dedication at Hammonton, has been commended for its liberal spirit. Although himself a Universalist, as that term is theologically adopted, the speaker is a man of broad sympathies to whom his creed means something larger than is commonly granted to it.

—Great excitement has been aroused here over the municipal campaign, because of the fact that the Sunday question has been introduced as an element for consideration. The Personal Liberty Leagues have practically endorsed the Democratic nominees, although the Democratic candidates have, I believe, expressed no opinion upon the issues which the Personal Liberty people have brought forward.

—Unity Journal has met with instant recognition here among liberals. The Camden Post, though orthodox in its leanings, has given it a fair acknowledgment. H. L. T.

Minnesota.—The first meeting of the Minnesota Unitarian Conference will be held in St. Paul and Minneapolis on the 16th and 17th of November. Public meeting on the evening of the 16th in St. Paul, and on the 17th in Minneapolis.

Beatrice, Neb.—Since Mary T. Leggett has taken charge of the work here, some two months ago a Sunday-school of some thirty members has been formed. Prof. Samuel Green, recently of Swarthmore college, leads a vital science class, using Simmons's "Unending Genesis" as a textbook. Wednesday evening there is a religious study class. Sunday evening large audiences gather at Odd Fellow's Hall. The new society hopes to be in its own church home early next year. Blessings on the brave band and its efficient leader.

Unity Journal—is the title of a neatly printed eight-page organ of Unity church, Camden, N. J. The first number contains a sermon by the pastor, Rev. N. A. Haskell, and many items of more than local interest.

Emeline Baths.—These baths, located at 63 West Madison street, and sustained chiefly by the philanthropic Charles S. Ruggles, of Manistee, gave during the first year 14,138 shower baths and 30,336 tub baths, at a cost to the bather of five cents for the shower bath and ten cents for the tub bath. To raise the patronage to the maximum of the possibilities of present plant, which is about 375,000 baths a year, would be to change a charity into a self-supporting institution.

Uniontown Kas.—We are crowded for room. Through the courtesy of the School Board we have the free use of an otherwise unoccupied room in the school building, which comfortably seats about 150.

Our Sunday-school numbers about forty and is increasing. Any school having books or other literature to spare will do much good by forwarding it to us.

We organized a post-office mission the 23d, with ten members.

I went to Ft. Scott the 23rd and held one service in the evening, and arranged to return again in November. I have very encouraging word from there since returning home.

Persons desiring to help in this work can send literature. I have more inquiries for sermons than I can supply.

FIRST ANNUAL INSTITUTE

OF THE

Western Unitarian S. S. Society.

It has been for a long time felt that the crowded week of our Western Anniversaries has given little chance for the adequate discussion of Sunday-school and Unity Club work among our western churches. The directors of the above society have concluded to make a beginning in a wiser way and to hold, this fall, the first of a series of annual institutes. The meetings are to be held with the Third church, where all visiting attendants will be cordially entertained. Below we give a tentative programme, printing only the names of those who have accepted. All the parts have been assigned, but the correspondence is not yet complete. The directors are confident that the programme will be carried out essentially as given below. A full and revised edition of the programme will be printed and circulated as soon as possible.

PROGRAMME.

The interest and attendance of Sunday-school and club workers in all our western churches are earnestly requested. Send names of those who are to attend as early as possible.

E. T. LEONARD,
Sec'y W. U. S. S. Society.

It is a pleasure to recommend a good article; one which we know will give satisfaction and good service. The "Garland Stoves and Ranges" are undoubtedly the best that can be produced while their truly artistic features win favorable comment wherever they are seen. We are sorry to say that they are closely imitated. Our readers should bear this in mind.

WORTH YOUR ATTENTION. Mark this! Don't lose it! It will bring you gold! We will send you free something new, that just costs money for all workers. As wonderful as the electric light, as genuine as pure gold, it will prove of lifelong value and importance to you. Both sexes, all ages. $5 a day and upwards easily earned by any worker; many are making several hundred dollars per month. You can do it. No special ability required. We bear expense of starting you in business. It will bring you in more cash right away than anything else in the world. Any one anywhere can do the work, and live at home also. Better write at once; then knowing all, should you conclude that you don't care to engage, why no harm is done. Address Stinson & Co., Portland, Maine.

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XX.]

CHICAGO, NOVEMBER 12, 1887.

[NUMBER 10.]

EDITORIAL.

THE address of Rev. George Batchelor, western representative of the A. U. A., will be for the month of November care of Rev. Enoch Powell, Topeka, Kan.

"It gets very easy to live a virtue that at first cost us a terrible struggle, and then we live it instinctively." So says E. P. Powell in his new book. So testifies the experience of all of us.

REV. MR. CROOKER, in a pamphlet entitled "The Root of the Temperance Problem," thus finds the root: "A man is not safe both as regards his personal destiny and the welfare of society until he is temperate from the choice of his own will,—not because he can not get liquor, but because he does not want it."

E. P. POWELL's new book, "Our Heredity from God," will be more fully noticed by a contributor to these columns, but we hasten to bid it welcome. It seems to us to come nearer being the hand-book on evolution adapted to the wants of those who not only are looking for a clear summary of the evidences of evolution in the physical world, but are anxious to know its bearings upon morals and religion, than anything we know of. It is an admirable text-book for Unity Club classes who will move through it with sufficient deliberation to do collateral reading and studying.

THIS is one way of doing it:—The small branch of the W. C. T. U. in Oak Park have for two years occupied two large rooms, open nightly, and made attractive by papers, magazines and games. The attendance gradually increased until the rooms were filled by young men and boys, many of whom were in the habit of spending their evenings very differently. Like all good seed well gardened, it increased, grew strong and branched. A social was held,—a sort of "donation party," to which each brought a book, and the nucleus of a library was the result. Then the night school need became apparent, and a kindergarten teacher volunteered for Monday evenings, largely given to spelling. And then a lady volunteered for Tuesday evenings for Bible stories and history. Wednesday evening was set aside for social time and games. A demand for bookkeeping was made. Though the ladies thought arithmetic more necessary first, it must be bookkeeping, and a gentleman gave them Thursday evening for that. This made the arithmetic class a very apparent necessity, and Saturday was set aside for it. Friday evening was left for a miscellaneous night. One Friday evening, however, the younger ones having no special business, became particularly restless, and the lady in charge turned them over to one of the young men, and she sat down to the organ for a rest. The noise ceased and they gathered about her in delight. The result was that Friday evening became the musical evening, and proved a marked success, which indeed the whole thing has proven.

THE Unitarian church of Charleston, S. C., has just celebrated the centennial of its church building, the Rev. E. C. L. Browne preaching an historical discourse. From a local paper we quote the following vigorous paragraph from the sermon: "Most churches start out with a dogma or theological position to maintain and propagate, and the necessity of watchfulness here leads them often to forget weightier matters, to forget how foreign this is from the habit and example of Him whose name they claim as a watchword. We are come of a different line. We are convinced that if we can assist men and women to live honestly, kindly and truly, and in the meantime to think honestly and openly, we are doing the best service towards introducing the Kingdom which Jesus loved, and we can trust the results of such thinking to the control of such living. The century of our church, and the centuries of the Christian Church, confirm this conviction. Let us not fall from this high position. Let not the ordinary habit of churches—let not any insistence upon dogma; nor any exaltation of the importance of right thinking and true views—obscure in our minds this greater thought, that truthfulness is always true and righteousness is always right. This is what the Spirit saith to the churches. If the 'Second Independent Church' can cultivate righteousness of life better than the other churches do, it may leave to those others all dogmatic and measuring lines, all authority over thought, and trust to be recognized, somewhere and sometime, by all the names that have the honor and praise of God in them."

OUR co-worker, John S. Brown, of Lawrence, Kan., writes thus: I believe that Count Tolstoi has done a great and a much needed work by emphasizing in his late work, "My Religion," the five unique, radical, rational and practical precepts of Jesus. These precepts can not escape our notice if we observe that each of the five is introduced by the words "Ye have heard that it was said," etc., "but I say unto you." It is astonishing that those who call themselves Christians should lay just as much stress on the teachings of Moses, of David, of Paul and James and John, as they do on the precepts of Jesus. And yet it is not so astonishing when we reflect that the Bible, from its first to its last words, is regarded as infallible in its teachings. If the Bible in its totality stands on the same plane of infallibility, why should we read Christ's sermon on the Mount with any greater care than we read the epistles of Paul or John? If the latter are infallibly inspired, their authority cannot be less than the precepts of Jesus. This deadly error of Bible infallibility has had the effect of leading people away from the plain and simple truths as spoken by him who calls himself the "Son of Man." No one can carefully read "My Religion" without being persuaded that Christ's words are more weighty and have more authority than the words of any other man, however inspired he may be.

Tolstoi's withdrawal from the Greek Church will give a fresh impulse to our rational Protestant principles. We of the Unitarian and progressive faith should not be slow to welcome the writings of so advanced a scholar and teacher. We shall look forward with interest to his new "Translation of the Gospels" and to his "Criticism of Dogmatic Theology." We hope these promised works will be speedily finished and published.

A CONGREGATIONALIST minister in the neighborhood of Jamestown boasted in a local paper, "That there was not one member of his church influenced by or in sympathy with the doctrines of the New Theology." This led Doctor Townsend to ask, in print, of this confident pastor, some searching questions, among which are the following: "Can this be true? Do the good Congregationalists of Frewsburg all believe that the heathen, who have never heard of Christ, perish everlastingly; that all the people who listen to me will burn alive forever, in a literal or spiritual fire; that the mother who looks into the eyes of her little baby sees a total depravity which came from the fall of the first man and woman tempted by a learned snake ; that God made the earth in six literal days, about 6,000 years ago ; that the man-made Augustinian and Calvinistic theology is good enough for them? Go to your good people and in a quiet hour ask them if they do not see things differently from the way they used to look at them ; if they do not sometime read Mr. Emerson's great sermon of the Over Soul and find their hearts leaping to its lyric, inspired utterances! ask them if they do not think that conduct is higher than creed, and that he who has the Christ-like life does walk with the Master, albeit he does not profess His name! Ask the mother who has laid under the flowers the form of her child who, though of accountable years, sealed her lips and made no sign, ask her if that child has gone down to the bottomless hell! Ask some of the old fathers if they do not feel that God's love is larger than human sinfulness! Ask the younger men if their vivid greating years have not shown them a church larger than the folds made by man. Ask your more thoughtful people if they wonder why the latest criticism upon the Bible is withheld from them ; that Dorner is not put in their hand who, though greatest of orthodox scholars, says that the endless hell cannot be built upon the New Testament word everlasting! Ask them if they had been in Boston where the Congregationalists so loudly applauded the New Theology utterances of Joseph Parker, they would not have applauded too! O, preacher, do you not see that a change has come on the thought of men, and the glad utterances of the New Theology are welcomed in all the churches? When you preach and look into the eyes of your people, remember the soul listens, and will feed in the long run only on that which is bread of life."

Justice and Business—A Query.

Conducting business on present principles, it seems impossible to adopt apart from it a pure social life. The same person can not altogether be the one man and the other, at different times. In our counting rooms we buy and sell, without regard to the moral element. Sentiment is in these places disavowed. We aim to get material cheap, and to dispose of it on the highest rating the market will permit. If a neighbor can be prevailed upon to sell on ruinous terms, we are not deterred from buying by any knowledge we possess of the inevitable issue of his sacrifice, or of the grievous need which compelled him to make it. "Job lots," which are two-edged weapons to all who handle them, are yet eagerly sought after by people who never realize their dangers. Men glory if they get material or labor at a merely nominal sum. What boots it if our victim is at a disadvantage when we bargain with him? The harder pressed he is, the lower he must set his price, and as his pocket empties, ours fills. There is a deliberate cruelty in the doctrine that "business is business," which is never obvious to any one who has not experienced what it may be made to mean. Business is robbery, very often, when men proclaim it business of the most innocent nature. Men who ask for time, and overstep it; who agree to certain discounts, and in figuring a settlement, exceed the legitimate figures; who substitute one grade of goods for another; who avoid the obligations of full measure and productive purity; who have all sorts of prices for all sorts of men, as though the buyer stood there to be appraised in place of the goods, are unconscious of their offense unless they are detected in its perpetration, while even in that case, the result is to them a worldly humiliation, or a subject of mirth, rather than an inward recognition of retributive guilt. Are we never to bring our commercial work into alliance with the decried moral laws? Why should we be afraid to make business one with sentiment? I speak not of the mush that often goes under this latter name, but of the basic justice through whose obfuscation we at present suffer untold sorrows. Supposing the whole system altered in accordance with a higher ideal of what our material work should be, and supposing that at the same time men were unchanged, what would again result but failure as sad as before? Therefore, guard well against the drift to a law-made virtue! Give us men. Then will the men generate the system. And give us men by such a radical utterance of the spirit as shall invade every nook and corner of life. Dare to say to objectors: "Where you least suppose sentiment to be demanded, there it is, by the very fact of your closure against it, most needed." Insist that business is not an end, but a means. The end is character. The very wheels that our ingenuity fashioned, and our industry turns, deserve to be made a tribute to that spirit through which they arose. Coming from spirit, they should live in it unparted forever. How can we insure so essential a revolution? By proving the soul to men. By a look through things of our daily life. We must withdraw the salesman's lies, the manufacturer's adulterations, the willingness to profit by another's misfortune, the method by which wages are kept down and prices kept up, the soulless system by which the profits of industry are divided. We have to prove to leaders and workers alike that, after all, money is a paltry thing when one is housed and fed, and the world of the spirit has at last enfolded us. It is not honest in any of us to stop half way in the development of character. If our daily occupation for one moment robs us of a priceless honor,—for a breath abstracts us from the pure ways of love and trust,—we are poor indeed, and no tinselled business "success" can atone for it. And no man can be left out of our settlement. While one is wronged, though all others were freed, we are without exception offenders, and commanded to repentance. Can not business, too, be love and beauty, and thus become one with the picture the artist creates, or the song the poet sings? Why need we always speak of commerce as a thing material, in the secondary sense in which that word is used? Once transferred to truth, why may it not be spiritual with the best that man conceives and adores.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

Choice.

As from earth's broad expanse
All things draw sustenance,
Their life to nourish;
Filling their thirsty veins
From the same sod and rains,
Unlike to flourish:

So, food from lowly clay
And high heaven, day by day,
We are receiving;
And, as we choose and take,
Color and form we make,
Our own fate weaving.

Oft in some marshy bed,
'Mid foulest vapors bred,
Lilies are blowing;
And royal roses grace
Many an humble place,
Regally glowing.

What though no eyes behold
The lily's white and gold,
None praise her sweetness?
Still fragrantly she blooms
And modestly assumes
Her own completeness.

Nor cares the exiled rose
Her garden realm to lose,
Herself adorning
With every beauteous grace,
She makes her dwelling-place
Fair as the morning.

E'en though a desert wide
Stretches on every side,
Barren, unheeding,

Green the oasis grows,
Singing the water flows
Fair meadows feeding.

So live the good and great,
Unharm'd by any fate,
All things refusing
That from the spirit's grace
Its fairness may efface,
Nobleness choosing.

Another View of It.

EDITORS OF UNITY:—The editorial of Mr. Blake's, "Was it Honest?" together with the comments thereon, opens up a subject of much interest; but I trust I shall not be thought hypercritical when objection is made to the form of the question as being incomplete. It seems to me that if the question demands a categorical answer its terms should be further defined. The form of the question as given is relative, and hence in order to arrive at a satisfactory analysis it is obviously necessary to determine first its relations. For the sake of this necessity, then, I ask to be allowed to question the question. Was it honest, judged by what standard? A common reply to this would be, honest judged by the commonly accepted ideas of right and wrong. But how various are the opinions of men on questions of right and wrong is evidenced by the results of our constant observation. It is common for men to regard their own opinions as absolutely right, and that of their disagreeing neighbors as absolutely wrong. And when in a spirit of comparative philosophy we regard this diversity, we sometimes feel we cannot be sure that satisfaction, much less absoluteness, can be attained anywhere. We see the same contradictions when we examine history—one civilization giving us entirely different views from those of another. So it appears that the commonly accepted ideas of right and wrong will afford us no adequate standard. In my opinion, in order to reach satisfactory results, we should approach moral questions with the clear comprehension of the fact that morals, like mathematics, are both pure and applied. In pure mathematics the geometer sees only ideal forms, and his deductions therefrom are absolute. But when he comes to apply his deductions to the outward forms of the artisan the absoluteness vanishes, and in its stead appears only an approximation, dependent on its near approach to truth on the care and skill of the workmen. In pure morals the idealist deals only with an ideal society, but the wise statesman or the practical moralist applies only so much of the ideal as the state of society will bear. We thus see that the answer of a question from purely moral grounds may be quite different from that obtained from the basis of a sound and practical policy. We should then, in judging a question, first demand its precise relations. Let us state the original case. A man, knowing it to be very valuable, purchases a book from a bookseller for a very small price, the bookseller being ignorant of its real value, the purchaser retaining to himself alone the whole of the gain. The question submitted is, Was it honest?

Now the question as stated may simply have relations to pure morals, or it may only have relations to business, or it may have mixed relations. Let us in turn give to the question these different relations, and then analyze each case for a solution. Suppose the question to take this form, Was it honest according to pure morals? Idealists agree that in pure morals, or in an ideal state of society, men would love each other as they would themselves. But under such conditions it is plain there could be no selfishness. Now in the case cited the purchaser acted selfishly; hence we conclude that the answer must be negative.

It will be observed here that the practicability, or even the future practicability, of an ideal state is not discussed. It may be that some form of selfishness will always be essential. It may be, as the writer signing himself "Business" has intimated, that such a state of society would impinge against itself. But somehow I have faith that that constant adaptability of nature which we see around us in all of the lower forms will not desert the world in its higher forms of civilization; that as there are laws of adaptability in our forms of selfishness, so there will be the same in the high ideals of truth and goodness.

But again, suppose we state the question thus: Was it honest according to business ethics? Business as we find it is based upon self-interests, and business ethics as we now have them require no more than that we shall make no misrepresentations, and that we shall comply with all of our engagements. Now in the case cited there were no misrepresentations made and no failure of engagements. Hence the transaction comes strictly within the order of business ethics, and the answer must be in the affirmative. I again make an explanation. I am not here discussing the perfection or imperfection of business methods and business ethics, but simply treating them as we find them established.

Lastly, we may give to the question mixed relations, and ask, Was it honest when we consider it the world's duty gradually to approximate to pure morals in its growing civilization, but at the same time distinctly holding in view the practical truth that the introduction of high ideals is like the introduction of exotics, to be done with great caution? Questions of this form never admit of absolute answers, and satisfactory approximations are frequently difficult. In the present case, however, I would say that a satisfactory approximation may readily be attained. If the bookseller made his profit on the book, I see no reason why he should be further reimbursed, but I think clearly the purchaser would be under obligations to use reasonable diligence in ascertaining where the sacrifice existed, and when found, to compromise the gain with the sacrificing party, reserving a proper share of the gain for his own knowledge, without which the value would not have appeared. Should he fail to find a sacrificing party after reasonable diligence, then I should say that he should be allowed to enjoy the whole of the gain as the fruit of his knowledge.

The question is somewhat shifted in the issue of Oct. 15, and though of much practical interest its consideration will not be entered on here.

G. M. A.

The God of Science.

To me the thought grows continually richer and more fruitful that the very highest manifestations of humanity, even thought, conscience, will, and love itself, are to God what the merest muscular contractions or unconscious organic processes are to us,—that modes of being infinitely above these pertain to him. It was a great insight of Spinoza that thought and extension, the divine attributes to which he reduced all others known to man, should be reckoned as only two out of an infinite number of attributes, otherwise unrevealed. Modes of being as much higher than thought or will or love as these are higher than the mere cohesion that holds the molecules of a stone together, must belong to the infinity of God. Yet these human powers must be, not reversed or extinguished, but realized in him in absolute plenitude. Impossible as it is to draw a line between the Infinite and the finite consciousness, the truth of Nature is marred and broken if either is ignored—if either the Many is sacrificed to the One or the One to the Many. Science, which aims ever to do justice to both, must, I believe, come ever to a fuller and fuller recognition of them both in our human thought.

Born out of a fathomless mystery, surrounded and engulfed in mystery all our days, returning to a mystery like that whence we came, the great thought of God is a flash of light in thick darkness. The mystery of Nature is not evaded by atheism, which only shuts its eyes to what theism but dimly sees. In the silence of lonely thought, in the hard experiences of life, it is to some of us a renewal of strength to recognize that there is that in Nature which commands the reverence and fealty even of moral being. Our own innermost life is shared with the All. Nature is no stepmother to her children. Whispers and hints of the love she bears us reach our hearts in our own best aspirations and endeavors. Dreams and visions of the poet, true to the soul as are the rigorous demonstrations of science to the intellect, awaken a consciousness of the unity between our own restricted life and the Universal Life that overlaps it all. Well did the ancients speak of the earth as "Mother." Between the heart of Nature and the heart of Man is a unity so profound that the mere thought of it is music of sweetness unsurpassed. The song is of a Love feebly shadowed forth by human ties,—of a oneness infinitely higher even than that of love,—and of a destiny too vast ever to be revealed in advance of the great reality. Science will never seal up the fountain-head of this inward melody, but rather open new channels for its blessedness through the whole mind of man. I care nothing for the name of the great Eternal Fact of Being. Call it Nature, or God, or what you will; it is, and will be forever, the ultimate goal of all that is best in humanity. It is the study of this infinite Reality, not "unknowable," but truly known to the extent of our knowledge of universal nature, that gives origin to the Idea of God; and perish what may from the world's perfected thought, I believe that this Idea of God, the grandest product of the human brain, will survive forever.—F. E. Abbott.

Robert Browning on Immortality.

Like a true poet he speaks from the soul. Some very interesting views of the subject occur in several poems, incidentally to the themes, from the various standpoints of the life represented, of which the following are noteworthy.

In Natural Theology in the Island, Caliban, although a groveling, brutal and superstitious being, yet manifests longings for continuous life. He thinks Setebos, who, he imagines, made and bosses the world, could not tolerate an instant

"That either creature counted on its life,
To-morrow, and next day, and all the days to come."

He feels keenly the inexorable grip of fate in the reaction of his passions and selfishness. He thinks Setebos is necessarily cruel, but he hopes, some day, the Quiet, the supreme God he imagines dwelling beyond the stars in the blue ether, will conquer Setebos, or the latter will as good as die. Then the creatures will have a better chance to live all the days to come.

In The Statue and the Bust, we find the idea of probation after death, or purgatory. The two characters, the lady and her lover, the duke, having wasted their lives, look to the tomb under the aisle as their doom:

"Dreary days which the dead must spend,
Down in their darkness, under the aisle;"

a thought fitting the time and story. The relator imagines

"they sit and ponder
What a gift life was, ages ago,
Six steps out of the chapel yonder."

There they wait the trump of doom.

Apparent Failure shows that there is immortality, even for the most wretched human beings. No matter how perverted their aims were, or how, by violence and passion, they were torn from earthly life; it was not a cas failure, because it was not the end of life. The three miserable suicides were God-made, poor men; and what God blessed once can not prove accurst. The poet's

"hope is, a sun will pierce
The thickest cloud earth ever stretched,
That after Last, returns the First,
Though a wide compass round be fetched."

In Amphibian the idea of another element, a finer one of the spirit sort, comes to one seeking refreshment and pleasure in the water. A gauzy-winged insect flutters over the bather, and the analogy is at once suggested whether a soul which early slipped its sheath watches one in the world!

"Does she look, pity, wonder at one?"

Pursuing the thought, he says:

"Whatever they are, we seem;
Imagine the thing they know;
All deeds they do we dream;
Can Heaven be else but so?"

The movement in Abt Vogt transports one into spirits realms in thought. Not only does he feel that

"What was shall live,"

but he declares

"All we have willed or hoped or dreamed of good shall exist."

Pre-existence and the future state are confidently assumed as possible to consciousness at times. The mad lover, in Cristina, asserts that there are moments, sure though seldom, when the spirit's true endowments stand out plainly from its false ones, when one feels clearly

"Ages past the soul existed, here an age 'tis resting merely;
And hence fleets again for ages; while the true end, sole and single,
It stops here, for is, this love way, with some other soul to mingle."

Beautiful Evelyn Hope, though dead, inspires a pure soul with noble love, sure of its reward, though delayed it may be for many lives yet. But the time will surely come at last when he will meet her in the new life, talk to her, and find out the secret of that body and soul so pure and gay in lower earth in the years long still.

"Such love is too beautiful not to be true."

In Prospice we have a very prevalent orthodox notion of future life; a refuge from pain and suffering and a reunion with the loved and lost. One brave soul, near the end of his life on earth, braces himself up to meet death fearlessly—the best and last fight; after that he expects the change into peace out of pain, and then

"O thou soul of my soul! I shall clasp thee again."

A Grammarian's Funeral gives us the typical scholar at the period when learning revived in Europe. He represents that thirst for knowledge which leads to high life and noble aims:

"O such a life as he resolved to live
When he had learned it."

Some said to him "taste life," but he said "actual life comes next."

"Others mistrusted and said, 'But time escapes!
Live now or never!'"

He said, 'What's time? Leave Now for dogs and apes, Man has forever!'"

Cleon presents a high development of Paganism. The mind is capable of appreciating art, and sees perfect harmony in all nature, but can not find the soul—can not seize spirit as a self-sustaining entity apart from matter. The longing for evidence of immortality is intense. Cleon shudders at the thought that when his works, in other men's mouths, shall mock him: he, the feeling, thinking, acting man, who loved his life so much, shall sleep in his urn, and exclaims:

"It is so horrible,
I dare at times imagine to my need
Some future state revealed to us by Zeus
Unlimited in capability
For joy, as this is in desire for joy;

But no!

Zeus has not yet revealed it; and alas
He must have done so, were it possible!"

The Christian idea shows a marked contrast in A Death in the Desert. St. John speaks of his dying condition as the soul retreating from his brain, whence it was wont to feel and use the world, and says: "Yet I myself remain; I feel myself; and there is nothing lost." He taught that the soul was a trinity composing one being—functions of the body, animal life, was one part; the intellectual functions, knowledge, the second part; and the absolute being in the sense of will power, the third part, the last constituting man's self whether the other assist or no. He was conscious of his complete individuality independent of his body.

The venerable Rabbi Ben Ezra, sees everything in perfect peace and harmony. Man is vastly more than the developed brute. Flesh and soul work for each other. Age reaps the harvest of youth's striving. He is able to face the future now that he has proved the past. He waited age, he will wait death, nor be afraid. He proclaims:

"Earth changes, but thy soul and God stand sure;
What entered into thee,
That was, is, and shall be."

To him death is only the completion of earthly life.

The subject of immortality is specially discussed in La Saisiaz. One who thought he had the doctrine of future life pretty well settled in his mind suddenly finds his notions disturbed by the death of a dear friend. Deeply moved he proceeds to re-examine his position, resolutely holding on to terra firma. Does the soul survive the body? He wants to know the truth, if possible; he would not shrink to learn the worst, so it were but truth. Man's weakness is no bar to truth; his is but man's truest answer;—were God to respond it would not be knowledge, it would be surmise. He will ask and have an answer. Is it a fact, or is it a fancy, that the soul's eclipse is not the soul's extinction? He finds that question and answer presuppose two points: that the thing itself which questions answers,—is, it knows; as it also knows the thing outside of itself; call this God, call that Soul,—facts beyond need of proof. All else is surmise. Cause before and effect behind him are blanks; he is the midway point into which is crammed all experience, out of which crowd many conjectures, but as knowledge comes this only:—Things may be as they seem, or may not be, but, without and above things there are; man himself is what he knows not, though he knows he is, and since he is, he can recognize what to him is pain and pleasure. If other mortals are or are not, what pleases or pains them, that is surmise. His own experience is knowledge. He has lived to learn that there is no reconciling wisdom with distress, goodness with evil, and power with failure in the aim, if (speaking for himself only) you bar him from assuming earth to be a probation place. Pleasure and pain do not tally in our sense. Still, without what seems such mortal's pleasure and pain his life were lost—the sole chance to prove, though at his peril, what is good, what is evil, to learn life's lesson to the extent of his needs; and solve the problem. Judge every good or evil issue, nor mistake one for the other, in the final balance which to strike the soul was born and life allotted for thy summing up—thine, no other mortal's world. This world's work he finds like other work, good and bad, here and there. Heaven and earth the spirit's ministrants, excellently adapted all—must we die to taste how sweet were life, if, death allowed? Life seems incomplete. Goodness, wisdom and power all bounded. He can speak only for himself; he vindicates no way of God's to man; each heart must tell its own story uncommented on. His results in: "Only grant a second life and I will count the worst of this as the best of that to be." Could he be assured that some day he will meet his friend, worst were best, defeat were triumph, utter loss were utmost gain. Can it be, must it, will it?—Silence! out of fact's domain. Nor yet within his sentient self the knowledge hides. Aspiration, reminiscence, plausibility of trust, none of these he needs. Before his Soul as umpire, Fancy conducts Reason through earth, heaven and hell,—the soul is compelled to live its allotted life on earth and fated to be rewarded or punished in the next life eternally for deeds done in the body. Once lay down the law that heaven or hell depends upon man's earthly deeds as surely as depends the straight line on his making point meet point without incline, thenceforth neither good nor evil does man doing what he must. Liberty of doing evil gives his doing good a grace. Man both sees and praises the best and follows the worst, because he disbelieves in the heart of him that verdict which for truth his head receives. Certain laws exist which to hear means to obey: therefore not without purpose these man must, while those man may keep. Break through this and all is empty air—not so firm like his first fact to stand on: "God is and Soul is," and by hypothesis, let the soul passing probation in earthly life, exercise thought on fact, and from fact deducing fit surmise, ask itself, and of itself have solely answer. "Does the scope earth affords of fact to judge by, warrant future fear or hope?" Thus have they come back full circle to the point where they began. He therefore hopes—no more nor less than hopes—because he can not fathom how in any instance a change of life's apparent laws could be without involving the abrogation of all;

"Whereas, life and laws apparent reinstated—all we know
All we know not—o'er our heaven again cloud closes, until, lo—
Hope, the arrow, just as constant, comes to pierce its gloom, compelled
By a power and by a purpose which, if no one else beheld,
I behold in life."

In other words, it is impossible to demonstrate to the senses the existence of an entity void of all qualities of matter, because man can manifest himself through his body only, and each body differing from all the others, there is no uniform mode of manifestation possible. Still without these differences individuality were impossible, a meaningless chaos. While the individual undergoes endless change of experience (his identity remaining the same) the power of choice makes him human, leading to consciousness of himself as a being distinct from his body, and identical with universal being. The soul can know itself only in its own way: by revelation of itself to itself.

THE UNITY CLUB.

George Eliot.

THE SPANISH GYPSY.

In opening the evening's study, a short quotation is to be given by each one in turn, repeated from memory if possible, the entire exercise taking about ten or fifteen minutes. Let the papers be short, allowing perhaps twenty minutes for each. The rest of the two hours is to be devoted to conversation. Come with questions suggested by the collateral home reading. Discuss points in the study or in the paper. Bring in outside contributions to the subject from other writers. The readings for the fourth evening should be carefully prepared.

I.

1. Quotations from Biography of George Eliot.
2. Biographical Sketch.
3. Outline and aim of "The Spanish Gypsy."

II.

1. Quotations. The finest bit of poetry.
2. The Moors in Spain.
3. Character Studies.
 - a Fedalma.
 - b Don Silva.

III.

1. Quotations. Noblest Moral Sentiment.
2. Paper. The Gypsy Race.
3. Character Studies.

DEAR UNITY:—In your issue of Oct. 1, Mr. Wendte is quoted as saying, "What is now known as the Unity Club is probably due to Unity church, Chicago." He also thinks that though this early association was called "Unity Church Fraternity," it furnished "the half, and the better half" of the name, Unity Club. You express the opinion that these things are growths, and had no beginning that can be definitely traced.

Since these Unity Clubs have had so extraordinary a development in our churches, and since there is a movement on foot for banding them together into some national organization, it becomes a matter of interest to know who was first in the field both with the thing and the name.

After seeing Mr. Wendte's statement in your columns, my interest in the general matter led me to look up the antiquity of our own club, for I had always supposed that the church of the Unity had the right to sit at the head of the table as being the oldest member of this now flourishing family. Mr. W. H. Baldwin knows almost everything, so to him I confidently applied. The result is that he has placed in my hands the records of the formation and early work of our club.

If any one proposes to challenge our right of primogeniture, let him come forward and make good his claim. Otherwise we will wear whatever honors (modestly of course) pertaining to this distinction.

Official word from Unity church, Chicago, fixes the birth of Unity Church Fraternity as "the fall or early winter of 1866." Our Unity Club (so christened at the start) was born in the parlors of Mr. Wm. H. Baldwin, on the evening of Jan. 4, 1865, a preliminary meeting having been held at the house of the Rev. Geo. H. Hepworth, on the evening of Dec. 7, 1864. The records give the credit of the first suggestion of such a club to Mr. Hepworth.

With the exception of brief periods of "suspended animation," when the church was without a minister, the club has maintained a flourishing life "unto this day."

I will not now enter on the question as to the purposes of the club or the methods of its work. Should this ever become a matter of any importance to other clubs, the facts can easily be furnished. Meantime I only care to make this contribution towards the settlement of the question as to the origin of the name and the thing.

M. J. SAVAGE.

Boston, Oct. 26, 1887.

The Institute of Religious Study in Philadelphia, of which Mr. Ames is Principal, with whom, on the Board of Instruction, Mr. May and Mr. Mangasarian are associated, was formally started on its career on the evening of the 27th. An address from Mr. Ames outlined the course of study probably to be pursued. Remarks were made by Mangasarian, Clifford, Haskell, May and several who were repeatedly referred to as the "laity." The advent of the new scheme is auspicious. The subjects in order are: "The World's Childhood," "Supernatural Appearances and Events," "Ancient Astronomy as Related to Religion," "Sacrificial Observances," "Deification of Great Men," "Angels and Devils," "Miracles," "Origin of Moral Codes, Great Lawgivers," "Prophets and Inspiration," "Priests and Ceremonies," "Symbolism," "Picture Language," "Myth-Making," "Sacred Books—How they Acquired Authority," "Nationalization and Differentiation of Religions and Worships."

Rev. George Willis Cooke will lecture as usual during the coming season. He will give his attention mainly to his course of six lectures on "Women in Literature, or the Intellectual, Educational, and Literary Advancement of Women from the time of Elizabeth to that of Victoria." He has also a course of three lectures on the life and poetry of Robert Browning, the special topics being, "Browning as a Man and a Poet," "Browning's Dramatic Genius," and "The Religious Teachings of Robert Browning." Mr. Cooke's address is Dedham, Mass.

THE STUDY TABLE.

English Masterpiece Course. By Alfred H. Welsh (Ohio State University), author of "Development of English Literature and Language," "Essentials of English," "Complete Rhetoric," "Essentials of Geometry," "Man and His Relations." John C. Buckbee & Co., Chicago, Publishers. Price, 90 cents.

This book contains 200 pages of printed matter, besides five pages of appendix. Fifty-five authors, from Chaucer to Tennyson, are treated, and the appendix contains a price list and name of publishers of one hundred masterpieces from these several authors. The book is substantially bound, and is printed on fine thick paper, the work having been done at the Riverside press. It contains a preface and an introductory essay on literature and culture. The method of treatment is to give the characteristics, and criticism, and sometimes the sources of the works of authors, in a series of references to books, magazines and other periodicals, the chapter, page and number of volume being given, wherever the author or his masterpiece is mentioned. Under characteristics of Chaucer, for example, there are eighty-seven references to books and magazines, where paragraphs, and sometimes several pages each, are to be found, treating the subject. But while the very best authorities and selections are made in each case, the work of individual study and the exercise of individual judgment are left for the student. This book would be a most excellent guide and reference index to the study of literature for schools, Unity clubs and home study, and in preparing papers, essays or lectures on literary periods and authors. A. J. R.

EDWARD L. FALES, of St. Paul, Minn., publishes, in dark-green cloth covers, a collection of 124 12mo pages of his verse, which shows in pleasing proportion moral earnestness, strength and grace of thought and delicacy and smoothness of expression. There are forty-seven pieces in the book, and the general title is "Songs and Legends." The longest poem is "Anpetusapa: a Legend of St. Anthony Falls," occupying twenty-one pages. Mr. Fales employs nine or ten measures, including the sonnet, in which we consider him very successful. It is a delight to come across such sonnets as the following in any new book of verse, and particularly in that of a new writer:

TO SLEEP.

Sweet minister! what have I left undone?
That I should do, whereby I might command
Thy soothing presence and thy mesmeric hand
To quell the torrent of my thoughts for one
Long hour, one restful hour that, once begun,
Should seem eternal peace, where neither grand Nor petty cares might come? An hour so spanned
Would bridge the weary waves that restless run
Between my stirring spirit and the morn.
The patient night doth watch too silently,
And my uneasy brain is madly torn
By every circling atom's minstrelsy.
O gentle sleep! On thy soft pinions borne
Through shadow-land, come, minister to me!

E. R. C.

Homeric Language and Verse. By Thomas D. Seymour. Cloth, pp. 100. Boston: Ginn & Co.

The preface of this little book says, "This introduction is not designed to lay stress on Homeric language as contrasted with Homeric poetry, but is intended to relieve the commentary of explanations of dialectic forms and metrical peculiarities, and to call the student's attention to the most noteworthy characteristics of Homeric style and syntax." It is divided in four divisions, namely: 1. Homeric Style; 2. Homeric Syntax; 3. Homeric Dialect; 4. Homeric Verse. In the first division, "Homeric Style," the author treats of translations, change of subject, direct discourse, principal clauses, order of words, epithets, synonymous expressions, epexegesis, stereotyped expressions, and also of certain Homeric forms and rhetorical figures. The other divisions treat of various matters of grammatical interest, and of hexameter verse, caesural pauses and quantity. There are three indexes: An index of Greek words, an index of subjects and an index of passages illustrated or referred to. The style of the book is terse and systematic.

The Earth in Space. A Manual of Astronomical Geography. By Edward P. Jackson, A. M. Boston: D. C. Heath & Co.

This is a beautiful little book, setting forth in simple language and with admirable illustrations the most common facts relating to the earth, the sun, the moon, the seasons, length of days, etc. The illustrations are admirable. Questions are added, called "Exercises." There is an appendix treating briefly such subjects as "The Diameter of the Earth," "The Sun's Distance," "The Distances of Other Planets and the Fixed Stars," "The Sun's and Moon's Diameters," "The Densities of the Earth and Other Heavenly Bodies," etc. It is not only a good and attractive little work to study, but also a convenient little manual to have by one.

The Illustrated London News comes to us filled with news and fine illustrations in connection with the state of Ireland and of England, too,—it is a continual object lesson on these things so hard for our young to understand. The number for October 22 contains numerous engravings. An English view of the trial yacht race. Our Homeless Poor in St. James's Park at Mid Day, the British Mission to Morocco, and Sketches on the River Congo. A Sleeping Beauty represents a handsome tiger at rest, while Christening Sunday presents infancy surrounded by admirers. The price of the number being only ten cents places it within the reach of all. Every newsdealer has it. The office of publication is in the Potter Building, New York city.

THE HOME.

History of Our Home Calendar.

All the way from Texas comes a package to UNITY, showing what five UNITY children, living on a ranch down there, have been doing. A ranch is a big cattle-farm. There is no good school near by, so the children go to school to Mother in the home. And this calendar is one of the things they did in their home-school. What a peep it gives into a bright, happy, earnest home! It makes us wonder if some other mothers and children might not like to do just the same thing,—make a "Home Calendar" altogether. This is the way our wise ranch-mother tells the story:

"A year and a half ago we bought a 'Louise M. Alcott Calendar.' We read each day's quotations in the family. Finding so many of them beyond the comprehension of children, I thought we would make one ourselves. Our family consists of five girls. My idea was for them to make the selections, bring them to me copied, with the author's name at the right side. When I copied them in the book I added at the left side the name of the one who made the selection. I was very particular that each should understand fully the meaning of the quotation, and much preferred their finding the selections themselves to their getting them through suggestions from others. Their ages at the time of beginning the Calendar were as follows: Bess, ten years; Kate, eight years; Annie Lee, six years; Mary, four years; Sydney Alice, two years. I found it a most excellent exercise for them. We have just completed it. A few of the quotations inserted by myself are in advance of their years; but I inserted them purposely for them to grow towards."

The children hunted their quotations in the books and papers they were reading,—Every Other Saturday, Harper's Young People, Unity, Morning Stars, their Readers, etc. Here is one which "Bess" selected,—can you find it in Miss Alcott?

June 22. "You laugh at me when I say I want to be a lady, but I mean a true gentlewoman in mind and manners, and I try to do it as far as I know how. I can't explain exactly, but I want to be above the little meannesses and follies and faults that spoil so many women. I'm far from it now, but I do my best, and hope in time to be what mother is."—Miss Alcott.

"Kate" found this, but she doesn't know who said it. Who can tell her?

Sept. 28. "I expect to pass through this world but once. Any good thing, therefore, that I can do, or any kindness I can show to any fellow human being, let me do it now. Let me not defer it nor neglect it; for I shall not pass this way again."—Unknown.

Here is what "Annie Lee" selects for April 18:—

A CHILD'S DESIRE.

I want to give something my own
To help the right along,
To show that I would truly live
And shun the thought of wrong.

So thought a little girl who gave Her mite in Sunday-school,—
A thoughtful child, who wished to live
By Jesus' Golden Rule.

She tried to see what of her own
She might give through the day;
And if she found the better part,
Let little readers say.

She kept the little baby boy
As happy as could be;
So Mamma had an hour to rest,
From fretful baby free.

She found the paper Papa sought,
And read him all the news,
Until he told her she was just
The fairy he would choose.

She mended little brother's kite
And helped his top to spin,
Though on her table laid a book
She wanted to begin.

For Grandma she was brightest eyes,
And picked up stitches dropped;
And ere she left her, with a kiss
Her grateful praises stopped.

So through the day she found a chance
To give her own away,—
Her time, her work, her skill, her love,—
And made a happy day.

—Every Other Sunday.

"Mary, four years old," chooses for October 4; and what she chooses is this:

"'Yes,' the violet went on, 'most of us flowers have the mission of beauty and comfort to give in this world; but God has given us all something to do, and although I am only a little violet, I am going to try and do my part in the world's work the best I can.'"—Every Other Sunday.

But Sydney Alice, who can't read, because she is only two, has to turn author, and give her own ideas. On June 4, out of her own head, she says:

"Little sisters, do not slap each other. The little birds do not slap."

That is very good for Sydney Alice. And we will end by quoting something which "Papa" says, on May 23, to one of his five girls:—

"You are getting old enough to see that it takes work, work, work to accomplish anything; and, my little girl, that is what you and everybody else were made for,—to work, work, work, and accomplish something. You can already do lots of nice things, make a good cake, do nice needle-work, write a good letter. You could not do these things from the beginning. The first time it wasn't easy. You had to keep trying. That was fun, and so will all your work be, if you go at it determined to succeed, and to keep trying until you do succeed. Never undertake anything until you are thoroughly determined to finish it; and if the first finish don't suit you,—not some one else, but you,—then do it over and over again until it does."

Now, why don't you five children in Chicago, or St. Paul, or Kansas City, go to work and make a Calendar for 1888? You need not all be in one family, you know; you might be in one school; only you had better arrange with a mamma or two to help you. And you need not all be girls, or all boys; three girls and two boys would be a good mixing. And you had better not be all of one age, or all have blue eyes.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

The Western Secretary in the Field.

The journey from Chicago to Rock Rapids, Iowa, a distance of five hundred and forty-two miles, was accomplished in twenty-two hours. Two hours out from Chicago we encountered a wrecked freight train, the cars piled one upon another in wildest confusion; the result of a criminal attempt to wreck a passenger train the evening before, by tying a telegraph pole across the track. The passenger being late, the freight went out ahead and received the deadly blow. Fortunately the track was clear and we were not delayed. Our train glided smoothly on until we had crossed the Mississippi and left Davenport behind, and were getting settled for the night. Just then came a stop and cry of another wreck ahead of us and on fire. Sure enough a half dozen freight cars in a great mass of flame were roaring and crackling directly in front of our locomotive. A hasty toilet, a transfer around the burning mass to a train in waiting on the other side, and Cedar Rapids was reached some time after midnight. Here another sleeper was attached and we got to bed again. Morning found us away out on the prairies of north-western Iowa, with snow drifts along the gullies a foot deep. But we soon lost sight of the snow and had before us only the long swelling slopes of bare upland, stretching out like a billowy ocean suddenly congealed in its stormy turmoil.

Rock Rapids was reached in due time, and revealed a gratifying interest in the Unitarian Society organized one year ago. The Sunday congregations were good both morning and evening, and the Sunday-school well conducted. The church is not yet ready to take the responsibility of a settled pastor, and must for some time be served by such supplies as they may be able to get. They were urged to take up the work in Sunday Circle fashion, and do their best in conducting services for themselves. The moral effort necessary to keep alive such meetings is the very thing that is needed to deepen the religious life of the people, and make them feel that the church work is their work. Rock Rapids is a growing town in one of the finest sections of Iowa, and will one day, I trust, be a strong center of liberal religious influence in that region. By the courtesy of mine host, C. T. Puchett, I was driven sixteen miles across the magnificent country to Luverne. Here the new parish, the growth of a single year, is in fine condition, under the pastoral care of Mrs. E. T. Wilkes, whose home is in Dakota, thirty miles away. She comes to Luverne every Saturday and returns on Monday evening. She speaks to a full hall, and is beloved for her faithfulness out of the pulpit, as well as her ability in it. She has been recently engaged for another year, and no friend of the cause could wish better things for Luverne than seem sure to come to them through her ministry. Tuesday evening found me at

Sioux Falls, where Miss C. J. Bartlett, minister of All Souls Church, is happy in her work, and in the love and confidence of her people. The little church in which services are now held is full to overflowing. The Sunday evening previous, Miss Bartlett had addressed a crowded temperance meeting in the opera house, and the city papers pronounced hers the speech of the evening. She was asked to repeat it later, in the Methodist church. The secretary preached in the little church on Wednesday evening, to a good audience. He inspected and highly approved the new church edifice, which is now so near completion, and recalled with pleasure the initial service of All Souls, held one year ago in Mr. Wilkes' law office, on a week day evening, at which about twenty-five or thirty people were present. Now behold a live, working church, with a brave woman-pastor, and a home almost ready to receive them. A ride of three hours and a half brought me to Sioux City, where Miss Safford and her companion-worker, Miss Gordon, hold the fort. Here Miss Safford is repeating her good work among the young people of Humboldt, and building up her church through culture and holy endeavor. The society is united and happy under her leadership. Eastward by the night train three hundred and twenty-seven miles, brought me to Warren, in northern Illinois, where, amid the haze of the soft Indian summer Sunday, we went up to hold the first service in a fine new hall, the use of which has been tendered free to the society, by Mr. N. B. Richardson. The congregations were good, and there was an atmosphere of new courage and confidence among them. The prospect brightens with the months, and the right man or woman planted in this center might radiate to Nora, Freeport, Galena and all the country round about, kindling a revival of the religion, of reason, and common sense.

At 5.23 in the afternoon, after a second service, the preacher boarded a fast train, and spent the next four hours scribbling these notes, until the lights of Chicago flashed in at the car windows, rounding up a ten days trip of nine hundred and sixty-six miles, having preached five times, visited many families and gained valuable information in regard to the missionary field. J. R. E.

Chicago.—Mr. Utter led the teachers' meeting last Monday. The lesson concerned itself with the first seventeen verses of the sixth chapter of Luke, but the whole discussion turned to the Sabbath question, and Jesus's position upon the same. Did Jesus quote the Hebrew precedents to his critics because he believed them authoritative and final in his own case, or because he considered it effective argument, to silence his captious opponents. The general conclusion of the class was, that the seventh-day rest was based deeply in the necessities of human nature; that Martineau was right when he said that "Sunday is the center of our civilization," but that it must rest on natural not arbitrary authority. Mr. Utter read most interesting and instructive extracts from Barclay's Talmud, showing the absurd lengths to which the law was refined by the Rabbis, and the parallel between these and the Connecticut Blue Laws was noticed.

Boston Notes.—The Ministers' Lending Library at the A. U. A. rooms is gaining in circulation. A small yearly fee keeps the books in repair, and Rev. N. P. Gilman, its custodian, is ready to give advice in selecting reading matter. The shelves hold some special costly volumes, which are not readily found elsewhere.

—The Sunday-school Society has imported copies of an English pamphlet story of Theodore Parker's life, interspersed with many strong and stirring hymns. It is intended for a Sunday-school exercise. Price, ten cents

—Rev. J. H. Winkley, of Bulfinch place chapel, has for several years past made teachers for his infant classes of his bright Sunday-school girls, ten to thirteen years old. On Friday afternoon these teachers meet him and study a uniform lesson. On Sunday they sit before a group of five little children and help them sing and give them the weekly lesson. The teachers probably gain more by the exercise than if they were attached to an older class; and the little ones are most happy as they nestle lovingly around their juvenile instructors. Brother Winkley thinks this departure from usual modes makes one of his successes.

Lawrence, Kan.—Our venerable co-laborer, John H. Brown, writes: I am glad that so many are girding themselves for the work. I would be glad to see a short, pungent sermon in every number of the UNITY. It is vastly encouraging that the editors of the New Theology Herald have united with the UNITY. There are many preachers in the Methodist church who are broad and liberal, and who are with us in spirit though not in name. One sees in reading Tolstoi's "My Religion" that he is rational as well as radical. I hope he will not neglect his translation of the gospel, and his "Criticism of Dogmatic Theology" for his new interest in the cobbler's bench. "My Religion" is being widely read, and will be appreciated in orthodox circles as well as by Unitarians. I am informed that there are millions of people in Russia of his way of thinking. I have just been reading James' "Primitive Christianity." It is written with care and gives a true account of the origin of Christianity,—its aims and methods of propagandism. Bierbower's "Morals of Christ" is an excellent work. I preached a sermon founded on that a few Sundays since. A brother Methodist minister who heard it pronounced it evangelical. We have begun our year's work in our church in Lawrence in a hopeful spirit. Professor Marsh, of our State University, has organized a Bible class in our Sunday school which promises good results.

Gilmanton, Wis.—The Unitarian Society at this place is still upon its feet; in other words, the usual number of people occupy seats in the church every Sunday. Their minister has been somewhat aggressive of late. Three weeks ago he went to Mondovi, a little town containing three orthodox churches, and arranged to deliver two lectures in one of the halls in the place, on Monday and Tuesday evenings of the following week. On the first evening there was an audience of about 200, and on the latter, of about 150. At the close, Mr. Earl was engaged to deliver a series of eight discourses on Sunday afternoons, commencing October 30. The prospect seems good for permanent work and the formation of a Unitarian society. Mr. Earl intends to make a move at Alma, the county seat, before long.

NATHANIEL THE HERMIT.

Moline.—Under the impulse of a settled pastor this parish is moving rapidly towards the building of a church. A building committee has been appointed, plans are being matured and the work will be begun early in the spring.

The Antiochian for October says that Antioch College "is fast gaining its former prestige. New students still coming in, the prospect is for a fuller school than for years before."

SUNDAY SCHOOL INSTITUTE

FIRST ANNUAL NUMBER OF

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XX.]

CHICAGO, NOVEMBER 19, 1887.

[NUMBER 12.]

EDITORIAL.

TWENTY-ONE different schools were represented at the meetings, either by correspondence or representative attendance.

THIRTY-ONE questions were sent in from Sunday-schools, to be answered at the first working session of the institute. Several, being similar, were combined as one.

WE give this entire number to the proceedings of the First Annual Sunday-school Institute. The range of thought and work covered in its meetings is sure to claim the interest of all our readers.

SEVERAL questions which were read at the close of the session were necessarily left unanswered, owing to the lateness of the hour. These will receive special replies by personal correspondence.

TIME would not permit as full discussion and replies to the questions as we would be glad to give our readers. We ask them to bear in mind that this has been the first annual institute, and therefore largely experimental. We have only begun to learn how to do it. Next time we shall know better how to bring out more satisfactory results, especially from the first working session given to questions and answers. We want this part of the meetings to bear real helpfulness to those who are not able to be present, while at the same time we realize, more fully than they, how much of the inspiration of such meetings can never be reproduced on paper, and must therefore be lost to the non-attendant.

THE last question received before the meetings, was the last to be presented in order on the question morning. It was one which had arisen from discussion at a teachers' meeting when the lesson included the Sermon on the Mount. Q. To what extent should the righteousness of force be taught in the Sunday-school? The question is one of peculiar interest, and had there been time would have called forth some searching discussion of a strongly ethical character, both as to the righteousness and the unrighteousness of the use of force,—when and how to apply it,—and the necessity of being able to meet and measure physical force with spiritual force of equal power, that effectual, progressive results may be obtained. The fullness of the subject-matter which lay behind the question, together with its being the hour for adjournment, necessitated the passing it without discussion. But that is a good kind of question to send next time.

General Survey of the Five Sunday-school Sessions at the Chicago Institute.

If there was any doubt in any mind beforehand as to the success of such a meeting as was called for November 8 11, the results are not doubtful. The benefits of such a gathering are freely acknowledged; and those who participated feel sure that hereafter the officers of the Western Sunday-school Society will need to have no hesitation in laying out their autumn programme.

There were thirteen societies represented by persons present, and eight by friendly correspondence. There were twelve ministers in charge of churches, in attendance. This for a beginning amply fulfills all reasonable expectation. And though the audiences were not large (they were doubtless diminished by the intense popular excitement of a most exciting week), yet they were gratifyingly constant and interested. Some of us can well remember, when in the western conferences, if we had from fifty to one hundred present through all the regular sessions, we had good meetings and went home happy.

It met the expressed want of our teachers and ministers, as a Sunday-school Institute. It had nothing to do with raising money or revising the constitution. Not a question of fellowship was raised; not a resolution was passed. But all came as helpers and learners, exchanging methods and giving good will. Rev. Reed Stuart's sermon was spoken of as a religious poem. The questions and answers of Wednesday morning were a rapid succession of rifle shots. The session was too short for the work (we were repeatedly told that the coffee was growing cold) but many a difficult problem of Sunday-school work had light flashed upon it.

Wednesday evening the Institute was transformed into a singing school by Professor Tomlins, and we were shown how the musical factor of our Sunday-schools may minister to religion. The culminating session of the Institute, however, without disparagement of any, was Thursday morning. It was conducted by Rabbi Hirsch. The theme was the Old Testament in the Sunday-school,—how to use its mythical, ethical and historical elements. Good as anything might be which was offered by the essayists (and we cannot speak too highly of Mr. Hugenholtz' paper), yet when the members of the Institute realized what an opportunity they had before them of sitting at the feet of Doctor Hirsch, by general consent they appealed to him for his scholarly views upon the interpretation and use of the Hebrew Scriptures. Even Doctor Thomas, whom many wished to hear on his own topic, spent most of his time in drawing out Doctor Hirsch on points of biblical criticism. Nor was the assembly satisfied until it had obtained an expression from the Rabbi as to his thought of the New Testament and of Jesus of Nazareth. Whatever differences of opinion there may have been, the spirit of the whole session was that of a brotherhood of earnest hearts and untrammelled minds, conferring together in the interests of truth and duty.

The illustrative lessons given in the afternoon of the same day, to show how the kindergarten method is applicable in our primary Sunday-school work, were very excellent and entertaining. Mrs. Putnam dwelt upon the principles of Froebel, while Mrs. Conger showed how any two simplest questions of Mr. Utter's leaflets might be developed into a half hour of fascination and instruction for the child. Mrs. Beebe told us how a piece of bread might be made to remind the least of the little ones of the goodness of God and the service of man.

Even on Friday morning, dark as the day was to many hearts, and dark as it must remain in the history of our Republic, a good number came together to complete the exercises of the programme. There was general regret at the absence of Mr. Salter; for the leaders of the ethical societies are diligently devising methods of juvenile instruction, which can not fail to be of interest and value to us. But there was no loss of time, though a somewhat wider range of topics than was set down. Mr. Blake and Mr. Jones found fit opportunity to touch certain social questions with great effectiveness. The paper of the morning was by Rev. Florence Kollock, an earnest and clear voice on methods of teaching conduct to growing boys and girls.

From first to last many a brief but helpful utterance was heard, worth reporting and not to be forgotten, but for which no room is left us here. All separated with burning desire to act upon and carry out the wise suggestions made, and with grateful sense of the cordial and abundant hospitality of the Third Unitarian church.

The Sunday School Institute—Detailed Report of the Meeting.

I. OPENING SERMON.

The spirit and general lessons of these significant meetings are left for editorial comment in UNITY columns. The scribe in this report will undertake only to give an outline of the meetings. Throughout they were of absorbing interest, better attended, and more practical in their outcome than was expected.

The opening sermon was given Tuesday evening, Nov. 8, by Rev. Reed Stuart, of Detroit. Mr. Blake gave the word of welcome. Mr. Jones read a responsive service with the people, and Doctor Thomas led in prayer. Mr. Stuart's sermon was on the child and child-training. He deplored the tendency to make the child a mere receptacle of facts, and regretted the rarity of truly educated souls. Facts are of no use unless the soul can grind them out again. Children are filled with the information found in books, but are left ignorant of that from which the books issued. The best teachers are they who teach the child to do without them. The youth needs to be awakened more than drilled. The need of new method is apparent in the low levels on which society and the state still live and act. We meet force with force, and demand life for life, punish murder with murder.

II. THE QUESTION MORNING.

Wednesday morning was given to questions and answers, Mr. Jones directing. He recalled the organization of the Sunday-school Society fourteen years ago, in the face of opposition and distrust, and predicted that something lasting and excellent would come out of this beginning. The first questions were introduced by a short paper from Miss E. E. Gordon, of Sioux City, Iowa.

Question: Shall the so-called liberal doctrines of our church be taught in the Sunday-schools? If so, at what stage of the child's intellectual development shall we begin?

Answers: If you do not give the child your own belief, they will take some one's else. Answer the question when the child asks it. Tell the children only what you know. Make doctrine subordinate.

Q. Is it wise to have little children take part in Sunday-school concerts? Does it not make them bold and take away the timidity of childhood, and make them miniature men and women?

A. Depends on the child. Take the ones that do not want to. The prevailing opinion seemed against the practice. All were agreed in condemning the display and money-making business.

Q. Is it right to have more children in the Sunday-school than can receive the best work of the teacher?

A. A good teacher with class of twenty-five is better than poor teacher with class of three or four. Never make a new class unless you have a new teacher. Not too many children but too few teachers. Children should not go to more than one Sunday-school; it destroys the usefulness of both schools if they do. A good teacher can always find room for all her pupils.

Q. Why do not the boys sing?

A. Boys do sing. When a boy's voice is changing he feels that he is not sure of it, and does not want to sing. Boys think it is only girls that sing, and so don't. Mr. Hugenholtz said that with him the boys sang second part or alto.

Q. Where are our teachers to come from?

A. We ought to have men teachers as well as women. Can not get the boys to come unless their fathers do.

Q. What is there for maps, pictures or charts illustrating moral questions?

It was reported that 120 pictures 8 x 12, mounted, could be bought for $25, from the works of the old masters. It would be a great help to have the lessons illustrated. The pictures could be kept loosely in covers and have a handle, so when passed around they would not get soiled.

Q. How shall we keep older scholars in school?

A. It is necessary to have a good example set them. Let the parents come and then the children will.

Elevate the quality of work. Teach more ethics. Get acquainted with the pupils. Love is as strong an influence as labor. Do not let them wear out their interest in church work before they are old enough to begin it. Let the parents become interested in religious study classes, Unity club work, etc. Have librarians who know the books.

Q. How can grown people be made to see the importance of the Sunday-schools so they will sustain them?

A. If the children are enthusiastic the parents will come. First of all, demand attention and regularity. Go to see why the child does not come. Do not allow children in lesson hour to talk about personal affairs. Give them questions to look up and be sure and call for the answers next Sunday.

Q. How shall we interest boys from twelve to eighteen?

A. First, form in children early habits of regularity in church service. Love the children and make them feel that you do. Inquire about the chief interest of the week.

Q. Should Sunday-school study and class work be devoted mainly to a literary and secular knowledge of the Bible; or should the moral lessons and spiritual teachings be made dominant?

A. Mr. Learned showed how neither could be carried on successfully without the other.

Q. How to train children in morality without the ineffable silliness characterizing Sunday-school text-book?

A. The saying was quoted, "If you want a child to walk the right way, go that way yourself."

Q. Is Sunday-school instruction alone sufficient to train thorough teachers? Are teachers' meetings a sufficient help to supply what the religious education may have lacked?

A. Mr. Hugenholtz said that some like to teach but are incompetent. He has religious instruction for the teachers during the week, and week night lessons for the children. He has four classes, two of boys and two of girls. Thorough work done in these classes.

Q. How to train teachers for older classes?

A. Mr. Jones told about his confirmation class on Saturday. He teaches for two hours. They bring note books. He would, when necessary, teach negations until they are splendid affirmations.

Q. To what extent should the common school system of preparation and instruction be followed in the Sunday-school?

A. Mrs. Conger said the standard in public schools was good. She had questioned high school girls and boys, and asked them how much time they gave to the preparation of a lesson. Thirty minutes was the most any of them gave. We ought to give Sunday-school lessons the same respect that we show to our public school lessons. If we try it in a good way, they will prepare themselves as in public schools.

Q. How to get children to help teachers teach?

A. We ought to get the boys and girls to bring their questions from their own wants, and they will help us in our work. Need not confine ourselves to lesson in hand, but follow out the thought in the lesson from an ethical point of view.

Q. How to get good Sunday-school lessons from pupil whose father and mother are indifferent to Sunday-school work?

A. If the father tells the child one thing and the teacher another, this is a difficult case. Is it right to contradict a father's teaching? Yes, if gently and respectfully.

Q. To what extent can the one-topic system of text-book lessons, or plan of study, be made applicable to a mixed Sunday-school?

A. Theoretically, the graded system is preferable. Practically, the uniform topic is most available.

Q. Is a general summary of the subject for any Sunday desirable at the close of the school hour, for the whole Sunday-school?

A. A general word upon the lesson is better before coming to class work than afterwards. Mr. Blake gives a sermon of five or ten minutes to the children, and takes the text from the service. Mr. Learned said that every three or four Sunday he has each teacher give the leading thought taught in the lesson of that day, before the whole school, at the close of class work. The number of the questions and the interest in the answers filled to overflowing a long and animated session, until noon.

III. UNITY CLUB.

Wednesday afternoon and Thursday evening sessions were given to the discussion of Unity Club work, an account of which is given by another hand.

IV. THE MUSICAL EVENING.

Wednesday evening was devoted wholly to music, under the direction of Professor W. L. Tomlins. The direction of this accomplished teacher turned out to be nothing less than an hour of solid tuition, with equal pleasure and benefit to the audience. Mr. Tomlins laid down various rules and principles of religious, and especially of congregational singing; but all the principles resolved themselves to this, that the singing will be good in tone and manner when it comes from sincere devotion in the heart. If there be real prayer or real thanksgiving, or real worship in the heart, then the singing will utter these qualities, and music truly expressive of these feelings is good music. It was shown how the presence of real emotion in the heart naturally throws the whole body, including the throat, into the right muscular state, and the proper flexibility for singing, and also fills the lungs with air. These principles were illustrated by Mr. Tomlin's singing of the Portuguese Hymn, both as it ought to be sung and as it ought not to be sung; and then the congregation were drilled in the same song, to lead them to sing it in a way which was a vital utterance of the thought and emotion of it. Then Mr. Tomlins, by means of the chorus which he brought with him, produced the music of the Christmas Service, in "Unity Festivals," and also some pieces of music in "Unity Services and Songs," which have been called difficult portions. Both the Christmas music, and the other pieces impressed us anew with their dignity and worshipful quality. After this, the evening was closed by the joining of the congregation and chorus in reading and singing the eighth service, entitled, "Fellowship," in "Unity Services and Songs." On this evening, as well as throughout all the meetings, it was kept in mind that we were holding an Institute, and the real teaching and drill that gave the evening its character made us all feel that we had received a certain benefit not to be obtained from listening only to a performance of the music.

V. THE OLD TESTAMENT SESSION.

Thursday morning attracted the largest audience, the attendance reaching about a hundred,—Rabbi Hirsch in charge of the meeting. After singing a hymn, with Rev. Mr. Hugenholtz at the organ, Rev. Reed Stuart, of Detroit, offered a few words of prayer. The leader in a fitting way introduced the subject of the morning. He spoke of the significance of the Old Testament as a part of the religious treasures of the race, voicing, not the childish but the child-like thought of a people concerning religion. He quoted Hegel as saying that a myth is the truest of all things, as it suggests not what is, but what ought to be. In presenting the essayist, Mr. Hugenholtz, of Grand Rapids, he spoke of him as the pupil of Kuenen, who with his associates were the giants that had opened the brazen gates of Hebron. The paper of Mr. Hugenholtz is published in full, in this number of UNITY, and we will not anticipate it, but only indicate the impulse it gave to the discussion, and if possible arouse a healthy interest on the part of all our readers concerning a paper that deserves wide circulation and careful study, not only among Sunday-school teachers but all students of the Bible and lovers of truth. Mr. Hugenholtz reminded his hearers that the best way of studying the Old Testament was never the easiest way. He pleaded for the use of the mythical element, by frankly recognizing it as such, and illustrated the method of such use by the story of Jacob's wrestlings with the Lord. He would not make saints of the old heroes; would tell their faults as well as their virtues.

The conversation following was introduced by Mr. Hirsch. He would not save the letter at the expense of the spirit. There are two general methods by which myths are interpreted, the literal and the critical. The literal method has itself two forms: first, the orthodox method, which takes the story literally and miraculously as it stands; second, the rationalistic method, the technical term for clinging to the letter of the story, but explaining it away as a natural circumstance. The critical method explains the story as the narrative expression of an idea, or legendary additions growing around some sacred fact. Mr. Jones called for a working definition of a myth. Mr. Hirsch would exemplify, not define. He would illustrate by a well-known concrete example, e. g., George Washington's hatchet—his truthful character giving rise to the truth-telling story.

Mr. Hugenholtz said a myth was a personification of a natural phenomenon, or the personification of human ideas.

When Doctor Thomas, who was next on the programme, was called to speak on the ethical element in the Old Testament, he spoke briefly of the universality of the ethical element, saying that we were all essentially agreed on its value, and on the Old Testament resources for moral instruction. The perplexities came in the department of thought in which Rabbi Hirsch was a master, and so he insisted on further questioning of the leader. In a conversational way Rabbi Hirsch indicated the historical beginnings in the Old Testament. In the eighth century B. C. we are on historic grounds. The patriarchs are tribal personifications. The personality of Moses is hard to establish. Joshua was written with a theological purpose, consequently not reliable historically. Previous to the prophets the religion was not, strictly speaking, monotheism, but henotheism,—one god for the tribe, but other gods for other nations.

Then came Mr. Learned's paper on the evolution of religion in the Old Testament, which also is to be printed hereafter in UNITY, and consequently to be passed over in this outline. It was of a character to promote and continue the conversation already begun, and for another half hour Rabbi Hirsch was made the target of the most searching questions, that brought forth answers of suggestive interest to pupil and teacher. We can indicate but a few of the lines of thought started. Who wrote the Book of the Covenant? What are the oldest fragments in the Pentateuch? In this connection the Rabbi read in the original "The Song of Miriam," and explained how Yahveh became almost the lost word,—the name too sacred to be pronounced more than once a year, and that under the most solemn circumstances. To hear it spoken at any other time caused a devout Jew to tear his garments in condemnation of the sacrilege. The Rabbi thought that probably Jesus uttered that name on his trial, when, according to the text, the Jews rent their garments. In answer to Rev. Reed Stuart's question, "Where did the ethical sense come from?" the leader replied, that Judaism and religion made the Bible, not that the Bible made Judaism and religion. Mr. Stuart also asked as to the moral quality of the Old Testament standards that placed rewards as the motive for right conduct. The Rabbi thought that most of the rewards were national, not individual, and that there were varying degrees of nobleness to be found in the Old Testament.

The question was asked, "Why was it left for Kuenen, a Gentile, to apply the highest scholarship to the interpretation of the Old Testament rather than to the Jew himself?" To which the Rabbi replied, that until recently the Hebrew scholar was hampered by theological limitations, and suffered from the exclusions from the broader institutions of learning.

Now, Gieger and others show that the liberal Hebrew is not wanting in the power to apply the critical methods to the study of the literary treasures of his people. As to the relation of Judaism to Christianity, the Rabbi professed the highest admiration for the character and teachings of Jesus, who, he said, belonged in his calendar of saints. His execution was in defiance of all the known laws and customs of Hebrew courts, and must be ascribed to the fanatical vehemence of a mob, which alone should be held responsible. But if the race was to be held culpable, it has long since expiated the crime at the hands of persecuting Christians. Reformed Judaism he described as consisting of the universal elements in their national religion, and Unitarianism was this progressive Judaism denationalized. In the talk it was suggested that the Unitarian toleration, and the hospitable spirit of its religion were doing more to break down the barriers of the Jewish race than all the persecutions of Christian centuries. The Rabbi thought that if Jesus were to come to Chicago to-day, he would find himself more at home in a Jewish synagogue and the liberal churches, not excepting Doctor Thomas', than in the creed bound churches which insist upon his worship.

VI. PRIMARY CLASS WORK.

The Thursday afternoon meeting opened in charge of Mrs. E. T. Leonard. The entire session was devoted to primary instruction, and two illustrations were given of how to conduct classes. The first, by Mrs. S. W. Conger, of the Church of the Messiah, in this city, made no claim of introducing kindergarten methods, yet in its spirit and adaptation it was in entire harmony with the principles of kindergarten teaching. She considered the meeting in the light of a primary class, giving the lesson by means of questions, which drew forth answers from those present as if they were the children. The lesson was No. 2 of Mr. Utter's "Lessons on Luke," the same course now used in three of the Unitarian Sunday-schools in the city. The text to be committed was given singly and in concert, "What manner of child shall this be?" Besides the use of the questions and answers to illustrate the thought of the lesson, Mrs. Conger told the story from the Bible about the birth and naming of John the Baptist, which came in connection with this lesson. She then questioned back again through the story, impressing it more deeply upon the mind. The audience proved itself a model class. The answers covered the usual range, from the precociously serious child to the irrepressible one on the front seat, whose hand was always raised, and whose answers were often more ready than relevant. It was questioned, What should be done with the little ones who were eager to answer all the questions, and with the bashful ones who would not answer any. Ans. It is best, if a few are inclined to talk too much, to look straight over their hands some of the time to the others, yet it is often a real help to have these ever-ready hands. The bashful ones will learn in time to answer if let alone.

Next followed a lesson given by Mrs. Emma A. Beebe, of Geneva, Ill., which illustrated in a more definite way the kindergarten thought in teaching. She drew her lesson from a piece of bread, and before seeing it, the class was led to discover for itself, by means of questions and answers, what it was she held in her hand. The questions were then so directed as to trace out from whence all the different things of which it was made must have first come. She traced the growth of the grain back to the ground from which it sprung, carrying it through the hands of the farmer, miller and baker.

This accustoms a child early to think behind what he merely sees with his eyes, and to seek for causes. In this case it led to the thought of gratitude to God for all the wonderful ways in which he gave good gifts to mankind, and to a thankfulness toward the many people whose work had made it possible for this bread to be made.

Mention was made in the lesson to the thought that God is always present, which brought out the fact that some children dislike to feel God is always with them. There is in it a sense of being watched. Mr. Jones believed that children suffer from too familiar use of this thought of God's presence. Never mention the name of God in the presence of your child except when the child and you both are filled with true and serious emotion. Mr. Blake questioned the moral result and effect of appealing to the Infinite Presence as a motive. Do not make children do right because they are afraid they will be seen if they do wrong. From this lesson we see that doctrines are taught in a certain way but not formulated.

Mrs. Alice Putnam, of the Chicago Kindergarten Training School, talked of the kindergarten in reference to Sunday-schools. She gave some of Froebel's ideas, and said the Sunday-school was selfish in that it gave too much to the children. She thought the children would be happier if they did more themselves. As an example, she told how for years there had always been a fine Christmas tree for the children, and they had received presents; but one year the children made everything themselves, either for their parents or for poor children, and they were very much happier than when celebrating Christmas in the old way.

It was best to teach children there were two ways to do things, and no matter if they did seem mixed sometimes, they would straighten into a right way. As for kindergarten material in Sunday-schools, she said it was too general and too crude for Sunday-school use, but you could not get along without charts. She also thought the singing was very bad; better words were needed and more rhythm. As for gestures in singing, it was not good to have them at all unless they came naturally. The question was asked, "Could the children be kept quiet without being amused?" Mrs. Putnam said that there were absolute moments of stillness, and that, as has been said, three minutes' attention from a little child is worth half an hour from a grown person. The discussion was carried on with lively interest, closing at four o'clock.

VII. CHARACTER LESSONS.

For the eighth time the delegates gathered in larger numbers than was expected, on Friday morning, Mr. Effinger in the chair. After singing, the chair introduced the meeting with what proved to be a prophetic statement, that this meeting would be in many respects one of the most unique and profitable of the series. For the best of reasons Mr. Salter failed to be present, but his interest was assured by a kindly communication. Mr. Jones introduced the first question for discussion,—How to teach moral questions to the little ones by the aid of Bible stories, etc. The availability of such stories for such purposes was proven by the discussion of the day before, but he saw a danger in the direction of converting the stories into entertainment; of anticipating the growth of the moral sense, which, like the bones, are solidified slowly in the child. Mrs. Parker, of Quincy, emphasized the same truth and recommended enforcing the lesson by a story, instead of merely attaching to the story a lesson.

Mr. Learned instanced the failure of a modern reform school in making men. This can not be accomplished by feeding children, like Kingsley's water-babies, on "flap-doodle." Mr. Blake told the wonderful story of De Metz the founder of Mettray, the marvellously successful boys' prison in France, where only about three per cent. of the inmates fail of becoming good men and useful citizens.

Next came a paper from Rev. Florence Kollock on conduct lessons for boys and girls of intermediate age.

The essayist thought if we were to judge of the value of work done in Sunday-schools by the lives of numbers of men and women who, when young, had depended upon it for their moral and religious training, it could find but small endorsement. Too much the teacher takes into account "the life to come," to the exclusion of "the life that now is." Too often the suit for the divorce of faith and character is entered in the Sunday-school and granted in the open court of the creeds on the basis that "I believe" answers the requirements of "I am." She would awaken and develop the moral convictions of the child, his sense of duty to himself and to others, especially those to whom he owes most, that religious truth may have a solid foundation. The efficient religious teacher is one who so enforces the lesson upon the mind of the child that it seems a part of his every-day life; who instills conduct so deeply into that life that the foundations are laid for a truly religious character.

Mr. J. C. Long, of the Church of the Messiah, in this city, introduced the third topic, citizen and neighbor lessons to older classes. He would add an eleventh commandment, "Thou shalt go to the polls," and would enforce the commandment in the Sunday-school. He believed that to be a good Christian was to be a good citizen, and vice versa. All through the morning discussion ran a recognition of the mystery of heredity and environment,—their relative significance. The session was closed by some tender words from the pastor of the church and a benediction from Mr. Effinger.

VIII. LIGHTS AND SHADES.

All through the week there is no denying that the anarchists' doom threw its shadow across the meetings. The attendance on that account was lessened. But on the other hand the moral earnestness was heightened to a spiritual intensity, rising, as such intensity often does, into genuine enthusiasm. The hospitality of the church was delightful. The cosy lunches in the Sunday-school room were most homelike. Altogether, it was a highly auspicious beginning of an important movement—one that will ripen into, not only an annual representative gathering of this kind, but into many smaller ones in local centers.

THE UNITY CLUB WORK.

Each of the two sessions devoted to Unity Clubs met with more unavoidable variations of the programme than those of the Institute proper. The first was substantially the same as announced, but with a change of order. Ten Unity Clubs were represented, covering a geographical area that reached from Fall River, Mass., to Davenport, Iowa. The evening session was held Wednesday afternoon under the leadership of Mr. Kerr. The main feature of the exercises was a paper by Rev. A. J. Rich, of Fall River, Mass., Secretary of the National Bureau, on the general subject of Unity Clubs, their object and methods. Mr. Rich strongly recommended to Unity clubs, that in organizing for literary study, they should add to their purpose charitable work. He spoke of the work in Eastern clubs, and said that Rev. E. E. Hale would not consent to be made President of the Bureau unless this plan was carried out in its operations. Mr. Learned, of St. Louis, explained the work done by the club connected with his society in the study of Emerson. W. R. French, of the Chicago Art Institute, gave an entertaining talk, with illustrations, on the study of art. Mr. French thought it very desirable, although not absolutely necessary, for a club studying art to have in it some one person who was himself an artist. Study of art will be much aided by illustration. The audience was delighted by the rapid sketches with which Mr. French accompanied his informal suggestions to a club, and enthusiastic applause evidenced a lively appreciation of illustration, at least in this instance.

The second club session was held Thursday evening, Mr. Jones acting as chairman in place of Mr. Utter, who was absent. The paper for this evening was to have been furnished by A. J. Beavis, of Iowa City, on "The Undeveloped Sides of Unity Club Work," but, owing to a series of accidents, neither essayist nor essay were present, and the time was taken up with a paper by L. G. Wheeler and short informal talks by Mr. Blake and Mrs. Woolley on types of club work.

Mr. Blake pressed the claims of a course of study on social politics, reviewing the work done by his own church club, under his direction, a few years ago. Mr. Wheeler, representing the Prudence Crandall Club of this city, with whose work readers of UNITY have been made acquainted, spoke of the study of philosophy, confining himself to the modern scientific school as represented in the writings of John Fiske. Mrs. Woolley spoke of the advantages of the study of Browning.

Though this is but a meagre report of a meagre programme of the club division of the Institute, it need not be taken as a discouraging sign. That the interest in Unity Clubs and their work is steadily growing, is manifest in many ways. The discussions following the papers and more formal talks by those appointed to conduct the programme were the most profitable feature of the occasion; but the bright things said at such times, the hints and suggestions conveyed in the intelligent questions asked and answered, evade the reporter's pen and must be left to the reader's imagination. CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

The Mythical Element of the Old Testament in the Sunday-School.

A PAPER READ BY REV. F. W. N. HUGENHOLTZ BEFORE THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL INSTITUTE.

The best part is never the easiest; in every sphere of life a higher position includes a higher vocation. So in religion the rejection of the old mechanical revelation and salvation requires a more energetic self-exertion, the inner clearing up, the sanctification, of the own mind. It is the same with the religious education in general: instead of the memorizing of a written creed, we have to promote the free and substantial development of the intellectual and religious life of the children themselves. It is finally the same with our present subject, the mythical elements in the Old Testament. This term itself causes already various difficulties in our Sunday-school work, difficulties unknown in former times. To tell the different tales of the Bible was then the easiest thing one could imagine. No teacher who had any narrative talent, did find any trouble whatever with it. But it is quite another thing with us, who have learned to doubt the credibility of a great part of these tales. Yea, there are people who consider the scruples against the use of these tales so accumulated that they would like to discontinue it altogether.

Shall I refer to some of these scruples? The biblical tales, so they say, convey to the children entirely erroneous ideas of God and of his relation to man. In the Bible God speaks in human language, walks round upon the earth, reveals His will by means of external phenomenon punishes the wicked and rewards the good in a manner contrary to the real course of things, by sickness and death or by a long lifetime, by poverty or by wealth, etc. Not seldom this God does the wrong thing with men, hardens their hearts, orders them to lie, takes bloody revenge, etc. Moreover, the Bible swarms with miracles; the whole history is told from a supernatural standpoint; the test of a saint or prophet is not his moral greatness, but his performing miracles. If you tell all this to the children you are loading their brains with useless ballast, and perhaps in later times it will cost them great trouble to reject it. And last, not least, many of these tales are so immoral or indelicate, that it is almost impossible to tell them. Without any doubt there is truth in these objections, and at least they might bring up the question whether it would not be advisable to be silent about the biblical tales, until the young people acquire some more knowledge of good and evil, of truth and untruth, whereby they will better be able to judge about the historical and moral value of what is told to them. There is one argument more in favor of ignoring these tales until the children have reached the age of twelve to fourteen years at least, it is the fact that having heard them before, perhaps several times, the greater part of the interest is gone at the time you could treat them more thoroughly and successfully.

But wholly to ignore the biblical tales in our Sunday-schools would be, as I think, a great mistake. They may show many wrong ideas about God, on the other hand they contain treasures of knowledge of the human heart. The biblical persons are living individuals, all distinguished from each other, all images which every one can grasp and from which he can learn. Where will you ever find another collection of tales as rich, interesting and apt to illustrate various situations of life as the Bible.

Moreover, the knowledge of these tales is an indispensable part of the history of the Israelitic religion; in our teaching and preaching we need and use them every time for illustration, and suppose them to be generally known. Our books are filled with allusions to biblical persons and tales; by want of biblical knowledge the fruits of literature and preaching will be lost for a great deal. And he who did not learn these tales of the Bible in his childhood, ordinarily never will become acquainted with them.

On the contrary, the Bible is still for thousands of men their sole religious manual, often the sole book in their possession. Every one must learn to understand it, or its misunderstanding will harm his whole spiritual development.

What then shall we do with it? How shall we use it with our children? First of all let us clearly understand the mythical elements ourselves. If from childhood we always heard the biblical history in the old manner, something of the old heaven easily remains, and the suggestion that this history, these historic figures, as we thought, may be myth only and mythical phantasms—this suggestion puzzles, hurts us, seems to us at first a kind of sacrilege. Now this condition must be absolutely outgrown. We have to become wholly acquainted with, for instance, the following scientific results:

All tales antedating Moses are entirely mythical, and those of the six following centuries are largely so, because the prophets of the eighth century before Christ are the first reliable informants about their own time, their writings forming the oldest parts of the Old Testament. They have collected and adjusted according to their pedagogical conceptions the old myths, legends and traditions of their people. So the patriarchs may not be considered more historical persons than Adam and Eve, because no more than in our days one man, though he begat two dozens of children instead of one, like Jacob, would grow to a tribe or to a whole people. From a historical point of view all persons in these patriarchal families are only personifications of tribes and nations. As to the so-called books of Moses, the oldest parts are written about the eighth century, the golden age of the prophets; another part (Deuteronomy) in the seventh century, the age of Josiah; their greatest part during and after the Babylonian exile till the time of Ezra. And Moses himself? He probably may be the author of the ten commandments, but as to the rest, he too nearly disappears in mythical clouds. The supposed foundation of his religion itself, the principal contents of the prophetic preaching, the election of Israel by Jehovah, and this covenant with this elected people—all this can not be called by any other name than that of myth, though it be inspired by the purest religious feeling. In general this God of the desert, this God of the sun, this Jehovah has nearly nothing of what we mean when we speak of God; not before the age of the great prophets of the eighth century does he get some of these ideal features. Likewise these prophets framed and told the former history of their people, of their presumed forefathers and their first prophets, with the object of teaching and edifying their people; so the same for us these tales are only characteristic studies and lessons for life, and still by using them we never should forget that the standpoint from which these prophets viewed human life, the leading of God, and the duties of men towards God and humanity, greatly differs from ours, and consequently never should be communicated to our pupils without our critical distinctions.

Moreover we must be conversant with the difference between truth and reality, and able to enjoy the first, when it comes to us in the garment of poetry. We must thoroughly feel that we cannot treat the sublime poetry of many of these mythical tales worse than by considering and telling them as real facts; as our old theologians told the myth of the paradise, in which they read the story of a state of righteousness of the first men and their fall into sin. We must thoroughly be convinced that indeed the value of the Bible does not decrease but increases, when we no longer consider this book as revealing a so-called true, but for us indeed wholly impossible God and impossible religion, but regard it as a document relating to the most interesting religion of antiquity. In the defective forms of that time the Old Testament brings to us invaluable, everlasting truths and lessons for life. Above all, it shows us how religion develops itself orderly and irresistibly from the lowest and meanest paganism to the most ideal piety. The power of truth, the power of the moral ideas comes to light nowhere clearer than in this history of the religion of Israel. By thus rejecting the supernatural character of the Bible but appreciating its proper qualities, we do not only justice to it but we gain higher and more general esteem for it. As he who gives a eulogy of a defunct person, and will find in him no fault at all, never will be considered the truest biographer, nor the dead man's best friend, so we never can do greater disservice to the Bible than by ascribing to this book a divine origin, although every one who has eyes to see, and uses them, will at last recognize its human features.

All these things must be for us facts and truths of undoubted sureness, and when thus we have learned to love the Bible, in this, its true character, because of its great virtues and notwithstanding its great defects, then we are able to tell its tales so that our young people will profit by it without any danger that it will hurt their higher idea of God or their better moral views. For then only shall we be true in what we tell.

And this, so it seems to me, is the first, the sole condition for doing well when using the mythical elements of the Old Testament. Be true, tell the biblical tales just as you should tell a fairy tale, without any endeavor to conceal the improbabilities, the contradictions, even the shocking incidents, at least as far as they do not awaken immoral passions.

Tell the history of paradise, but introduce not the serpent as the devil, and don't hesitate to relate that the Lord God made for Adam and for his wife coats of skins and clothed them; nor that he sent them forth from paradise lest they take also of the tree of life and then wholly become like God. Sketch Abraham as a genuine, pious man, but tell also as plainly as the Bible itself how Jehovah paid him a visit in his tent and ate Sara's cakes as he was on the way to Sodom to see whether they did there indeed according to the report of it which came unto him. If you dare to tell of the wrestling of Jacob with God, then don't make a nightmare of it, don't metamorphose God into an angel or unknown man. Let it be Jehovah himself, but give simultaneously the sublime meaning of this myth, that God wrestles in the night of life with every man and that nobody finds his peace before this unknown power, which hurts him and seems to ruin him, is recognized by him as the holy power of love, which will strengthen him by wrestling and which therefore he will not let go, except it bless him. Tell something of the intimate conversation of Gideon with Jehovah before his battle with Midian; do not conceal the ephod he made of the golden ear-rings of the killed after the victory, but emphasize in your narration the great truth that 300 brave men are of more worth than 3,000 cowards. Sketch the grand and noble character of Moses, but don't conceal that Jehovah appeared to him as a fire and told him to use white lies to make his request to Pharaoh a success. Tell of the sufferings and the patience of Job, but don't hide the wager between God and Satan, of which in the poem all his pains were the consequences. Mark Elijah's heroic figure, but don't ignore the massacre of the 300 prophets of Baal, nor transform the still small voice on Horeb into the God of love.

Above all, never try to save the dignity of the Bible by shuffling away or still worse by palliating all which hurts our moral sense. Don't ever transform the heroes of the Bible into saints. If you are telling Jacob's dream of the ladder at his head from the earth into heaven, let them feel the glory and peace of this sense of the nearness of God; but tell them also that if we had to flee from the face of our father and brother because we deceived them, we should never get nor deserve such a dream, and explain this contradiction as a lack of delicacy of conscience in these Israelites of olden time. If you are speaking of the dreams of Joseph, don't be tempted by their apparent predictive power to be silent about the ugly arrogance and vanity which alone could suggest such dreams.

So I could go on with similar quotations, but my fifteen minutes will nearly be gone, and all I should wish to say would be repetition of the same theme. Be true, and your class will soon distinguish what in these mythical tales is story, what history, what temporary garment, what eternal truth, what superstition and error, what heroism and religious faith, what never to follow, and what exemplary for all.

This thorough development of the intellectual and moral sense of our young hearers will be the first fruit of this use of the mythical element in the Old Testament, let me say in the Bible. They will learn to understand poetry as the language of religion; they will learn to recognize great truths, even in ridiculous forms; learn to admire noble characters and golden deeds, even without the attraction of culture. And by thus appreciating the mythology of the Old Testament, their eyes will also be opened for the religious and moral value of the mythologies of other peoples.

But another result will be, that they never can be deceived any more about the true value of the Bible, and, therefore, never will be disappointed, nor even tempted to skepticism, when, by irreligious criticism, the presumed value of these Holy Scriptures gets lost. Every time when I read something of Mr. Ingersoll, or heard a lecture of one of his congenial freethinkers, Mr. Watts, I felt offended by the superficiality wherewith these orators derive their arguments against religion and Christianity, from the mythical elements of the Bible. But still more I was amazed by observing that the greater part of the audience applauded these arguments as though they were very weighty, yea, decisive. If these people had learned in their youth to acknowledge and to appreciate the mythical elements in the Bible, when they had learned to love the Bible, not for what the ecclesiastical creeds profess about it, but for what it is, all these arguments of Ingersoll could not affect them at all, could only show them how greatly these men want the development of their poetical, and of their historical sense. If the Bible was better understood by themselves, they also would know that its value consists, not in a presumed supernatural, but in its pure, human character; not in its metaphysics, but in its ethics; and they would never oppose biblical superstitions without preaching at the same time true love of the Bible, not only because of its moral lessons and its knowledge of human nature, but also of its childlike as well as manlike piety, of its sublime poetry, and ideal prophecy.

Resuming: How bring out the mythical elements of the Old Testament? Only by giving it as it gives itself. How to use it? By criticising it with intellectual, and especially with moral criticism, but above all, with a grateful heart for all the blessings we have derived ourselves from this never exhausted gold mine, and a strong desire to make all love it.

November Days.

As those we love give us a swift good-bye,

With thought that swift blows bear the least of pain,

Then turn, remorseful, to our sudden cry,

And hold us close, and kiss us o'er again —

So blessed Summer yields unto us now

With pitying haste in which her mantle fell;

O soft! oh tender! yet upon her brow

Sad premonition of a long farewell!

THEODORE PARKER'S

Lessons from the World of Matter and the World of Man.

Selected from Notes of Unpublished Sermons, by Rufus Leighton. Cloth, 12mo, pp. 480. reduced from $2.50 to $1.25.

"It has been a great comfort to me often to think that after I have passed away some of my best things might still be collected from my rough notes and your nice photograph of the winged words. The things I value most are not always such as get printed."—Theodore Parker to Rufus Leighton.

"This volume is by all odds the best one-volume introduction to the great preacher. Kindling passages caught on the wing by the stenographic pencil of an appreciative listener, they give the glow and the fire of one who dispensed both light and heat in days that were dark and chilly. The reduced price ought to give this perennial book a fresh lease on life and a new field. * * * The book contains one of the best portraits of Theodore Parker extant, good enough to be cut out and framed if the owner is willing to mutilate the book."—Unity.

This volume, edited by Mr. RUFUS LEIGHTON, was first brought before the public in 1865. It ran through several editions, but for a number of years has not been regularly upon the market. We have just concluded an arrangement with Mr. LEIGHTON by which we shall have the exclusive sale of the book. The price, originally $2.50, we have

REDUCED TO $1.25.

The book contains 430 large duodecimo pages, and is substantially bound in cloth. The general divisions of subjects are as follows: The Material World and Man's Relation Thereto, the Nature of Man, Traits and Illustrations of Human Character and Conduct, Phases of Domestic Life, Education, Human Institutions and National Life, the Power and Endurance of What is Noblest in Man, Human Progress, Jesus of Nazareth, Man in His Religious Aspect. Each of these divisions is subdivided into from seven to forty sections; for example, the chapter on Human Progress is subdivided as follows: Man to Make His Own Paradise, the False Idea of Man a Hindrance to His Progress, Man's Progress not by Miracle but by the Use of Natural Forces, Power of the Human Will Over Circumstances, the Necessity for an Ideal, Death a Blessing to Man, the Founders of New England—the True Way to Honor Them, the Prophecy of the Past to the Future, the Next Half Century.

The book is copyrighted, and no portion of it is accessible in any other form, except a single section which has been used in the recent volume published by the American Unitarian Association.

* * * The book is for sale in Boston at Roberts Brothers' Book Store, and may be obtained through the trade generally, or will be mailed on receipt of price ($1.25) by

From the unsatisfactory, incarnate negation of the Emersonian Don Quixote, with his foreground of sophistries, and his background of selfishness, it is a pleasure to turn to the old-fashioned, frank, plain Aphorisms of Mr. Towne, with their Baconian ring and stamp. They remind us of the time when men were simple, when they spoke commonly in grand sentences, and had not reasoned treachery into a virtue. * * *

In Mr. Towne's book there is no speaking according to precedent, no aim at tallying with a 'Cid.' Many of his Aphorisms are indeed the 'sum of long reflections,' and all of them are thought-provoking."—Unity.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Chicago.—The Monday noon meeting this week was led by Mr. Blake. Commenting upon the text: "There went forth power from him and healed them all," he said that while we must admit that there are mythical elements in these stories of healing, it is going too far to deny that Jesus had power of this kind. The perfect and beautiful body of Jesus no doubt made it an open gate for such influences as are described as "power" or "virtue," which went forth from him to the help of others. The new school of so-called metaphysicians, who are chiefly peculiar in supposing that they have discovered something new, recognize and use this power for healing. Mr. Blake then went on to make some comments upon the so-called Sermon on the Mount. There are discrepancies and differences between Luke's record of this sermon and that given by Matthew. We have more of this material massed in Matthew, while in Luke it is distributed and also in Mark. We find the passages in regard to the salt, the straight path, and the Lord's prayer in other places in Luke separate from the rest of the discourse. Is this one sermon? Some think Luke abridged the sermon. Another view is that both Luke and Matthew collect brief utterances into one discourse. Some urge that the sermon was delivered twice, since Matthew says it was given on the mountain, while according to Luke, Jesus had come down from the mountain and stood on the plain. The more probable view is that each has brought together sayings that have some thought-relationships, but not all given at one time. The differences in the beatitudes were commented on. In Luke there is an absolute absence of all spiritual qualities which we find in Matthew. Some think Luke invented the woes. It is more likely that the old Jewish idea of blessing and cursing standing opposed to each other had much to do with these curses to match the blessings. See Deut. xi., 26-27, and Joshua viii., 33-34. As throwing some light upon "Woe unto you that are rich," the sect of Ebionites was referred to. One of their doctrines was that those who have the good things in this life will not have the good things in the life to come, but there the poor will have the riches—as Luke illustrates in the story of the rich man and Lazarus.

Boston Notes.—Last Sunday evening Mr. Charles I. Hurd was ordained as minister-at-large at the Parmenter street chapel, situated in the ward of our city in which possibly a "Toynbee Hall" may be built. Rev. M. J. Savage preached the sermon on the old and the new theories of man's relation to God. Rev. E. J. Gerry and W. J. Haywood preceded Rev. Mr. Hurd in this field of labor. It is the old ground formerly sown and harvested by Rev. Messrs. Beecher, Streeter, Jenks and Father Taylor.

—Nothing could exceed the enthusiasm which the address of Rev. Arthur M. Knapp created last Sunday evening in the hearts of the large audience of friends who gathered in the Second church to bid him good-bye. His mission to Japan will be strongly sustained here, and he is assured that his efforts in Japan will be warmly welcomed. The present is the chosen time to offer our liberal ideas in that country. A distrust of the ancient native religions is now very strong, while the educated people there are ready to throw more intellect into their acceptance of any new form than they ever before were. Our views rather than those of other sects promise a ready acceptance.

—James E. Murdock, the veteran elocutionist, eighty-six years old, recently gave before our Ministerial Union a reading of selections from old and new sermons. He shows no abatement from his early power in voice-tones and in distinct pronunciation of syllables. He is inspiring our ministers with a laudable ambition to be heard by their remotest listeners, both in sermon and in prayer, an accomplishment which, seeming easy, is really hard to attain.

Omaha, Nebraska.—It has been claimed by the enemies of the W. U. C. that societies working on the ethical basis, make no progress in philanthropy. Unity church, of Omaha, is on an ethical basis, and the ladies have just secured the money to build a "Crèche," with the intention of opening a day nursery, a kindergarten, a kitchen garden and home for children, whose parents are at work and wish a place where, for a small amount per week, their children can be boarded. They have secured the free lease of a city lot, the gift of a frame building now on the lot, and money enough to build a brick building in the spring. This is the best work which Unity church has yet done, and speaks well for the spirit which animates its members. While the movement is altogether unsectarian, the trustees of the Crèche are all connected with Unity church, the ladies of Unity Club will furnish the home, and it will really be under the control of this church.

Monroe, Wis.—Rev. G. W. Buckley, of Battle Creek, Michigan, has been called to the pulpit of the Universalist church in this place. Brother Buckley is an earnest and active worker, and his work will be upon the broad, non-dogmatic lines which are eventually to break down

"Green Pastures."

Words by W. C. GANNETT.

Music by GEORGE RUSSELL LEWIS.

1. Clear in mem-'ry's si-lent reach-es Lie the pas-tures I have seen;
2. More than one I count my pastures As my life-path grow-eth long;

Green-er than the sun-lit spa-ces, Where the May has flung her green:
By their qui-et wa-ters stray-ing Oft I lay me, and am strong.

Needs no sun and needs no starlight To il-lume these fields of mine, For the glo-ry
And I call each by its giv-er; And the dear names bring to them Glo-ry as from of dead fa-cies Is the sun, the stars that shine, Is the sun, the stars that shine.

shin-ing fa-cies In some new Je-ru-sa-lem. In some new Je-ru-sa-lem.

3. Yet, O well I can remember
Once I called my pastures pain;
And their waters were a torrent
Sweeping through my life again!
Now I call them Peace and Stillness,
Brightness of all Happy Thought,
Where I linger for a blessing
From my faces that are naught.

4. Naught? I fear not! If the Power
Maketh thus his pastures green,
Maketh thus his quiet waters,
Out of waste his heavens serene,
I can trust the mighty Shepherd
Loath none be ever led;
Somewhere yet a greeting waits me
On the faces of my dead!

EDITORIAL.

THE Northwestern Christian Advocate seems to be troubled about "soft-hearted ministers." Does our contemporary like the other adjective better?—the "hard-hearted" kind!

Littell's Living Age with the beginning of next year enters upon its forty-fourth year. In it the American reader finds the promptest and fullest reproduction of European thought. In no other shape can the reader find for the same amount of money so much current thought by high thinkers.

UNITY adds its congratulations to many others to the Universalist Publishing House at Boston, that has recently celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary. It has, during this quarter of a century, promulgated a cheerful gospel and done much to bring about the time when it requires considerable hardihood on the part of the most orthodox to frankly confess a belief in the most impious of doctrines—that of eternal punishment. That time now is.

AN announcement was made at the recent Sunday-school Institute which was a surprise to many, namely, that a Unity school of religion and morals is to be held in Chicago this winter. There will be courses of lectures, twelve lectures to a course, on the various topics of a divinity and ethical curriculum, such as the Old Testament, the Gospels, the Epistles, Ethics, Charities and Corrections, Theism, Philosophy and Growth of Religion, Religious History, etc. These subjects will be divided among lecturers, who are specially qualified for them. At least one lecture will be given each day, and then time allowed for questioning the lecturer fully. This opportunity will be brought within the reach of everybody. We shall be able soon to give the whole plan in detail.

THE Interior very strongly commends an article in the September issue of the Contemporary Review, written by Stuart Poole, the Librarian of the British Museum, entitled, "The Pentateuch, Theory and Facts." The article considers and annihilates the objectionable theory of the deconstruction of the main body of the Hebrew legislation was constructed after the return of the Jews from Babylon, for the purpose of clothing with his authority what Moses did not write and what was, in fact, contrary to his legislation—which virtually makes a greater part of the Hebrew law an enormous pious fraud.

THE threatened riots in London, it may be sure, have some roots that strike into misery, and some phases touched with pathos. The Illustrated London News, for November 12, contains some striking cartoons in proof of this assertion. Here are pictures of the homeless poor huddled together in Trafalgar square—men, women and children, pinched by hunger and clothed in rags, some in sleep and some in wakefulness, trying to reach another day of wretchedness. On the opposite page is a picture more pleasing: it is "the poor helping the poor"—a picture that is thus explained in the letter text.

On Tuesday week, there was an instance of "the poor helping the poor," of which we give an illustration. The costermongers of Whitecross street, hard pushed as they generally are to make a living, collected amongst themselves the sum of three pounds, and this was spent in the purchase of sixty gallons of tea and coffee, and several hundred rations of bread and cheese, which were distributed in Trafalgar square, during the small hours of the Tuesday morning, to a ravenously eager but perfectly orderly crowd of between four and five hundred persons, who formed in line beneath the balustrade, and were marshalled along to the east side of the square, where the distribution took place. It was evident from the manner in which most of the poor people devoured their portions that they were in a condition little short of starvation; and the kindly fellows who made the distribution were careful to give an extra quantity of bread and cheese to those whose appearance denoted the direst extremity of poverty. Some there were who certainly did not seem to be in very urgent want, but, indeed, very much the reverse. No applicant, however, was refused; and the generosity of these humble benefactors of their poorer brethren was enhanced by the kindly and unostentatious way in which the act of charity was performed.

THE Christian Union and the Presbyterian have been discussing the question, whether an Arian can unite with a Presbyterian church, of course without ceasing to be an Arian. And now the Interior takes the subject up, and says that there is a whole sect of Arians (the New Lights or Christians), who "would join heartily in singing any of our hymns of praise to the Lord Christ, and in praying to him;" and that "there is no doubt that such people may be, and doubtless many of them are, genuine disciples of Christ." And the editor goes on to say, that a Session might feel bound to admit such Christians to the Presbyterian church, provided they would not seek to propagate their errors,—if they did, that they would have to stay outside,—and closes with this remarkable sentence: "In other words, a Christian may so deport himself as not to be fit to be a Presbyterian."

WE learn from The Advance that a mission for the conversion of Jews to Christianity has been established in Chicago. "The immediate impulse to this work was given by a visit to the city of Rev. Jacob Freshman, pastor of the Hebrew Christian church of New York. He is a converted Jew, the son of a Rabbi, who was brought to Christ by reading Prof. Delitzsch's Hebrew New Testament. It is proposed at first to have a reading-room supplied with Hebrew, German and English religious literature; the room to be open on Tuesday and Thursday evenings, and Saturday afternoon." Our Jewish brethren must indeed look to their laurels; and to us it seems the fair thing would be for them to institute, on the opposite side of the same street, a reading-room supplied with Jewish literature, preferably, of course, with many versions of the Old Testament, and in a quiet and sincere way endeavor to convert some Christians to the older faith.

ONE of the accepted tenets now held is, that cooking is a factor in industrial education. On that ground it has been introduced into the Boston public schools. It will become an important agent in temperance work, for, as one child expressed it, "Father doesn't drink now I can make fish-balls." As with sewing, the introduction of cooking is due to Mrs. Mary Hemenway, the tried friend of historical and practical education. Her means enable her to undertake experiments without that co-operation of others which so often becomes friction; and when she has demonstrated the success of her plans, she makes them over to the school committee, who gladly carry on her work. A little book dedicated to her by Mrs. Lincoln, its author, has just appeared, with an introduction by the superintendent of public schools. It is an explanation of the general principles of the nature of food, in connection with practical lessons in simple cookery. This "Boston School Kitchen Text Book" consists of a series of lessons which gives the reason why for everything; e. g., poultry is nutritious because it abounds in phosphates; stale eggs are light because the inside water has evaporated, air taking its place and changing the elements in the eggs. Each class is supposed to consist of fifteen pupils, who are house-keepers, cooks and students during two hours a week. There would not be so many dyspeptics in families if these lessons on reasons for cooking and on the chemical principles of food were remembered. We plead for good cooking as a preparation for ethics, or as a lesson in its virtues.

Editorial Wanderings.

Last week again the senior editor left UNITY to the tender mercies of his associates as he started on the Monday afternoon train for Boston. The objective point was a meeting of the council of the National Conference, who were to plan for the biennial session at Saratoga next September. There was a representative from St. Louis, one from Baltimore, one from New York city, one from Chicago and six of Boston. Wednesday was spent in the council room, to what effect the public must wait until September before they can judge. But there are many things a western man can do in Boston, even in a few hours: Greet his parishioners, who in this moving age turn up everywhere; see the most beautiful collection of etchings and engravings, and marvelous effective Braun photographs, taken directly from the Millet painting, at Doll & Richards', the most complete collection, we are told, yet made of this kind. There was an inexpressible pathos to us in noticing that so many sales are made of these representations of the pictures of the brave peasant, whose hand was oftentimes well nigh paralyzed with the poverty that doled out black bread to him while living.

There was time enough to hear one of the successful lecture-room talks by Mrs. Kate Gannet Wells, at Channing Hall, where we should judge over a hundred people came out on Thursday afternoon to hear her expound to an imaginary class of fourteen-year-old girls the text, "Blessed are they who do hunger and thirst after righteousness." By aid of blackboard and story she taught the lesson to the real class of grown-up men and women before her. It was another bit of institute work. Why should there not be more of this normal training, east and west? The exercises were introduced by a few moments' singing and responsive reading, led by the diligent and effective secretary of the Sunday-school society, Mr. Spaulding.

There was time enough for the senior editor to tell his Browning story to a goodly audience at the West church, in Salem, although it was put on Friday night instead of Thursday, thus calling into play telegraph and close plotting to make the home in time to be in the Chicago pulpit Sunday morning.

There was time enough to spend a night with our apostle of the types, Geo. H. Ellis, in his hospitable home at Walnut Hills, to ride over after supper three miles to look in on the Batchelors, all save the missionary. We found them looking well and happy enough to belong to Chicago still.

There was time enough not to get spilled out by the publisher's horse, who is afraid of shadows. Perhaps the fact that the editor of UNITY was aboard unconsciously quickened the timid imagination of this eastern steed.

There was time enough to look in upon the editorial family of the Register. Shayback sports a white necktie now instead of the flaming red of last summer, and consequently the dignity of the editorial position is conserved. There was time enough for a tea at the hospitable home of the Israels, at Salem, most loyal friends of our western work. Time enough to look in upon our western brother, Hunting, just coming out of a severe battle with diphtheria. He promises to be as good as new in a few days, and soon to be with us again, carrying our banner beyond the Mississippi.

There was time enough to study the signs of the times on board the train, to cultivate the acquaintance of an "LL.D.," whose name is well known by all those who know books, who finds little to interest him in the activities of the theologians, and does not seem to have very large use for preachers, as at present they ply their vocation. Another traveling companion was most profoundly interested in all the progressive problems of education, and an authority in some departments, but he seldom went to church. Still a third traveler, who did go to church, and taught a Sunday-school class, did not expect to find in church his intellectual stimulus or his thought companionships. Such intercourse as this, as the editor was rolling along in the "cannon ball" train made up of the marvelous vestibule cars of Pullman, turned the editorial musings upon the possible American church. The church that is to be born out of the needs and powers of American life, as the Catholic church was born out of the heart of Rome, and the Episcopal church from a combination of English forces; a church that will be a home to the thinkers of America, that will avail itself of the enthusiasm of the best; a church that will be as democratic in spirit as our government, where thought lines do not divide and where aims will be such as enlist to co-operation of the earnest and the competent irrespective of sect or sex lines.

The first snowstorm of the season could not be entirely ignored even by the "cannon ball" train, and it was an hour late, reaching Chicago at 10 o'clock Sunday morning in time for the editor to transform himself into the preacher and give the results of his musings on the American church in the pulpit of All Souls church at 11 A. M. Thus endeth another week of wanderings.

The British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

THE British and Foreign Unitarian Association have held their autumn meeting. Our problems seem to be their problems. Three of the most important papers were: The Social Life of our Churches; How to Increase the Usefulness of our Churches; Signs of Progress.

The first paper was fairly well discussed, the usual anxiety being expressed that members should be friendly and speak to strangers, and that meetings in sufficient abundance should be held.

In the second, the essayist, Rev. J. P. Bland, tried to make plain the error of trying to unite men upon a basis of doctrinal unity, of theological and intellectual agreement, rather than that of general usefulness and common beneficence. To increase the usefulness of our churches we must organize them more and more upon practical helpfulness to our fellowmen. He would ask men to join our church, not because they agree with us theologically, but to help their fellowmen; and he would leave them to their own views of God and Jesus Christ, and thus, he was sure, he was moving right in the line on which Jesus taught and lived.

Rev. H. W. Perris followed in strong sympathy. He wanted to see the Church of Humanity swallow up in a glorious victory the scattered and mutually antagonistic sects which to a large extent defame and disturb the essential idea of Christ himself, and he was proud to belong to that body who had acted as pioneers of the freest theological investigation, and as forerunners of that Church of Humanity after which he believed all the finest thinkers and philosophers of to-day to be thinking and aspiring. Rev. T. W. Freckleton, in his "Signs of Progress," said that he could remember when theology, dogmatism and metaphysical doctrine were sermon staples. It is not so now. If you listened to a Salvation Army man or a hallelujah lass preaching at the corner, you will hear something like this: You must fear God and keep the commandments; you must not drink; keep your children clean and decent; be a good neighbor and an honest citizen. The churches, call themselves by what name they will, are drifting in this direction. This is the tone too of all our modern literature that is worth knowing. Poets sing it, philosophers insist upon it and the best novelists write it. It is weaving itself into our political economy, and is the sentiment outside of the churches as well. And this seemed to be the key-note of the entire conference. The Sunday-school problem is still unsolved there. How to keep the children in the Sunday-school? How to graduate them from school to church? Whose duty is it to indoctrinate the child? How to interest the parents in the religious culture of the child—these seemed to be the momentous questions after all, and quite as unsolvable as any of the others. At this meeting the mission to Japan was discussed. Rev. T. L. Marshall said that he had no opposition to offer, but he thought that the whole question should be well weighed. Our missions in India have been failures notwithstanding the devotedness of Mr. Dall. We have accomplished nothing of importance at Madras. It is a mistake to send an ordinary missionary to a people so enlightened as the Japanese and the Buddhistic and Shino phrases of faith. These faiths have long been professed among them, have interesting points of contact with Christianity. Let us not impose a particular form of religion upon them from without, but encourage them to develop their own religion from within. They have shown a remarkable sympathy with western ideas. Encourage them to send their young men to our universities, put them in contact with our representative men and books, and let them carry this back to Japan.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

George Meredith.

No writer is attracting more attention in the literary world to-day than the English novelist, George Meredith. By the literary world we do not mean to include that vast army of readers who dissipate their minds over the ephemeral writings of Rhoda Broughton and "The Duchess." But we refer to that growing class of cultivated and critical novel lovers in this country and in England, who are always eager to welcome a new writer who has anything real to say to them. Even among this select class of readers, however, only the minority have learned to know and admire Meredith. The majority criticise him captiously, and some openly declare themselves unable to "get through" one of his ponderous volumes. Believing that the novels of Mr. Meredith will sometime occupy a position on our library book shelves not far from our George Eliot and our Thackeray, the present writer hopes for the privilege of introducing him to some western novel readers.

It is a trifle disheartening to the young literary aspirant to learn that for thirty years this author has been knocking at the door of popular favor, and that only now, when his hair is streaked with iron-gray and his frame bent with years, is he beginning to collect even a small audience. This is discouraging, because the demand for mediocre fiction is so universal that it would seem well-nigh impossible that the brilliant novels of a great writer should have been passed by with only a sneering comment. "A conglomeration of a treatise on psychology, a study of epigrams, and a hotch-potch of pretentious phrases," said a Chicago newspaper of one of his best novels a short time ago. Our own acquaintance with these novels began five years ago. At a dinner party in Boston, conversation turned into a discussion concerning the respective merits and demerits of Mr. Howells and Mr. James as novelists. A bookish man and clear lawyer at the table announced himself as unable to interest himself in the stories of either of these popular writers. "My favorite novelist," added he, "is George Meredith; his novels are brilliant and philosophical; they spoil my taste for our flashy American novels."

After a pause at the table several present said they had never heard of George Meredith; and although all professed themselves to be familiar with current literature, no one had read anything he had written, and only one or two persons there had ever heard his name mentioned before. We are apt to hold the comfortable theory that a good novel is almost certain of receiving instant recognition, and recall the prompt honors which George Eliot's first story, "The Sad Misfortunes of Amos Barton," received, and the brilliant success of Sir Walter Scott's anonymous novel, "Waverley," to prove the correctness of our hypothesis. But we lay down "The Ordeal of Richard Feverel," our hearts throbbing with tender emotions, our intellects stimulated, and our fancy glowing with the writer's wonderful word-pictures, to find to our surprise that this novel was written and published as long ago as 1859.

Thackeray was born in 1811, George Eliot in 1822, and George Meredith in 1828. These three writers are therefore contemporaries. The success of the first two crowded the third to the wall. Thackeray may at times be discursive and prosy, but his worst enemies have never called him obscure; and there are very few of George Eliot's profound criticisms on life which require to be read twice before they can be understood. But George Meredith received his education in Germany, and acquired there many obscure forms of thought and expression. His English style is so peculiar that it is almost like a dialect or "jargon," and the reader must become accustomed to his mannerisms before he will be able to endure his books. It sometimes seems, as in the preface to the Egoist, as if Meredith had sought to repel readers instead of trying to attract them. His books appeal to that class of thoughtful readers who love George Eliot and Thackeray, but they demand of the reademore close attention and more careful thought than either of these popular writers. George Meredith has been called "a prose Browning," and he requires much the same kind of study and mental effort that Browning does to be comprehended. His writings are, however, well worth any labor we may spend upon them. They can not be read hastily, for every sentence in his three greatest novels, "The Ordeal of Richard Feverel," "Diana of the Crossways" and "Beauchamp's Career" deserves to be digested. To be "veraciously historical, honestly transcriptive," is Meredith's ideal for the novel. "Philosophy," he tells us, "bids us see that we are not so pretty as rose pink, not so repulsive as dirty drab; and that instead of everlastingly shifting these barren aspects, the sight of ourselves is wholesome, bearable, gratifying, finally a delight." This "sight of ourselves" is what Meredith gives us in all his books. Those who believe it is "wholesome" and never hesitate to face the truth, will profit from Meredith's writings as they do from Browning's. But those who agree with the English critic who, while praising Haggard's stories, says "I, for one, vote for the impossible in fiction and put away the real as it deserves," will not find any satisfaction in the novels before us. They have in them all the comedy and tragedy, the gaiety and the sadness, the pathos and the sinfulness of the every-day life of this great chaotic world we live in. Nothing human is alien to this writer. He is not afraid of exposing to his readers' gaze vice in its most seducing forms or virtue in its homeliest dress. Some passages in "Diana of the Crossways" and in "Richard Feverel" are so coarse as to be almost revolting; and yet the tendency of both these books is aggressively, almost painfully moral.

A slight sketch of the plot and purpose of "The Ordeal of Richard Feverel," which was Meredith's second prose work, may interest readers who have not thus far been tempted to take up any of his books. We must warn the would-be student of Meredith, first, that "The Ordeal of Richard Feverel" is one of the old-fashioned three-volume novels. It has been republished in this country in one volume of four hundred and seventy-two pages, and it is exceedingly solid reading. It might have been called "Fathers and Sons," for the problem it presents is one which Turgenieff grappled with some years ago, and one which is renewed in almost every family when the sons develop into strong individuals, and yet do not walk in the way of their fathers. The young man, Richard Feverel, was the son of Sir Austin Feverel, a theoretical baronet, who loved his son fondly, but wished to rear him on a certain carefully thought-out system of his own invention. The young Richard is introduced to the reader when he was a mere boy, and some of his youthful pranks are told in order to show us that the boy was father to the man. He was passionate and impetuous, full of noble as well as of base impulses, and intensely hard-headed and obstinate. He was a boy who could have been led by love, never driven by parental authority. The baronet, who is in many respects a strong and admirable character, loved his system better than his son, and, because of his allegiance to it, brought his son into misery and despair. Sir Austin, like many another father, preferred to fit his son to his system rather than enlarge his system to include his son. The writer lets the reader see half a dozen instances when, had Sir Austin given up his system and turned his attention to understanding and sympathizing with his son, he could have easily gained Richard's confidence and saved him much suffering. But content with showing us how the course of events might have been changed had Sir Austin's system been more elastic, the novelist lets them pursue their unrelentless course. The end is grimly tragic—a young life wrecked unnecessarily.

"The little more, and how much it is,
Oh, and the little less, and what worlds away!
How a sound shall quicken content to bliss,
Or a breath suspend the blood's best play,
And life be a proof of this!"

in "By the Fireside," describes one or two of the fatal meetings between the father and the son. Only such "a little more" was needed to bring the two into sympathy, but that "little more" never came, and they drifted miles and miles apart. Every step of Richard's downward career is sketched vividly by Meredith. He gives us situations which Thackeray would have shrunk from handling, and which only the sincerity of the author's purpose make endurable. But he also gives us exquisite love-scenes, chapters which are perfect poems in their display of the writer's graceful fancy. With a delicacy of touch which is rare and fascinating, he describes Richard's first meeting with Lucy—his future wife. "The little skylark went up above her, all song, to the smooth southern cloud lying along the blue; from a dewy copse standing dark over her nodding hat the blackbird flitted, calling to her with thrice-mellow note; the king-fisher flashed emerald out of green osiers; a bow-winged heron traveled aloft, seeking solitude; a boat slipped by her, bearing a dreamy youth; and still she plucked the fruit and ate and mused, as if no fairy prince were invading her territories, and as if she wished not for one, or knew not her wishes. Surrounded by the green shaven meadows, the pastoral summer buzz, the weir-falls thundering white amid the health and beauty of wild flowers, she was a bit of human life in a fair setting—a terrible attraction." Besides a microscopic analysis of the various emotions of the father and the son in this novel, and several excellent portraits of fashionable English women, the writer has drawn for us an excellent and life-like picture of the old nurse, Mrs. Barry. Her sayings are, many of them, as quotable as Mrs. Poyser's. She is a fat and florid person, of homely manners and homely wit, but with all the homely virtues as well. There is no trace of cynicism in Meredith's portrait of this good old motherly soul. Her human qualities make a strong foil for Adrien's cynical Epicureanism. It is said by some critics that Meredith groups his characters artificially. That is, he prefers to choose and place in juxtaposition characters which attract and repel each other according to psychical laws. These psychical forces Meredith has studied more deeply than either George Eliot or Thackeray. Every one of his novels is an illustration of their force. The moral of "Richard Feverel" the writer gives in these words: "Sir Austin wished to be Providence to his son. If immeasurable love were perfect wisdom, one human being might almost impersonate Providence to another. Alas! love, divine as it is, can do no more than brighten the house it inhabits; must take its shape; sometimes intensify its narrowness; can spiritualize but not expel the old life by lodgers above stairs and below."

Sentences like this, full of ripe and natural wisdom, make Meredith valuable reading. He can be pithy and practical as well as grave and philosophical. In one page he will rave with some of Carlyle's ire against "The religion of comfort," which, he says, "is the central thought of the vast English middle class." "It is their idea of necessity, their sole aim; whatever ministers to comfort, seems to belong to it, pretends to support it, they yield their passive worship." In another page there will be a description of natural scenery, which will suggest Wordsworth or even Shelley. A high kind of pantheism is Meredith's substitute for religion. The voice of God speaks to him through nature. None of his characters, save perhaps Beauchamp, could be called heroes or even stand for ideals of conduct; but the reader feels that in Meredith's mind there is an ideal for each of them against which he is silently measuring them.

A "hatred of the sham decent" and derision of sentimentalism are part of the writer's gospel. Many of his men and women are unconscious hypocrites. They often err from lack of self-knowledge.

Where in modern fiction shall we find a more subtle delineation of character than Sir Willoughby, the egoist? A more perfect type of incarnate selfishness never before appeared in print. George Eliot has drawn for us an absolutely selfish woman in Rosamond Vincy; but it was left for Meredith to create a perfectly egoistic man—self-complacency, vanity, arrogance, and conceit are displayed in every action of Sir Willoughby's life. The other characters in this extraordinary novel are excellent foils to this chief creation; they show him off in his most glaring colors. There is no action in "The Egoist." The reader's interest depends entirely on the writer's skillful analysis. Perhaps no one person ever existed who was Sir Willoughby's prototype, for he combines in his personality all possible phases of egotism; but he has no characteristic which can not be found in some of our friends and neighbors. He is, so to speak, "a composite photograph."

It would take many pages to adequately describe Meredith's women. Most of them are volatile creatures of pure impulse. He never gives us a noble creation like "Romola" or "Dorothea." His heroines are beguiling, soft bits of flesh and blood made up of "whims, variations, inconsistencies, wiles, and tremblings between good and naughty." They lack intellect, dignity and consistency of character. Their influence over men always rather smacks of the sensuous. In his desire to be strong and masculine in his portraits of men and women the writer is, as we have said, not infrequently coarse. His men regard women as their "natural prey", and there is a brute strength about them which makes them seem to belong to a less civilized century than this one. In "Diana of the Crossways" Meredith gives us a beautiful and a charming woman, but she rarely succeeds in commanding men's respect, but always arouses their passions. If the relationship between men and women in England is such as Mr. Meredith describes it society sadly needs purifying.

The novel reader who can not find pleasure and profit from reading "The Ordeal of Richard Feverel," "Beauchamp's Career," "Diana of the Crossways," and "The Egoist," may justly suspect the breadth of his own literary taste. They are not milk for "babes and sucklings," but strong meat for men and women. Each of these books increases our knowledge of human nature and our sympathy with it. They are the portrait gallery of a great artist. Almost every sentence contains not only a fact but an epigram. Where an ordinary writer would have one idea Meredith has a dozen. His books are crowded with characters, with scenes and with witty epigrams. "Chaotic bursts like stormy billows pressing impetuously for expression" seems to exactly express Meredith's mental state.

It was said of Sir Walter Scott that no man ever wrote so many volumes with so few sentences which could be quoted. This is not so with Meredith. The reader who, pencil and note-book in hand, takes up one of his books will be amazed at the quantity of gems he finds which deserve a place in a dictionary of quotations. Apothegms such as "A gentleman with the polish scratched off him in parts," "He took nibbles of golden meaning by installments," "He has drunk Latin like vital air, and can quote what he remembers of Homer, but how has he been fortified for this tremendous conflict of opening manhood which is to our life here what is the landing of a soul to the world to come?"—apothegms like these we meet in every page of his books.

Critics may justly call Meredith verbose; they may call him coarse, and they may object to his "rabid realism;" but no thinking reader can ever deny his intellectuality, his profound knowledge of life, his great philosophical gifts and his sparkling fancy. He wrestles deeply with life's problems, he has a joyful sympathy with all that is beautiful in the sensuous world, and he looks hopefully out into the future, believing that "there is nothing the body suffers that the soul can not profit by."

It is said that in the early stages of intellectual development man only needed to see action, something going on, that a little later he reached a standpoint when he desired to be made to feel; but that the man of complete refinement asks to be led to reflect. Now, George Meredith carries his reader through all these evolutions. There are scenes in his novels which remain as vividly in our minds as any performance we have ever seen at the theater; there are soul tragedies which arouse our highest and deepest feeling, and, above all, there is a powerful and profound application of ideas to life. This last is what Mr. Matthew Arnold says gives a man the highest claim to superiority in literature.

Well Done.

I.

"Well done." So said the master to his servant,
 When within his hand
 He laid the talents multiplied by thrifty
 Care of fruitful land,
 Or safe investments in the marts of traffic,
 Or where interest drew
 Its just returns to him who faithful sought it,
 And became its due.
 "Thou hast been faithful," said the loving master,
 "O'er things few and small,
 And I will make still greater thy possessions,
 Go, thou, rule them all."
 Not so, full oft, comes such reward to virtue,
 Rather, hate and scorn;
 Nailed to a cross, or wearing crown of martyr,
 Pierced with a thorn;
 Or in forgotten grave doomed to lie buried.
 Happier far is he
 Who patient sows through toilsome years, and golden Harvests lives to see.

II.

Such is thy due, O, true and faithful teacher,
 For thy work is done.
 Well done, the master saith, and thy reward is Only just begun;
 The widening circles round and round thee gather,
 With an outward flow
 That reaches to the boundaries of infinitude;
 And with them go
 The measureless results of thy long toiling.
 This thy true reward.
 E're long our chaplet fades; our praise is silent;
 And our watch and guard,
 Perforce give o'er; but age to age repeating,
 While it onward rolls,
 The story of thy noble life unfolding
 Shall tell unborn souls.

T. P. WILSON.

Deathless Effluence and Influence.

"If a man die shall he live again?" "The spirit shall return to God who gave it." It is a most important and serious fact, that whether we will it or not, we shall continue to live on in future generations, in the persons of others. The persons who have most character, good or bad, are most immortal in this sense. Homer, Socrates and Plato are, even now, by the thoughts uttered many centuries ago, still living, and moulding human thought. Socrates and Aurelius, by their intelligence and virtue, have attained a life "unto the ages of the ages." Nero, by his crimes, lives on "to shame and everlasting contempt." Great souls exert a great power for ages upon the world, others exert only a local, a neighborhood, force; and the memory of the good and of the evil lingers in the tales and is reproduced in the lives of the people. Not in our own offspring only, but in all who know us, and in those who shall know of us, do we live again. The atmosphere, spirit—spiro, I breathe,—or influence of our lives is, consciously or unconsciously, inbreathed by those among whom we live. Can there be to the good a more comforting thought than this? Can any faith more effectually urge to the noble deeds of a noble life?

THE UNITY CLUB.

Unity Clubs and the Devotional Life.

The mention of this topic meets with a doubtful reception apparently, because of the question whether or not the oil of devotion and the water of amusements will mix.

If it be assumed that the Unity Club is to be a purveyor of amusements for the purpose, it may be, of raising money for religious purposes, there is good reason for doubtfulness whether or not it may be an injury rather than a benefit to the spirit of religious devotion. Whatever innocent purposes the common popular amusements may serve they can hardly be commended as aids to devotion. Our people are learning that the revenue of amusements is a poor dependence for the maintenance of worship. Religion is entitled to direct support for its own sake.

But a better understanding of the true purpose of the Unity Club movement removes objections of this character. It is an attempt to direct the studies and social energies of our people, more especially young people, toward the higher literary pursuits. Religion has what has been well called its "literary interpretation." The spirit of devotion has its literary expression. The Bible itself is ample illustration of this. But it is by no means the only book which contains devotional sentiment. If a reading circle, study class, or Unity Club—for the name is of little consequence, if the thing is not wanting—shall accept the excellent guidance of W. C. Gannett's "Studies in Longfellow," the "Psalm of Life" is sure to be found; and the longer psalm of life which runs through his works. "The Ladder of St. Augustine," "The Children of the Lord's Supper" and multitudes of passages throughout his poems, will inspire devotional feeling. These can hardly fail to lead to the study of the hymns of Samuel Longfellow, the brother, and one of the noblest of living hymn writers.

Whittier is eminently a poet of the inner life of religious devotion, and if we follow the tutorship of "Unity Outlines" it is sure to lead us to a consideration of what the author calls "My Psalm," of "Our Master," of "The Eternal Goodness"—all deeply devotional. The poem entitled "Our Master" has the fullness of lyrical devotion which has supplied two hymns for our hymn book, one of which begins with the lines—

"Immortal love forever full, Forever flowing free;"

and the other:—

"O love! O life! Our faith and sight, Thy presence maketh one."

In "My Psalm" we find the hymn:

"All as God wills who wisely heeds,
 To give or to withhold;
 And knoweth more of all my needs,
 Than all my prayers have told."

And not only in such authors do we find the breathing of devotional feeling. Doubtless multitudes have sung Sir Walter Scott's noble hymn,—

"When Israel, of the Lord beloved,
 Out from the land of bondage came,
 Her father's God before her moved,
 An awful guide of smoke and flame;"

without feeling the beauty of its setting in his great novel. When we have heard this sung by Rebecca, in "Ivanhoe," we never afterward lose our love for the hymn. The form of its introduction will recur to us when we read in Whittier's "Tent on the Beach," another hymn of as pure lyrical devotion as can be anywhere found :—

"The harp, at nature's advent strung,
Has never ceased to play;
The song the stars of morning sung
Has never died away."

Should Browning seem generally obscure, the story of "The Boy and the Angel" will very plainly tell us of a boy with a curly head, who, in the midst of common duties and tasks, sang "Praise God," with such sweetness that heaven felt a want when that boy's voice was silent. We can also understand the representation that the great praise of the Pope in St. Peter's was not so dear to the ear of God as that boy's song.

The supposition that the intellectual and the devotional life are entirely separate, is not verified in the authors who have been prominently introduced to us in Unity Club studies. Man is a unit, and we may think of one or the other elements of that unit, but they are all related, and "members one of another." The devotional flame may be fed by literary pursuits. The Methodists have been thought to be full of the spirit of devotion, of an emotional form of piety. And it is interesting to note that members of this denomination have been prominently identified with the management of the Chautauqua Reading Circle. All praise to them. The intelligence born of literary pursuits may rationalize but cannot be a hindrance to piety.

LYMAN CLARK.

REV. GEORGE W. COOKE, of Dedham, Mass., is to give his course of four lectures on the "Intellectual Development of Woman," before the Peabody Institute, in Baltimore, early in February, after which he proposes, if arrangements can be made, to extend his lecture tour westward. Mr. Cooke's literary and critical ability is too well established to need commendation from us. His three books, on George Eliot, Emerson, and Poets and Problems, have taken rank among the best critical writings in American literature, and we trust many of our Unity Clubs, Women's Clubs, and Study Classes will avail themselves of this opportunity of giving to their communities the careful results of diligent study upon subjects that have timely significance in these days. The following are the titles of the lectures: 1. The Literary Women of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries. 2. Dr. Johnson and the Literary Women of the Eighteenth Century. 3. Harriet Martineau and Her Contemporaries. 4. George Eliot and the Literary Women of To-day. Mr. Cooke's terms are very reasonable, and western engagements can be made through the UNITY office, by addressing the senior editor.

REV. A. J. BEAVIS, of Iowa City, asks us to call attention through these columns to the Swiss Cross, a monthly periodical devoted to the interests of the Agassiz Association of America. Its publishers are doing real missionary work in offering to the young people of this country so valuable a magazine of science at so low a rate as $1.50 per annum. He also authorizes us to say that those sending him the money before the close of this year can procure a subscription for the year for $1, and that he will send sample copies to any address, sending two cents for postage. Mr. Beavis has long and successfully been identified with the work of the above association, and one of the attractions of the Unitarian church over which he presides is the room of the Agassiz Association, a delightful phase of Unity Club work which deserves imitation.

THE HUMBOLDT Unity Club has its calendar published, with dates and parts assigned. Seventeen nights on Shakespeare, ten of them given to "Coriolanus," and seven to "Much Ado About Nothing." These studies are to be alternated with miscellaneous evenings in which are to be discussed such topics as "Corporal Punishment in School," "Capital Punishment," "Qualifications for the Ballot," "Ireland and Home Rule," the "Jury System," etc.

SOME of the most faithful members of the Unity Club of Sioux City, Iowa, are from the Episcopal and Presbyterian churches.

THE STUDY TABLE.

A Handbook to Dante. By Giovanni A. Scartavvini, translated from the Italian with Notes and Additions, by Thomas Davidson. Boston: Ginn & Co. Cloth, pp. 315.

This volume is divided into two parts, treating in part first of Dante's life, and in part second of his works. The first part has four chapters, treating of the bibliography of the subject in the first chapter, and then of Dante's life, divided into three periods, namely: from his birth to the death of Beatrice, 1265-1290; from the death of Beatrice to the death of the Emperor Henry of Luxemburg, 1290-1318; from the death of Henry VII. to that of the poet, 1318-1321. The second part, treating of his works, has four chapters, the first being devoted as before to the bibliography of the subject, this being divided into the bibliography of the Comedy and of the minor works. Chapter II. treats of the life in the works; chapter III. of the minor works; chapter IV. of the Comedy. This is a hand-book, a fact not to be forgotten, and a valuable fact for lovers and students of Dante in English. The writer says in his preface that he has prepared it to supply a want in English, no hand-book to Dante existing in that language calculated to give students the needful preparatory information historical, bibliographical, biographical and literary. For this purpose the author determined to translate, as he says, "the Dante Manual which finds most favor in Italy, which is the work of one of the best Dante scholars of our time, and which seems to me almost a model for a hand-book." The author has added notes of his own which are valuable, so that the book is really better than its Italian original. It is well made, the type being plain and of good size.

Studies in Musical History. By Louis S. Davis. New York and Boston: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Chicago: S. A. Maxwell & Co.

The scope of this little work of 160 pages may be gathered from the following from the preface:—"Since it is to the church that modern music owes its existence, it is from the history of the church that much of this volume is drawn. Music is but one of the effects of the great cause, the Christian church, and upon its rituals and institutions depended the fate of the whole tone system." The fourteen chapters treat of such subjects as Spirit of Jewish Music, The First Christian Hymn, The Mass, Choral, The Organ, Use and Influence of Bells, The Modern Song and Folk Lore. The author says, "The object of these chapters is not to elaborate but to condense, and by that condensation to present in a concrete form the active principles and causes which underlie musical history." The chapter on bells contains some curious matter and reflections, and states that "whether we regard the bell as an historical, ecclesiastical, architectural or musical agency, it occupies a prominence in the life of the past to which men of to-day are slow in according recognition." The style of the author is marked by warmth and enthusiasm.

Cicero's Tusculan Disputations. Translated with an Introduction and Notes. By Edward P. Peabody. Cloth, pp. 330. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.

Of this volume little need be said in a short notice, except to give it respectful greeting, and express pleasure in seeing Cicero in this new dress. For the place of the accomplished Roman is assured forever, and the ability of the accomplished scholar who has translated Cicero anew with few and brief but helpful notes, needs no commendation. It is beautiful to see a scholar in the closing years of a long and useful professional life turn back to the classics to convey his delight in them to English readers in this manner. In the introduction the following is quoted from Erasmus' preface to his edition of the same work: "When we see Pagans making so good a use of leisure so sad as Cicero's, and instead of seeking the distraction of frivolous pleasures, finding consolation in the precepts of philosophy, how is it that we are not ashamed of our vain babbling and our luxurious living? I know not what others think; but for myself I confess that I cannot read Cicero on the art of living well without believing that there was in his soul a divine inspiration, whence these writings came."

Oliver Goldsmith: A Selection from his Works with an Introduction by E. E. Hale. Boston: Chautauqua Press. Cloth, pp. 287.

Doctor Hale says in his introduction to this volume that "Oliver Goldsmith is read wherever men read English; and, where he is read, he is almost always loved." An author of whom Washington Irving said that to him he owed the peculiar quality of his own style,—calling him master, in the words which Dante used in acknowledging his debt to Virgil,—must certainly be well worth reading, even in these days of many books. The selections in this volume are well made, including representative pieces from Goldsmith's prose and poetical works. It is an excellent introduction to a writer whose fame is growing with the lapse of time.

THE HOME.

"General Molasses."

It all came of the Revolutionary war! Yes, Willie's unpleasant experiences that winter came from those great and glorious battles which resulted in star-spangled banners and Fourth of July celebrations. The winter he was twelve years old brought him, as a Christmas gift, a "History of the Revolutionary War," dearly prized, yet a source of woe, for he lived in it day and night. The sun might shine—it mattered not; and his dreams were all of strife and bloodshed, drawing from his brother Tom, his unwilling bedfellow, the indignant remark, "That youngster thrashes the Britishers all over the bed, and I'll be hanged if I stand it much longer." He was an odd little chap, small and frail, with straight, light hair, blue, solemn eyes and inquiring nose, and a mouth around whose childish curves a world of thought lurked and lingered. Peaceable, but no coward, as his boyish friends could testify; resenting an insult with all his puny might, he yet loved not contact with their dirty fists, for he dreamed of more glorious wounds than those healed by the application of brown paper and vinegar. A mighty spirit ruled that fragile body, and within his own snug corner he would sit for hours poring over warlike deeds, especially those of our heroic forefathers, while his eyes would flash and his heart would throb as he imagined himself mounted on a foaming steed, dashing down the rocky mountain slopes like brave Israel Putnam, or sweeping over the breastworks at Stony Point as "Mad Anthony Wayne" in the face of bayonet and blazing cannon; but on, on to victory! Absent-minded at all times, his young friends were teasingly aware of his peculiarities and always on the watch for new developments, and that particular winter his wandering wits were never-failing fun for them and two tall brothers and a petticoated atom of a sister, whose hoydenish ways were a terror to her mother and friends. "That girl should have been the boy" was a familiar sound to her ears. Ah! if those wise ones had only known how devoutly she wished she had been born a boy,—whose freedom of trowsers over forbidden fences and joy of unwashed hands were a constant source of envy,—they certainly would have refrained from fostering the sense of injury which fed her soul.

Oh those brothers and that sister! How they tormented Willie's young life while the glamour of the Revolution hung about him. Errands on various pretexts, always resulting disastrously, met him at every turn, and his only solace was the imaginary world in which he lived, fought and bled with exalted soul.

One morning he sat as usual, his book upon his knees, his fancy glowing with the roar of cannon, beating of drums, and rattle of musketry which quite extinguished the motherly tones calling to him to "run to the nearest grocery and buy some molasses."

He sat entranced until his long-suffering parent appeared before him with floury hands and indignant voice, exclaiming, "Why, Willie, I never saw such a boy! I want some molasses immediately. Bridget forgot to order it this morning. Go quickly; my cake is waiting," handing him as she spoke a dollar bill.

The smoke of battle cleared away as he rose to his feet smiling, for he was a sweet-tempered little fellow, and loved his mother dearly. Jug in hand he carefully hid from certain domestic vandals his precious history and started down the street. He ran around the first corner, but soon his feet moved less rapidly, as the fascinating picture of Lord Cornwallis abjectly presenting his sword to the Continental leader rose before his visionary mind. On he went slowly, the commanding tones of America's great patriot echoing in the air, and line upon line of veteran faces rising before him, while the flag of freedom waved grandly over all. In a lucid moment he spied several rivulets of molasses trickling down the jug. His sense of neatness was offended, and he thrust his hand first into one pocket and then into another in search of slate sponge or stray example paper, which he would have been pleased to see performing menial office. His fingers closed at last about a small piece of paper which answered his purpose nicely, and flinging it carelessly aside he walked on, again reveling in those warlike sights and sounds which thrilled his soul. As he neared the grocery, mentally brandishing his glittering blade at the head of a column of infantry, he dropped the jug and suddenly recollected his errand of peace. Into his pockets his hand went for his money—it was not there! He searched again and again, but the dismal fact remained—the dollar bill was absent!

At last it flashed across his now collected mind that he had disposed of his wealth by the wayside; so, turning back, he luckily found it, clinging to a vagrant stone, yellow as the Tiber, and sticky as sin. Eying it ruefully, he wondered if it would be received as legal tender. There was no water at hand to remove the sticky mixture and he stood perplexed. A happy thought struck him! He looked around. Apparently no prying eye was near, so—must I record so ignoble a deed of this valiant leader of victorious armies?—he raised it to his lips, and licked it clean. As he handed it over the counter to Mrs. Tubbs she said crossly, "Young man, this is just too sticky." His heart quaked, but he said to himself, "General Washington wouldn't have cared," and straightening himself up looked in her face with calm disdain. She glanced at him suspiciously, but said nothing further, and her small customer received his change and left quickly, hoping none of "the boys" had been spying about. Alas, vain hope! As he emerged from the store a voice greeted him with "Halloo, General Molasses." This was ignominy indeed. A fellow imp had seen and heard unobserved, and poor Willie retreated homeward, frowning, and striving to parry the thrusts of his grinning tormentor.

Soon the exploit of "General Molasses" was noised about the neighborhood, and for many a day Willie's title clung to him. In vain our small warrior battled in his own defense. In vain his big brother, taking pity, threatened dire vengeance on the enemy—it was long ere "General Molasses" was lost to fame.

That famous history still lives, but Willie is big William now, growing bald and fat in the busy whirl of a great western city. Dollar bills are abundant, and the shape of a molasses jug probably floats vaguely through his mind, but there is one who smiles delightedly when she thinks of that sticky greenback and all the other quips and cranks of that funny, absent-minded little brother.

ON a sun-dial, which stands upon the pier at Brighton, is inscribed this hopeful line: "'Tis always morning somewhere in the world."

It is from out of our direst consternations, bravely met and well lived through, that the fairest blooms of our heart's Easter come.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Philadelphia.—This is the season of fairs I have heard of such in the Germantown, Independent, First and Camden churches.

—Mr. Ames delivered the first of the Institute addresses—"The Childhood of the World"—to an audience largely increased over the numbers of the preliminary meeting. Such study cannot fail to be happy, its whole drift being so clearly for the elemental truths in religion.

—The Emerson Circle of the Germantown church has taken up the thread of its past work. "Representative Men" comes first for reading this season.

—The Emerson Circle of the Spring Garden Society meets semi-monthly, on Saturday evenings. The same number of meetings are given Unity Club each month.

—The Ethical Association of the Camden church has doubled the number of its meetings, holding two where previously it had but one to the month. This body is to systematically take up the reading of Shakespeare.

—It is probable that Mr. Mangasarian and his people will soon have a church of their own. They now meet in St. George's Hall.

—Mr. Ames wrote a vigorous letter for a meeting of Independents just before the election. His reference to "rotten piety" is forgiven its want of elegance because of its eminent fitness in description of the sudden zeal of politicians here, who, in order to make people forget the unworthiness of their candidate, assumed against the Personal Liberty Leagues the exclusive virtue of Sabbatharian strictness.

Chicago.—Mr. Jones led the noon teachers' meeting last Monday. The text was Luke's version of Jesus' law of love and the Golden Rule. He began by showing that the sharp antithesis between the Old and New Testament which the Christian teachers have insisted upon, does not exist. The Old Testament has its precepts of love. The Golden Rule antedates Jesus in the literature of Judea, as well as in that of China. He read extracts from the Talmud in illustration. The discussion then turned upon the merits of the Jesus-principle of non-resistance. Is Tolstoi its true interpreter? Are his methods practicable? Most of those present thought the principle of non-resistance something to be attained to, but not realizable in the present. Others thought that the law of egoism was as permanent as that of altruism; that Jesus stated but one side of the law of life which would breed selfishness and imbecility in the recipient, and in the long run limit the power of the giver.

Quincy.—DEAR UNITY: Your Mr. Johnson, of the Associated Charities, was with us on Sunday (13th) to talk to the Quincy people respecting the principles and the work of the society which he represents. In the morning he occupied the pulpit of the Unitarian church, in the evening that of the Congregational church. Large audiences greeted him, and were greatly interested and edified by his wise, strong, inspiring discourses. It is certain that many got new ideas upon a subject which is but imperfectly understood, yet, which is getting to be of commanding importance in our social economics. Your Chicago people ought to send Brother Johnson out everywhere and often to do missionary work along this line of charity. He is an interesting speaker and master of his subject. Every city in the west ought to hear his message.

Merrill, Wis.—Rev. A. M. Somers has been working in this field for several weeks. An organization has been effected with the following bond of union, which we quote from a local paper:

"We, whose names are here recorded, join ourselves together, heart and hand, as members of the Unitarian church of Merrill, for the maintenance of a free, rational and liberal religion and worship, the study and practice of the intellectual, moral and religious virtues, for the promotion of truth, righteousness, reverence and charity among men; and we cordially invite to our fellowship all who sympathize with us in these purposes and co-operate with us in thus working for the welfare and elevation of humanity."

Humboldt, Iowa.—The Sunday evening calendar of Unity church for the year ending June 24, 1888, is before us, and like that of last year it is startlingly suggestive in the number of laymen and women it brings into requisition. Twelve evenings are occupied by members of the parish with lectures upon the most thoughtful topics. A word in a private letter says that the outlook of the parish is most hopeful all around.

Saginaw, Mich.—A series of twelve lectures on "Questions of the Day," is in progress at the Unitarian church of this place, one-half of the lectures being given by prominent business and professional laymen in the city.

Social Equilibrium

And other Problems, Ethical and Religious.

By REV. GEORGE BATCHELOR. These Essays relate to the many new questions of social and religious organization which have been foisted upon the modern mind by scientific discovery and economical progress. They do not attempt to offer a panacea for the many evils of social life, but simply to describe and discuss some of the causes of social unrest and religious disintegration. They are hopeful, positive, and constructive. Cloth, 12mo, $1.50. Published by George H. Ellis, Boston. Mailed to any address on receipt of price, by Charles H. Kerr & Co., 175 Dearborn St., Chicago.

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XX.]

CHICAGO, DECEMBER 3, 1887.

[NUMBER 14.]

EDITORIAL.

Woman's Work is the name of a new monthly venture, published in Athens, Ga. In the new south woman's word and work must have a conspicuous place, so we wish the paper "good speed."

In the article "Robert Browning on Immortality," on page 126 of a recent number of UNITY, a mistake occurred in putting the wrong line into quotation marks,—“Such love is too beautiful not to be true.” The line which should have been quoted occurs a few lines above,—

“Though delayed it may be for many lives yet.”

Justice is the name of a new four-page fortnightly, published in Syracuse, with S. L. Grumbine as proprietor, and Rev. J. C. F. Grumbine as editor. We know not how extensive are its plans or how long it may live, but while it lasts it evidently means to be heard on the liberal side of things. The name of the editor is not unfamiliar to UNITY readers. We welcome this new missionary with a great name. May its work be worthy of it.

GEORGE H. ELLIS has brought out a new edition of Mr. Savage's "Bluffton," a story largely based upon his own experience in his emigration out of orthodoxy into the liberal faith. The reappearance of this volume, which for some time has been practically out of print, Mrs. Woolley's "Love and Theology," and Mrs. Wells' new story, are all significant indications of the times. When the new thought kindles the imagination, inspires song and story, it is a sign that it is about ready to mould the life of communities.

No more significant meeting has been held during the year than the fourteenth annual convention of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, held at Nashville, November 16-21. Their work is multiform, wisely conceived and persistently pursued. There was Ramabai, from India, and Mrs. Tunstall, of the Cherokee tribe, with the distances between these two women completely bridged by interests and representatives. Truly Victor Hugo was right when he said, "The nineteenth century is woman's century."

UNITY's pages are so limited that we seldom indulge in personalities, however pleasant. But we should be unjust to its readers if we did not allow them to speak through its type their congratulations to our associate, William C. Gannett, in his marriage, and their welcome to her who henceforth is to share his interests, his labors and his joys. From this on it will be Mr. and Mrs. Gannett that will form a part of that ever enlarging and ever working family that in UNITY is to work for Freedom, Fellowship and Character in Religion.

THE following extract from an address made by our associate, H. M. Simmons, at a meeting recently held to organize the Minnesota Unitarian Conference, is of interest to all our readers and we are glad of the chance to slip it in editorially:

I trust the Conference will be true to the Unitarian name, and serve the One God in whom all nations and religions are one, by cultivating the feeling of unity toward all denominations around it, and among all the members within it. I hope we shall rise above our mental differences and spiritual indifference, and work together for peace and love in the religion of our land. And I hope especially that we shall forget the disturbing distinction of radical and conservative. Conservatism is good, and radicalism is good; but better than either is the bond that unites the two. Let us harmonize them. The little boy of the story, seeing two sisters playing a duet on the same piano, said it was too bad that they had to use one organ when their father was rich enough to buy two. I am glad that Unitarianism is rich enough to have organs for both its conservative and radical daughters; but I hope that this Minnesota Conference will be an instrument at which both sisters will sit together, and unite to make one music. I congratulate Mr. Effinger, who started this first Unitarian society in Minnesota, that he can now come back and see his church grown into a conference. I wish most heartily that Mr. Gannett, who was so long our only minister in the state, could be present also; for I am sure it would not only increase our pleasure, but add to the joy of his bridal month. And I hope the Conference will prove a bridal for us too; where the strength of manly thought and courage shall be wedded to the sweetness of womanly faith and feeling; where it can be said that "mercy and truth have met together, and righteousness and peace have kissed each other," and founded a holy family. May we long be members of this family; and when we are gone, may the Conference live on, to keep its golden wedding and see its children rise and call it blessed.

UNITY welcomes the new State Conference, the organization of which is announced in this issue, and sends its "All Hail" to Minnesota. Steadily, but most wisely, has the liberal cause been gathering unto itself strength in this great northwestern empire. There are many indications which lead us to expect that this last child of the Western Conference may be the healthiest and most vigorous of them all. We trust that from the start this conference will learn the economy and strength of self-reliance. There is money enough in Minnesota to sustain an efficient organizing agent without foreign aid, and there is work enough for such an agent to do. Brave Minnesota, yes, but needy Minnesota also; here is our hand.

To one sitting at the table of exchanges where he can glance at the organs of the various religious movements in the land, the indications that there is a tendency everywhere to drop dogmas, avoid disputes, and ignore differences, are most surprising, and to us, at least, most encouraging. The most conservative as well as the more radical churches yield to this tendency; orthodox as well as heterodox illustrate this spirit of the age, that seeks the essence of religion, truth, equity, right, duty, and right-wisdom. And this is no new movement. Through the ages the march of religion has been in this direction; it has always been protest upon protest, from Bible times to this. The warfare has been between priest and prophet; the latter may be burned, but like the phoenix they rise from their ashes, more alive than ever, and they will continue to do so.

"FOR SUBSTANCE OF DOCTRINE."—Dr. Noah Worcester, if not the son of a prophet, was himself a prophet. Neither was it as a young man that he saw visions, but only two or three years before his death he gave utterance to a striking prophecy which is even now receiving its fulfillment. In an article with the above heading, published in the Christian Examiner for January, 1835, in which the Yale method of conditional subscription to the creed is examined, Doctor Worcester says: "In regard to the [recently founded] Andover Institution, we have not a doubt that the time will come when its creed will occasion the same embarrassment that has been felt at New Haven, and when the New Haven policy may become necessary to save the Institution from ruin. We can hardly doubt that the present professors, and many others, would heartily rejoice, if they could see any way in which the New Haven policy could be fairly adopted at Andover, and obtain an approved establishment. . . . The time may be nearer than is now imagined, when it will be difficult to obtain well qualified professors who can conscientiously subscribe the creed of that institution, unless it shall be done in some modified form. . . . Such blindness [as was shown by the framers of the Andover creed] may justly be deplored; and we presume it will be deplored by many in less than fifty years." How exact the prophecy, "fifty years!"

RECENTLY the Minneapolis Tribune invited all the denominations, through the leading ministers of the city to present in its columns their fundamental beliefs. In response to this request, Mr. Simmons thus speaks for the Unitarian church:

The name Unitarian is said to have arisen in contrast with Trinitarian, and to have referred to the unity of God. This doctrine of divine unity has remained the fundamental one of Unitarian faith, but with its meaning ever deepening as history has traced the unity of nations, and science shown the unity of nature. To-day the doctrine has grown quite beyond its reference to the trinity, and declares the oneness, through all places and times, of that power called God.

This belief in divine unity involves a more practical one in human unity. If God is thus one and omnipresent, then his presence has halloed not only Palestine but all lands, not only the Hebrew but all races, not only the Christian but all religions. If God is thus one and infinite, then He was not only in Jesus but in other men, and is, as the apostle said, "Father of all, over all and through all and in all." If thus one in all and uniting all, then He is best seen and served in universal brotherhood. The unity of God has thus its best earthly meaning in the unity of mankind, and Unitarians believe that his best worship is in work to unite men.

Connected with these are other beliefs not at all fatal to former faith, but enlarging it.

Unitarians believe that Hebrew sages and saints were inspired—and believe besides that the same inspiration comes to the true men of every nation. They believe that the divine revelation ever continues through human reason and conscience; and that the advancing knowledge and thought and charity of the world are still adding to that endless Scripture, wherein all truth is "the law," and all human hopes are the "prophecies," and all aspirations "the psalms," and all love a "gospel" giving promise of eternal life.

Unitarians believe that Jesus was a son of God; and they, besides, believe his saying that every peacemaker is another, and the apostle's word that "every one that loveth is begotten of God."

Unitarians believe that God verily dwelt in Jesus; and they besides believe with the apostle that, "if we love one another, God dwelleth in us," too, and that whosoever "dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God and God in him." They believe that God's best name is Love, that he lived in the loving Jesus, and lives in all love, and is worshiped best by our love of each other. They believe that this human love, which is thus divine and therefore eternal, is the very aim of religion, far more important than any theological doctrine.

Unitarians, therefore, preach love, brotherhood, unity of spirit, and leave room for great diversity of opinion. Our church in Minneapolis is defined in its constitution as "a society where people without regard to theological differences may unite for mutual helpfulness;" and a like liberty is allowed throughout the denomination. Denomination is, however, hardly the right word, since Unitarians are not trying to establish one, but to spread principles that may unite all denominations. Believing in the right and duty of every one to think for himself, they have never used or formed a creed. Individual churches and larger conferences have often made statements of belief, but always with the preface that the statement is ever open to alteration and is not to be imposed on any or to be made a test of fellowship. From such a statement adopted by the Western Unitarian Conference at its meeting in Chicago the present year, the following extracts are taken.

And here follow extracts from the statement well known to our readers and obtainable as Short Tract No. 17, from this office.

Sunday-school Workers Among our Brothers and Sisters of the Liberal Faith.

Coming close upon the heels of the Unitarian Sunday-school Convention, a short account of the meetings of the Universalist Sunday-school Union, held recently on the north side of the city, may interest many readers of UNITY. We can, however, be conveyers but of the drippings, as it were, of the treat, being present at only a portion of the session, and taking no notes.

The important questions of the social, the intellectual and the spiritual preparation of the teacher were touched upon, as well as those of the use of illustrations in Sunday-school work and the manner of getting and keeping scholars. On first thought, social preparation would seem a very inconsiderable factor in the Sunday-school teacher's success. But careful examination proves it of nearly the first importance, for in almost no other work besides the Sunday-school teacher's does the individuality of each learner so largely affect the character of the results produced. Moral suasion being the sole basis of the teacher's control, if Johnnie be mischievous, Tom malicious, or Bobbie inattentive, her effort is useless to the entire class—unless she thoroughly understands the children, and wisely acts accordingly. In this case all Johnnie needs is a little merited praise when he happens to make a clever answer, for just because he is so bright, he is also innocently naughty. The wide-awake, healthy, happy boy should be full of fun, but he has usually an honest sense of pride that may be touched upon occasion. Wicked Tom does not creep quite so near the heart, but may be won over for "an assistant teacher," as one speaker put it, by assigning him little offices of trust and showing him small kindly attentions until he likes his teacher and has strong self-respect. Bobbie's, the simplest case of all, is that of one who is fed upon spiritual oatmeal when he wants meat. Have you not noticed that he was very fond of soldier stories, and would enjoy hearing of David or Saul, or that, as an incipient orator, he would drink in eagerly Paul's defense at the court of Cæsarea? Give him what he needs, since the Bible has something for all. If, with all her careful study of her boys, the teacher does not know them, she will plan every-day merry-makings, go visit them at their homes and learn of them through their fathers and mothers. Perhaps a word at home will set all right. Thus, after all, the social preparation seems to come first, as we should know our pupils before we can hope to help them, however well fitted for our work.

The best intellectual preparation, we should imagine (though we did not hear the talk on the topic), after the suggestion of one pithy speaker, would be to think the subject out fully for oneself. Leave the library behind, and if you must have helps "Go forth under the open sky, and list

To Nature's teachings."

The best way to make a subject dead to yourself and everybody else is to cram on it. The spiritual preparation is the strongest personal and moral force of the teacher. As some one said, the impressive words of a teacher to her pupils, "Girls, I am praying for you," would follow a thoughtful child for months, perhaps through life, with a sweet, purifying influence on conduct and character. The true Sunday-school teacher must not only feel deeply the religious responsibility she assumes, but should use all helps to make herself yet more in earnest. If the heart is troubled, if the mental vision is dimmed upon every-day affairs, we go to our best friend and talk it all over. So religious conversation with kindred spirits clarifies thought and inspires us with a new full courage and a longing for things pure and holy. As sawing wood is an exercise of muscle, so conversation might be called the exercise of the mind, and the spiritual man will grow by this healthful exercise upon spiritual planes, just as does the intellectual man upon like activity differently applied. Next to the Bible the hymn book is the food for religious growth. So read and learn to love those sacred songs which have marked, in all times, the holiest aspirations of the noblest souls.

As for the field for drawing illustrations, it is boundless—Christ himself, the exemplar after whom we may all pattern, and from whose forcible comparisons we should all draw. We could never better illustrate the fatherhood of God than by the tender parable of the Prodigal Son; the horror of relapse into wickedness than by the tale of the seven devils, or the weakness of earthly glory than by comparing Solomon's majesty to the ineffable beauty of the pure white lily; but, while we draw from the Bible as our greatest and best reservoir, we obtain incalculable help from Shakespeare, Burns and all those great souls who dwelt near to nature and felt between themselves and every simplest bit of creation, even the poor little field-mouse, bonds of union suggesting the similarity and contrast between human and brute life. But an effective force for illustration lies in human experience. Through that which we have ourselves lived we can paint to others with a vigor of deathless force.

Bringing in scholars to the Sunday-school and retaining their interest are all one; the same force is required for both—to make the work interesting, to make the little ones welcome; scholars, teachers and all to invite any small strangers who may come into their neighborhood to come to Sunday-school without waiting for their interest. But, as was said, we should not only advance new theories but put previous good notions to the test, so that every Sunday-school convention shall be not only a production of new and higher ideals, but also a practical experience meeting. The use of the convention—to inspire with the force of numbers as well as of pithy suggestions—can never be fully felt until each delegate comes bringing not only one or more questions to ask, but the practical proved answer to some difficult problem of the work. He then comes a host in himself.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

Final.

I think could we all be made to feel
This truth that life writes plain and clear—
That every act, and word, and thought
To which we commit our souls while here,
Is done, is said, is thought, and all
The power of the universe cannot change
The record by even a single jot—
That our lives would take a higher range.

If we felt that nothing could be revoked,
That no slightest sin was ever forgiven,
That the marks we make on our souls in time
We must carry in hell or carry in heaven;
Wherever the soul may soar or sink,
The act or the thought must cling to it still,
A part of itself, and no uttermost power
Can divide the two—for so God doth will—

That life would grow solemn and sacred and sweet,
That we should walk grandly, and speak like kings,
Our faces would shine, and our hearts would shrink
From mean and low and frivolous things;
We should scorn to lead the life of to-day,
And leap to the life of a nobler age,
And the chances we lose for heroic deeds
Would seem like a princely heritage.

But still we keep to our childish thought,
The thought of a childish age and race,
That somehow, somewhere, we may drop off
The results of the sins which our souls deface;
That God will remit us the penalty
And place us as high and clean and white
As though we had never defiled our lives,
If we but repent of our sins aright.

All life says nay. Repent if ye will—
God help ye; repent if your soul has need;
Sin's results will stand, but your grief and shame
May keep you from further sinful deed.
Nor hope that your acts will cease with you,
It stops not there—for good or for ill
It reaches through other lives far on Till the boundless universe feels its thrill.

Can a man be common and low and base
With a thought like this beneath his heart?
Will he stumble or will he walk upright?
Will he play on high an ignoble part?
If a man believes with his being's strength
The thought which I place before soul and sense,
And vilely acts, then law is a lie,
And a myth is all cause and consequence.

HATTIE TYNG GRISWOLD.

The Evolution of Religion in the Old Testament.

When we begin to study the order of religious progress, and look for the evidences of development in religious thought, we adopt the method of the naturalist; we seek to separate the later from the earlier forms; we make out, if we can, a relative chronology and find the fundamental type of our series.

So, taking up that body of Jewish literature known as the Old Testament, the scientific scholar, wishing to trace the causal connection of its ideas, first makes search into the date and authorship of its several parts. For him these facts, however little they may concern the simply pious reader, are of the greatest interest. Just as a geologist or astronomer would study the order of God in the earth or solar system, so the Biblical student would study the order of God in the realm of religious beliefs. What was the first revelation and what was the last? What glimpses of truth in the far-off ages, gathering new accumulations or spreading like the dawn, at length illuminated the whole sky of man's hope and desire?

It is hard to remove the popular impression that the books of the Bible were produced in the order in which we find them in our English version; that that is the logical order, and that if there be any growth of thought, any expansion of the truth, any earlier and later revelation, it is to be discovered by reading from left to right, by comparing the first books with the last. The popular conception is not altogether false, but the critic is obliged to correct it at many points. For when he scrupulously examines the text of the original and penetrates into the national history of the Hebrews, he finds marks of a relatively modern composition in the Pentateuch, or five books of Moses, and a very great antiquity in the five prophets placed quite in the latter part of the collection. Several hundred years lie between Amos, the prophet of Tekoa, and the full-formed Genesis of our acquaintance.

The prophets those best worthy of the name, giving us the most exalted ideas of God and the most exacting precepts of morality, are the earliest in time of the Old Testament writers; the historians, priests and scribes are later. Yet, in these priestly laws and narratives are to be found the great mass of crude and sensuous conceptions of worship, records of idolatry and even approval of incredible legends and barbaric practices. How shall we trace the law of evolution through such conditions? How account for such reversion of type? This requires careful thought. And yet if we take the life and growth of institutions and systems with which we are already acquainted; if we observe how the American Republic has advanced on the pathway of its development; if we recall the course of the Christian church, or our branch of it, since the beginning, we shall see how the prophet antedates the scribe and the priest; how the strong-souled reformer precedes the worldly-wise legislator; how the man of intuition or poet is followed by the man of expediency.

The prophet, whether he be Garrison of Massachusetts, or Patrick Henry of Virginia; Emerson at Divinity Hall or Channing at Baltimore; Jesus at Jerusalem, or Amos and Isaiah—turns a dull and leaden age into an age of gold. Affairs have been going on badly or have fallen into a dead routine! Greed has taken possession of men, or luxury has dulled the moral sense; the people are robbed of liberty; or worship has become corrupt and false. Then the voice of the true and living God thunders through the soul of the indignant prophet. He makes a proclamation and sets up a standard; and his utterance so clear, so true, so bold and full of fire, is the one thing in that juncture that men can not forget.

Why, then, does not the stream opened from such a fountain run pure in the aftertime? In the first place, the standard raised is far above the average comprehension and energy of those who are summoned to its support. Though the first summons bring many to its side, its effect soon wanes, the impulse is spent, and the men of expediency and sophistry, the men who live for power and pleasure and "peace at any price," eventually belittle the merit and obscure the light of these agitators to the multitudes of their own generation.

e scribes and priests are greatly preferred by all rulers or men seeking place. So the rationalists begin to reason, and the temporizers begin to legislate, and the compromisers begin to organize such practical schemes as will most effectually annul the "impractical" utterances of the prophet.

The poet tells us:

"It is the most difficult of tasks to keep Heights which the soul is competent to gain."

What is true of the individual is true of the masses of men; and they quickly find the words of the prophet too high, too sweeping, too broad. He has not sufficient respect for the constituted authorities. Think of Amos and Hosea, oldest of the authentic Old Testament authors, crashing in amid the voluptuous barbarities, the idolatries and degradation which followed the footsteps of Solomon; or of Jesus in a later age exposing its smooth hypocrisies, or casting contempt on its worship of mint, anise and cummin, to the neglect of love and justice!

Yet the first became the last. Without the prophets of Israel and the prophet of Nazareth, neither Judaism nor Christianity would have had any history to tell. There would have been no mythology to account for, no priesthood to busy itself over empty rites. The words of the prophet were the soul of the whole religious movement as they are the soul of the Bible. And not all the rationalizing, and dogmatizing, and ritualizing, and mythological overlaying of the aftertime, has been quite able to obscure the thought of these men to any clear-sighted soul in search of spiritual truth.

Reactions and defections repeatedly occurred long periods; were spent as though no word of the prophet was remembered. Men relapsed into fetich worship; they set up stocks and stones; they made offerings to fire; they introduced strange gods into holy places; they conceived of Jehovah as in the shape of a bull; they sacrificed to Moloch and Baal, to Ashera and Astarte; even human beings were slain and burnt in honor of their deity, and the moral life was correspondingly lax and brutish. Yet, because the prophet's word had once been spoken and was writ on secret tablets which never can be broken; because the leaven of truth remained to transform the race.

The heedless world hath never lost,"

We know, I think, how far the utterance of a truth may be from getting it accepted or even understood by those who hear it: Voting a proposition, or subscription to an article of belief, may tell us nothing of its influence over mind or life. There was often a great deal of large talk among the Jews, of the power of their Jehovah. Perhaps no nation ever boasted so over their God. But over and over again their history shows how empty were their words. The people were superstitious; they lived in fear; they tried all sorts of devices to propitiate their deity. Often they fell away from his worship, and went to making and serving idols. We have therefore lying side by side in the Jewish literature two distinct and mutually exclusive conceptions of God; the conception of the spiritual seer and the conception of the people as interpreted by the priest or scribe.

For the Hebrew people Jehovah appears first as a provincial God, and although his realm constantly enlarges, he is a provincial God to the last. Jehovah is the God of the Jews; and to the end he has foes in possession of great domains, who refuse to be overthrown—evil spirits, Satan, and even other gods. To the Hebrew people he fails to prove himself conclusively the mightiest of all the universal powers.

It is in the later literature that we discover the clearest indications of the progressive growth of Israel's religious faith. Paradoxical as at first it seems, it is in the later literature that we find the oldest conceptions as to the nature of man and of God, and of their relations to each other. Into the later and historical (or what some are tempted to call the unhistorical) books was gathered much which the prophets had no use for, or which they would have discarded as false or corrupting; much also is there which reflects the life of the nation many generations after the first and greatest of the prophets were dead. Writers, now more common, busied themselves with setting in order the traditions of the past, which had been handed down and were now floating about as folk-lore. Men were interested to know the history of their national life; their children were to be instructed in the legends of patriarchal and tribal experience; while those tales of how the world was made, how sin and death devastated it, how the wicked were punished and God's chosen were rewarded, would furnish a tempting field for fanciful thought. Not only do these narratives carry our minds back to the morning of creation, but in the myths embedded in them they carry us really back to a civilization greatly anterior to the writings of the great prophets. They take us far back of the existence of any written records. And in that inimitable mythology of the Hebrew race, among those scattered oral recitals, edited, connected together, and perhaps expanded by the scribes, we can discern the slowly gaining but surely growing faith which marks Israel as the parent of the world's monotheism, as the historic source of our own spiritual life.

How the prophets reached their high thought of God and man's duty, almost at a cast, we do not know. How they formed to themselves a conception of divine and human obligation, so great as at times to pass from ethnic to universal morality, we cannot explain. "Thou knowest not (says one of their own writers) what is the way of the Spirit, nor how the bones do grow in the womb of her that is with child." (Eccl. xi. 5.) The problem is like that which requires us to account for genius of any other sort; to lay bare the causes and conditions which go to the production of a bard like Homer, of a warrior like Cæsar, of a dramatist like Shakespeare, of a scientist like Newton. When we take masses of men, however, we can more easily see the process of their education, and the elements of influence which enter into the development of their thought and life.

So in the case of the Hebrew people we find abundant evidence that they passed through the usual stages of savagery and barbarism before the prophet came to reveal to them a better way. And when he did come, it was ages before the nation, as such, saw any such value in the prophet's word as to quote it as having either divine or human authority. The later writings, the five books of Moses, were the first Hebrew Bible, and the whole of it. Nor did the nation acknowledge any sacred writings until after the return from the Babylonish captivity. It was only when the whole line of great prophets had vanished that men in authority began to recognize the greatness of the prophetic utterances, and saw the people hungry for the word of God, which they proclaimed. Ezra, 444 years before Christ, reorganized the temple worship in Jerusalem, and introduced the Pentateuch, or Law of Moses, in nearly its present form; and before the end of that century, Malachi, the last of the prophets, died. It was only then that the value of their work began to be seen in its true light, and partly, perhaps, because they were little valued, and still of inferior authority, their place fell at the end of the Old Testament canon.

But, on the whole, the order of books has a certain fitness for the purposes of religious instruction. Though the first written are among the last in the arrangement, and the later to be received, it is because the people could not all at once rise to such a height of spiritual truth. They stoned the prophets instead of listening to their exhortations and warnings. Kings dreaded them, and priests conspired against them, yet the movement of the nation in thought, whatever may have been its lapses in practice, was toward the ideal of the classic period. When, therefore, we seek to instruct our children in the literature of the Bible, we find it is the easiest method to lead them along that pathway which the Jewish race trod so painfully. The theism of the prophet will not engage the interest of the child like the mythology of Genesis, with its talking, walking, visible, emotional and miracle-working God. The youth of to-day find something fascinating in those stories which belong to the youth of the world. There is a stage in human life, as there was in the life of the race, when it is the first object, because it is the saving thing, to cultivate the imagination or fancy. Coleridge says:

"Fancy is the power
That first unsensualizes the dark mind,

Giving it new delights, and bids it swell
 With wild activity; and peopling air
 By obscure fears of being invisible
 Emancipates it from the grosser thrall
 Of the present impulse, teaching self-control,
 'Till superstition, with unconscious hand,
 Seat reason on the throne."

Thus, even superstition at a certain period of development serves the cause of morals and truth.

What is wanted and what is gained by an acquaintance with these mythological or legendary stories of divine manifestation, is a vivid sense of the reality of divine presence and power. Possibly it is only in this material or sensuous garb that we can effectively clothe for the child the moral and spiritual truth which we deem most essential. Indeed, I do not believe we shall ever succeed in impressing our own faith upon our children or upon the world at large, until we find and use for it that dress of fable and allegory and parable, of mythology, if you please, which has held so large a place in all religions.

Begin then with the Bible as the Jews began with its mythology,—as an indispensable part for the youngest minds. You can no more affirm its literal truth than you can affirm the literal truth of the stories from Homer, of the parables of Jesus, or of the poems of Longfellow. But it will awaken inevitable thought in a direction most serviceable to the teacher of religious truth. It will stir feeling and inquiry in a realm of conceptions which form the strength and staple of a perfect life.

In the books of Moses and the other historical books, it will be easy to find evidences of fetichism and idolatry; to learn that though Jehovah was acknowledged to be the true God, or the greatest God, he was not in the minds of the people the only God. Though he created the world there were other Gods to divide with him its dominion. At first he is the God of the individual or of the family. The grandfather of Abraham, we are told, worshiped other Gods, but this patriarch chose Jehovah, who comes to him in human shape. Jacob chooses Jehovah to be his God on condition that he gains his request for bread and raiment, and a safe return to his father's house.

In time, however, Jehovah becomes the national God. The God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob is the God of all the tribes of Israel. My God is transformed into our God. There may yet be other gods, but in the Mosaic command it reads, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me." And the people agree to be faithful to him if he will be faithful to them and perform his promises to the peculiar and chosen people, to the seed of Abraham.

Finally, there is some recognition of the thought that there is one God over all men, over all nations; in other words, that Jehovah is the God of the human race. Though this conception seems to possess but a transient power over the ordinary mind, being rather the high intuition of the seer or the vision of the saint, yet we meet the thought that this one God is a being not to be compared with men; that he is an invisible spirit more than filling the heaven of heavens; not dwelling alone in houses made with hands, but from whose presence none can flee; that His commands are like Himself, eternal, immutable and not to be repented of, His righteousness being perfect; and that with all who do justly and love mercy, and walk humbly in His presence, it shall be well now and always.

In this order we see, doubtless, the path of historical development in the religion of the Hebrew Scriptures.

What a sublime step it was when the religious teachers of the Hebrew race, with some deep consciousness of its mission and of the everlasting truth, moved against the idolatry and wickedness of the times with the 'Ark of the Covenant! However much or little historic truth there may be connected with the story of its adventures, the idea of a DIVINE LAW being the true object of worship; the presentation of a just, unchanging statute for the government and guidance of the people, instead of a capricious personal deity, was worthy of a divinely inspired mind, and furnishes one of the most original and elevated lessons of religious history. To whatever extent the law might have been erroneous or incomplete; to whatever extent it may have failed to command the obedience of the nation and turn men from their superstitions, the thought was worthy of being placed side by side with the most inspired ideas of poetry or prophecy in Job, or the psalmist, or Isaiah.

To conclude: In making the best practical use of the Old Testament for instruction in faith and righteousness, it should be employed as we should employ the religious literature of any modern nation if we wished to derive the greatest benefit from it. We should distinguish the time and other conditions of its composition. We should separate in our minds those parts which imply the earlier and cruder thought from those which shine in the light of a newer and higher illumination. And if we wish to establish clear conviction we should place side by side the ancient and the modern views of God and man, and of their mutual relations. Put the utterances of Jonathan Edwards, for example, by the side of those of Channing; let the creed of Andover be set over against the short statement of the Western Conference; let the hymns of Isaac Watts be compared with those of Samuel Longfellow; and let the manuals in our Sunday-schools be measured by those that were in use thirty years ago.

In this way (though we shall discover sometimes the same anachronisms of belief and worship as we find in the Bible) there will be small risk of either young or old, who are open to instruction, choosing the lower and narrower rather than the higher and more rational faith. So, as reason grows and is led to exercise itself freely upon the Scripture writings, it will soon elect for its own those convictions, it will eventually delight itself in those portions which inculcate the purest theism and the highest morality; it will naturally attach the highest authority and value to those books and passages which exalt God, which recognize the dignity and divine descent of man, and which hold out the best hope for him both here and hereafter.

CONFERENCES.

The New Minnesota Conference.

The first meeting of the Conference of Unitarian churches of Minnesota, was held in St. Paul and Minneapolis, November 16 and 17. At the opening session, Wednesday evening (the 16th), Mr. E. E. Woodman, of St. Paul, gave the address of welcome, and was followed by Rev. H. M. Simmons, Rev. Kristofer Janson, of Minneapolis, and Rev. J. R. Effinger, Secretary of the Western Unitarian Conference.

Thursday morning the business session was held in St. Paul. Eight societies were represented: Minneapolis, Revs. H. M. Simmons and Kristofer Janson; Duluth, Rev. James H. West; Winona, Mr. and Mrs. Pudor and Mr. Clark; Sioux Falls, Miss C. J. Bartlett; Luverne, Mrs. Mahoney; St. Paul, Revs. S. M. Crothers and Kristofer Janson. The following constitution and resolutions were adopted:

Since the idea of divine unity, expressed in the Unitarian name, has assumed so large a meaning and importance in modern thought, and since its included duty of human unity and love is the nearest one in religious life, the conference adopts this name. For the same reason it uses the name in no sectarian sense, but will gladly unite with any churches of any other name that work for the above aim, and cordially invites them to its meetings and membership.

The conference shall hold an annual meeting in October of each year, and a semi-annual in spring, at such times and places as the executive committee shall appoint. At such meetings each church shall be entitled to representation by three delegates besides its pastor; and the delegates shall have power to fill vacancies.

The conference shall at each annual meeting elect a president, vice-president, secretary and treasurer, who shall assume their offices at once, and hold them until their successors are appointed. They shall perform the usual duties of those officers, and together with one representative chosen from and by each church, shall constitute the executive committee.

It shall be the duty of the executive committee to adopt such by-laws as they may think necessary for the transaction of the business of the conference and executive board.

This constitution may be amended at any regular meeting, by three-fourths of the voters present, provided a year's previous notice has been given to the churches by the secretary; or by unanimous consent, provided thirty days' notice has been given.

Resolved, That the Unitarian church of Sioux Falls, and any other Unitarian societies which may be formed in Dakota, are cordially invited to full membership and fellowship in this conference.

Resolved, That each of the several societies of this conference is hereby requested to name its member of the executive committee, provided for in our constitution, and to send its name to our secretary at an early date.

Resolved, That our executive committee are hereby requested to consider at an early date the question of employing a state agent, and as soon as a suitable salary is guaranteed, to secure at once the services of such an agent.

Resolved, That the thanks of this conference are given Rev. Oscar Clute, missionary at large for Iowa, and to the officers of the Wisconsin Conference, for recent faithful and effective missionary work in this state.

Resolved, That the delegates and friends now in conference assembled, hereby tender to Unity church, of St. Paul, their cordial thanks for the hospitality extended to us during our stay here, and to the ladies of the society for their kind attention to us and for the bountiful collation provided.

The officers elected for the ensuing year were as follows: Edward Sawyer, of St. Paul, president; Judge Stearns, of Duluth, vice-president; Clarence Sprague, of Minneapolis, secretary; C. C. Pudor, of Winona, treasurer.

The evening session Thursday was held in the First Unitarian church of Minneapolis. Short addresses were made by Rev. J. H. West, Miss Bartlett, Revs. K. Janson, S. M. Crothers, and George Batchelor.

CORRESPONDENCE.

An Ethical Culture Convention.

EDITOR OF UNITY:—A convention of delegates from the societies for ethical culture was held in this city Nov. 18-20. The first business was the adoption of the constitution for the Ethical Union which was formed a year and a half ago, when delegates from all the societies met in New York. After serious consideration and much discussion, a constitution was finally adopted. The general object of this Union is to elevate the moral life, and it cordially welcomes to its fellowship all who sympathize with this aim, whatever may be their philosophical or theological beliefs. Its special objects are (1) to strengthen the bond of fellowship among the societies for ethical culture and with those outside who sympathize with its aims; (2) to start a fund for the foundation and support of a School of Philosophy; (3) to publish and circulate suitable literature; (4) to further such objects as may commend themselves, from time to time, to the societies.

Professor Adler spoke at length on the importance of developing the principles of the societies, and the institutions which must grow out of these principles,—religious societies which will in spirit embrace all and extend their influence through their institutions. As one of the chief means to this end he emphasized the moral and religious education of the young. A step will be taken in this direction by publishing text-books for moral training. The chief force of the movement must be directed inwardly, and therefore it is not desired to quickly multiply the societies; but letters coming from all parts of the country asking for information as to the work and meaning of the ethical societies make imperative demand for consideration. After some discussion a committee was appointed which advised the enrollment of "members at large;" that if these members in any one place should number twenty or over, they should be entitled to send a delegate to the annual convention of the Union; also, that the lecturers of the societies should occasionally speak at such towns.

A committee was also appointed to provide for the publication of a quarterly report, with each of which a lecture should be printed.

On Sunday, the 20th, a public meeting was held at the Grand Opera House. Short addresses were made by delegates from the several societies, and a paper was read by Dr. Frances Emily White, of Philadelphia. A very interesting report was given by Mrs. McCallum, a member of the London Ethical Society, telling of their work among the working people and their meetings in Toynbee Hall. The meeting closed with a stirring address by Prof. Felix Adler, which sent his hearers home inspired with a new faith in the value of the movement, and a firm determination to stand for the faith of ethics.

The convention then adjourned to meet in Philadelphia in January, 1889.

FIRST EVENING.

- (1.) Biographical Sketch of Lessing.
- (2.) Lessing as a Critic.
- (3.) Lessing's Influence upon Religious Thought.

NOTE.—A short paper, or a carefully prepared talk, to be given upon each of the above, followed by conversation in the club. The greater the freedom of inquiry and remark, the more profitable the evening to all. [Consider the many-sidedness of Lessing's thought,—literature, art, religion, etc.; his clear apprehension of what he would accomplish, and his persistency of aim; his loyalty to his convictions; his grasp of principles, the universal in the special and concrete; his large humanity.]

SECOND EVENING.

READING OF NATHAN THE WISE.

N. B. Use translation by Ellen Frothingham, published by Henry Holt & Co. References as below made from same.

Where serious gaps occur, short explanations should be made by some one selected for purpose. Scenes should be briefly described when location varies. Should suggest a brief description of Patriarch before his entering, Act V., Scene II.; also an account of the lay brother, Scene VII., same Act. An explanation of who Assad was, will simplify the plot; it should be made in Act IV., Scene III., where Saladin and Sittah are introduced.

Characters, as read,—The Sultan, Sittah, Nathan, Recha, Daja, The Templar, The Patriarch, and a lay brother.

READINGS AND OMISSIONS.

Act I. Scene I. Read to page 5 (Daja), "O Nathan, what a price." Omit to page 7 (Nathan), "But tell me where she is." Read to page 10 (Daja), "You are amazed." Omit to page 12, closing of scene, reading (Daja), "But hark! But see!"

Scene II. Read down to page 22; (Nathan), "Yonder a Mussulman."

Omit Scene III, Scene IV and Scene V.

Scene VI. Omit to page 44. Read (Daja), "Do I again behold you, noble knight?"—to end of act.

Act II. Omit Scenes I and II.

Scene III. Begin page 67 (Saladin), "This Nathan, this Jew of yours"—read to end.

Scene IV. omit. Read Scenes V and VI., to end of Scene VII. Omit at end, page 84 (Nathan), "Of this I must know more." Omit to end of act.

Act III. Scene I. Read to (Daja), "Oh that unlucky message." Omit to page 93 (Daja), "How if through him who saved your life;" read to end of scene.

Scene II. Read to page 98 (Recha), "And where have been?" Omit to page 99 (Templar), "But where is he, your father?" Finish scene; also read Scenes III, IV, V, VI and VII. Omit Scene VIII, Scene IX, read to page 127 (Nathan), "For he was like yourself." Omit to end of act.

Act IV. Omit "Scenes I and II, to page 141. Read beginning (Patriarch), "Ah, sir Knight," to page 147; omit (Patriarch), "Here, my son!" Omit Scene III to page 148 (Sittah), "See what I found but now;" read to end of scene. Read Scenes IV and V to close, omitting (Saladin) "And I myself must learn—". Omit Scenes VI and VII to page 167; read from (Lay Brother), "Yet a moment, Nathan." Omit Scene VIII.

Act V. Omit Scenes I, II, III, IV and V, to page 191; read from (Templar), "Hear me, Nathan!" Omit from page 195 (Templar), "How can I understand you?" Read from page 196 (Nathan), "Stay, whither would you go?" Omit Scene VI. Read Scene VII to end of drama.

NOTE.—The above abridgment will occupy fully an hour and a half in the reading. Characters should be carefully assigned beforehand. This reading makes an interesting and instructive public entertainment. In this case a short notice of Lessing should precede the reading. No stage is necessary; if those taking part sit in front, the entrances and exits will be indicated by stepping forward as one reads, and retiring again, thus more clearly distinguishing the characters and movement of the play.

THIRD EVENING.

NATHAN THE WISE. (Continued)

(1.) The Sermon in the Play:

"I must try if they will at least let me preach unhindered from my old pulpit, the stage." Lessing to Élise Reimarus.

(2.) The Character of Nathan.

(3.) Recha and her Religious Training. [Its method, its emphasis; its sufficiency or insufficiency.]

(4.) Noble Thoughts in the Poem: quotations, with or without comment, from each member of the club or as may otherwise be arranged.

NOTE.—Short papers (or, if preferred, carefully prepared talks) to be given upon Nos. 1, 2 and 3, followed by conversation.

FOURTH EVENING.

(1.) Lessing's Friends, especially Moses Mendelssohn. (V. "The Mendelssohn Family." (I. pp. 1-30). By Sebastian Hensel, 2 vols., (Harper & Bros., 1882.) Also Hedge's "Hours with German Classics," ch. xi.

(2.) Representations of the Jew in Literature. (Shylock, "Merchant of Venice;" Act 1, Scene 2; Act 2, Scene 5; Act 3, Scene 1; Mordecai, in "Daniel Deronda;" Lessing's Nathan; other representations.)

(3.) Treatment of the Jews in the Middle Ages; survivals to-day. (V. James K. Hosmer's "History of the Jews.")

(4.) Conversation.

Compare the reception of "Nathan, the Wise," when written, with the impression it makes to-day. The "Comparative Study of Religion" to-day. The "Sympathy of Religions." Have you read John Fiske's article on "The Causes of Persecution?" (V. "Excursions of an Evolutionist." Ch. viii.) Are we nearer to or farther from the religion of the Sermon on the Mount than the Christendom of Lessing's day?

"Fontenelle says of Copernicus. 'He made known his new system and died.' The biographer of your brother can with equal propriety say: 'He wrote Nathan the Wise, and died.' He ought not to wonder at the greater number of his contemporaries failing to appreciate the merit of this work. . . . He was indeed more than generation in advance of his century."—Moses Mendelssohn to Lessing's brother at Lessing's Death.

THE HOME.

Good-night.

Good-night, pretty Sun, good-night;
I've watched your purple and golden light
While you are sinking away.
And some one has just been telling me
You're making, over the shining sea,
Another beautiful day;
That, just at the time I am going to sleep,
The children there are taking a peep
At your face,—beginning to say,
"Good-morning!" just when I say good-night!
Now, beautiful Sun, if they've told me right,
I wish you'd say good-morning for me
To all the little ones over the sea.

SYDNEY DAYRE, in St. Nicholas for April.

Babies' Rights.

The babies have rights as well as others; and their rights ought to be respected. First of all, baby has a right to the care and protection of his parents; a right to comfort as well as to mere existence. The parents who have brought him into this troublesome world are bound to see that it is no more troublesome to him than necessity requires. They should see that he is properly fed and clothed according to his comfort and well-being, not according to their taste or ease, or convenience. For instance, baby has a right to warm clothing, even if his neck and arms are prettier uncovered. He has a right to fresh air, even if it is troublesome to take him out. He has a right to the food nature provides for him, unless this proves injurious to his health or to that of his mother. He has a right to undisturbed sleep and to amusement, and if he cries for any of these things he has a right to cry.

Baby, also, has a right to education, physical, moral and mental. He should be taught self-reliance and how to shun danger. It is easy to teach a child able to creep to keep away from the stove, he very quickly learns to interpret the "no-no," and will usually mind. A child almost constantly in his nurse's arms is very slow to learn to stand or walk, or care for himself. Some children at three or four are not trusted near a flight of stairs, while other babes of a year will go up and down without harm, for they can be taught to do it safely. A baby who kept her mother in terror by creeping to the head of the stairs with an apparent desire to go down head first, was taught to turn around and slide herself down from step to step, and in a short time she could go up and down as easily and safely as any one.

Children are often hindered in progress by want of self-control in those about them; for courage or cowardice may be taught by example. If a mother shows nervous dread of danger when her baby essays to walk alone, the fear is quickly communicated to the child, and he gives up the attempt. A child naturally fearless will often by example become as nervous and hysterical as the women about him. It is an obvious fact that children are actually taught to cry over a trifling bump or slight misadventure, by the excessive sympathy expressed. Children crave, and should have sympathy, but it should be wisely given.

And baby should be taught good habits. This can be done at a very early age. It requires an even temper, and great patience on the part of the mother, but she is more than repaid by the result; and the advantage is great to the child as well as to the parent.—Rhet Kunze, in Good Housekeeping.

How It Struck Him.

A little fellow came home from Sunday-school the other day, and asked his mother to buy him a sling. She asked why, and he said the Sunday-school teacher told him how a little fellow killed a big giant with a sling, and he wanted one.—Our Dumb Animals.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Minnesota.—The Minnesota Unitarian Conference is an established fact. It was organized in Unity church, St. Paul, November 17, by the adoption of a constitution and the election of officers. The meeting was held in the church parlor, which was comfortably filled by a company of sixty or seventy people. A bright fire blazed on the hearth, making it seem like a home gathering, and the spiritual atmosphere was homelike and fraternal. Rev. Mr. Crothers called the meeting to order, and Mr. J. D. Ludden was elected chairman. There were present representatives from seven organized churches within the state, six of them in the care of regular pastors. Ten years ago there was but one Unitarian church in Minnesota. Who shall say that Unitarianism is not growing in the west? The constitution of the conference, published elsewhere in this number of UNITY, is a model of conciseness and simplicity, and was adopted with entire unanimity of feeling and expression. Rev. Mr. Batchelor, representative of the American Unitarian Association, gave the light of his countenance and a word of good cheer. The secretary of the Western Conference was there, and felt this day to be in pleasing contrast with the time, nearly sixteen years ago, when he by virtue of being pastor in St. Paul, was the lonely bishop of the state of Minnesota. The new conference faces the future in a self-reliant, courageous spirit, and promises to be an efficient co-worker with its sister conferences in the west.

J. R. E.

Chicago.—Mr. Utter led the Sunday-school meeting last Monday, the lesson being Luke vi: 37-49, and the conversation turned upon the Jesus doctrine of deeds versus words. "The words" condemned were those only of formal pretension, external forms, and superficial pretension; but words expressive of internal reality, spiritual conviction and a living power were in themselves deeds. Being in this sense is even higher than doing. The lesson was then applied by each member of the class by story, illustration, etc. The prose poem of Turgenieff entitled "The Beggar," and the story of the little girl on the street corner who, to the lady that kindly asked her if she was cold, replied "I was, ma'am, until you came along"—were illustrations in point.

Chicago Women's Unitarian Association.—This association met Nov. 17 at All Souls church. The attendance was large and enthusiastic. There were present several visiting friends, among whom were Mrs. Spring, of Lexington, Mass.; Mrs. Judge Fellows, of Manchester, Mass., and Rev. Ida Hultin, of Des Moines.

Vice-President Mrs. G. F. Shears presided, in the absence of the president. Mrs. West reported on the condition of the loan library. Mrs. Woolley suggested that, having heard that some members of the association preferred the omission of the December meeting, she hoped there would be a free expression of opinion on the subject. A rising vote was taken, which resulted in a large majority for the December meeting. Mrs. J. L. Jones read an interesting paper on current religious news, after which a sermon on "The Gospel of Industry" was preached by Rev. Florence Kollock, of Englewood. The subject of the address was discussed by Rev. Ida Hultin, of Des Moines, Mrs. West, Miss LeBaron, Mrs. Dow and others. These meetings grow continually in interest, each one seeming to be more enjoyable than the last. The next one will be held at Unity church, December 22, when a paper on the "Relation of Health to Religion" will be given by Dr. Leila G. Bedell.

Transylvania.—From a recent meeting of our Hungarian Unitarians, we learn that the Unitarian synod in 1666, enacted a law ordering all deacons, ministers and schoolmasters to keep a Sunday-school, and to instruct the youth in religion and singing, and to make them read the Bible. The deacon who neglected his duty had to pay eight florins as a punishment, and the minister and schoolmaster a corresponding sum. This law, we are told, has been several times renewed, but has not led to satisfactory results, and after two hundred and twenty-one years of effort the Sunday-school problem seems to be still unsolved, and the cry is still how to bring the children into church usefulness.

Minnesota.—Last week Rev. Mr. Crothers visited St. Cloud, Minn., and found so much encouragement that he held service there Sunday evening. Arrangements have been made for permanent services for the next six months in St. Cloud, several New England ministers having offered to give their labors. It is confidently expected that by the end of that time a self-supporting society will be established. A number of the most prominent citizens of the place are identified with the effort. A series of Sunday evening services have also been arranged for the winter in West St. Paul, the ministers and congregations of the Universalist and Unitarian churches of St. Paul uniting.

Scotland.—Lord Gifford has left a bequest of £80,000 to establish chairs of Natural Theology at the Scottish universities on the conditions: "The subject is to be taught as a science without reference to or reliance upon revelation, and the lecturer is to be subjected to no ecclesiastical or theological test, but to be free to teach what he believes." These are the foundations upon which the Andovers of the twentieth century will be planted.

Boston.—It is contemplated putting a whole public school building to industrial school purposes, to be sustained at the expense of the city.

—The younger city ministers of our denomination are planning industrial week-day work in connection with their Sunday-schools.

—Rev. Edward E. Hale held a union service on Thanksgiving day, in which the south end Unitarian churches joined. Mr. Hale always gives, on public holy-days, an old-fashioned historical or political sermon.

Iowa City, Iowa.—Rev. George Batchelor was with us on Sunday, November 20, and delighted everybody with his masterly sermon on "A Modern View of Retribution." One could not but be impressed with its clearness of thought and catholicity of spirit. A. J. B.

Hinsdale, Ill.—A fair for the benefit of the church will be held on the afternoon and evening of December 9, with music and recitations. All friends invited.

MASON & HAMLIN ORGANS.

The cabinet organ was introduced in its present form by Mason & Hamlin in 1861. Other makers followed in the manufacture of these instruments, but the Mason & Hamlin Organs have always maintained their supremacy as the best in the world.

Mason & Hamlin offer, as demonstration of the unequalled excellence of their organs, the fact that at all of the great World's Exhibitions, since that of Paris, 1887, in competition with best makers of all countries, they have invariably taken the highest honors. Illustrated catalogues free.

PIANOS.

Mason & Hamlin's Piano Stringer was introduced by them in 1882, and has been pronounced by experts the "greatest improvement in pianos in half a century."

A circular, containing testimonials from three hundred purchasers, musicians, and tuners, sent, together with descriptive catalogue, to any applicant.

to delegates and visitors by the ladies of the Jackson Society, in the church parlors.

Each society within the conference is entitled to a delegate membership of three in addition to its minister, but it is desired that the attendance be not limited to the number of delegates. The society at Jackson extends its hospitality to all Unitarians, and hopes for a large attendance at the conference.

Visitors will please report at the church, corner of Jackson and Washington streets, on arrival.

It would be esteemed a favor if those purposing to come would send their names some time during the preceding week, in order that the entertainment may be made ample.

Catarrh. Catarrhal Deafness and Hay Fever.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby catarrh, catarrhal deafness and hay fever are permanently cured in from one to three simple applications made by the patient at home. A pamphlet explaining this new treatment is sent free on receipt of stamp, by A. H. Dixon & Son, 308 West King street, Toronto, Canada.

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XX.]

CHICAGO, DECEMBER 10, 1887.

[NUMBER 15.]

EDITORIAL.

AMONG the good things in the Nineteenth Century for November, is a symposium on the international copyright problems, in which appear the names of Gladstone, Tennyson, Matthew Arnold, Huxley and others; an article by Professor Huxley on "Science and the Bishop," and one on "The Antiquity of Man" by A. R. Wallace.

LEE & SHEPARD are about to issue new editions of George Lowell Austin's "Life of Longfellow" and "The Life and Times of Wendell Phillips," and of Henry Giles' "Human Life in Shakespeare." The latter has been out of print for some time. It is the interpretation of genius by genius and it ought to delight a new set of readers and quicken a younger generation.

OWING to a mistake of the printer, the opening paragraph of the constitution, adopted at the Minnesota Conference at Minneapolis November 17, was omitted in our last week's account of the meetings. It is as follows:

This Conference is formed to bring the churches represented into closer coöperation, and aims to help preserve and strengthen religion in Minnesota, by working to make it more reverent, rational, just, charitable and humane.

W. M. SALTER, in his speech before the recent convention of Ethical Culture Societies, held in this city, thus defines the foundations of this movement: "Yes, I think we are on absolutely safe ground in saying that our single plank is practical right living, right conduct, practical righteousness. Who shall say that it is not a large and inspiring work; that it lacks in divine impulses, that it has no power to stir and exalt?"

A FRIEND writes, and we thank him for the correction:—"Appleton's Cyclopædia says that George Eliot was born in 1817. A correspondent of UNITY, (Nov. 26), M. R. F. G., reviewing or calling attention to George Meredith's work, says she was born in 1822; while Mr. Cross, in her biography, quoting from the diary of her father, Mr. Robert Evans, says: 'November 22, 1819, Mary Ann Evans was born at Asbury Farm at five o'clock this morning.' And Robert Evans must be supposed to know."

APROPOS of the item concerning James Freeman Clarke's free church in Boston, from our correspondent, in another column, we would like to give the testimony of a young man who for two years has been a student in Boston, who is a member of a western parish that is managed on the free seat system. He says, "If I were to settle down in a church home in Boston, it would be in James Freeman Clarke's church. For in that church from the start I had a feeling that I was not only welcome but that they had been expecting me and had shaped their plans accordingly." And still every church that goes on the rented-pew system flatters itself with the pleasing fiction that its church is more homelike on account of it, and it wonders why more people do not feel their hospitality. That the finances are easier managed, and that there is a certain subtle satisfaction of a slightly selfish nature to the pew owner or holder, must be admitted, but that it is non-democratic, non-missionary and inhospitable to strangers is to our mind equally palpable, and the universality of the custom is the chief reason why so many people are blind to these facts. If the financial problems of the church were more heroically met by voluntary contributions at the beginning of the year, rather than grudgingly adjusted by the grievous taxation for arrearages at the end of the year, there might be fewer churches in some localities and preachers' salaries might be lower in some instances, but there would be much better churches and far nobler preaching.

Harper's Bazar makes a severe criticism upon the superficial quality of American culture. It says: "The ordinary American home is often the abode of a sham gentility. Its only literature is too frequently the newspaper and the cheap novel. Its art is common in kind and in degree. Its decoration is a poor copy of a bad model. How much the critical judgment, not of our artisans, but of our merchants, bankers, and even professional men, is worth—the sort of art too many of them admire, the run of worthless plays, the vogue of books without a quality of literature, may testify. And how far has the power of knowledge wrought upon us? We are accustomed to pose as the most intelligent of contemporary peoples. But have we, like the Germans, a clear sense of the 'necessity of knowing scientifically' whatever needs to be known? There was a bitter truth in the famous saying that Americans are the most schooled and the least taught of all nations. The prevalence of cheap papers, the scattering of 'popular science' journals and primers, the success of the 'Lyceum Lecture' system, point, it seems to us, to a want rather than a fullness of intellectual life. These entertainments teach a man not to think, but to dispense with thinking. . . . Supposing that every outgoing traveler were henceforth to bring home with him from Germanysome sense of the power of knowledge, from Italy some experience of the power of beauty, from France some perception of the power of life and manners, to enrich withal his English inheritance of the power of conduct, what an American civilization might we not hope for in the evolution of the next half century."

The Unitarian Church Temperance Society has for free distribution the following tracts:

1. "Temperance in Unitarian Churches; How, What, and Why," by Rev. C. R. Eliot.
 2. The Constitution and Methods of Work of the Unitarian Church Temperance Society.
 3. Report of the public meeting in Tremont Temple in May last, with speeches by Hon. John D. Long, Revs. C. R. Eliot, M. J. Savage, E. E. Hale, J. L. Jones, and Mrs. M. A. Livermore.
 4. Address on Temperance, by Dr. Channing.
- For a merely nominal price, the following:
5. "How we got our Church Temperance Society," by Rev. W. C. Gannett.
 6. "The True Helpers Trying," with a story by Miss Elizabeth Phelps.
 7. Temperance Services and Hymns.
 8. Membership Cards and Pledges.
 9. A Lesson Manual (in preparation).

The object of the Unitarian Church Temperance Society is not merely to organize branch temperance societies, but rather to encourage temperance work by and through Unitarian churches. Any work that is being done for temperance through any of the usual channels of church work, by the pastor, or by any club or organization within the church; any distinctive tendency toward temperance which the work of the church assumes, whether with or without a special temperance organization—this is what the U. C. T. S. wants to encourage and to know about. There is a chance for every active church to focus some of its special work upon temperance. What is your church doing in your community to encourage temperance? Send your answer to UNITY, or to Rev. J. L. Marsh, Winchester, Mass., the secretary of the above society.

LAST week we printed Mr. Leaned's admirable paper that was given before the Sunday-school Institute, recently held in this city and already noticed. This week we print the paper of Mr. Beavis, which unfortunately did not reach Chicago in time for the institute. But such suggestions as this paper contains are never too late, and we earnestly commend it not only to Unity Club workers, but to all those who are interested in the intellectual life, which is a necessary part of the spiritual life. When we remember Huxley's lay sermons, Kingsley's Town Geology, and the great amount of healthy work Thomas Hughes and such men as these just mentioned have done in England, in the way of arousing an interest in scientific studies among the workingmen and women of England, we can but feel that we are far behind them in this matter in America. The Agassiz Association hints at what might be done. Why should not every Unity Club have a Science Section, and every church have in it somewhere a cabinet of natural curiosities and specimens collected by the boys and girls of the parish? Then the preacher would more often find "sermons in the stones" and read from the book that is in the running brook.

The New Art Museum.

Our city has at last a new museum of fine arts, located in the handsome building on the corner of Michigan avenue and Van Buren street, and we cannot pass without mention the fine loan collection of paintings there exhibited by the Art Institute of Chicago, together with other permanent and loan collections. It is needless to add that the elegant structure (with its fine view over the lake), now the permanent home of the Art Museum, by its arrangement and fittings enhances incalculably the interest of the pictures and statuary therein displayed. As productive of several important results, this new departure may be considered a notable one to all art lovers. A permanent collection, free to all every Saturday, it becomes the parent and educator of a strong and true art instinct among the people; it does already, and will more and more offer models for the best effort among artists, and thus by conferring benefits enrich itself; and it will ultimately raise up patrons for struggling painters. The first necessity to a noble art, it may easily be seen, is material prosperity to feed it, since art is always a luxury. The necessary wealth Chicago has, but her citizens have heretofore, with a few exceptions, lacked that interest which not only appreciates fine paintings and statuary, but seeks them, making artists conscious that they are a needed element. They will in future feel this need, and needs once felt, is it not astounding how rapidly nature supplies them? When shall we begin to realize the magnificent latent forces all about us, only awaiting the spring-time of favorable sentiment. Chicago's art instinct need no longer remain latent.

There are several attitudes from which an art collection may be viewed. In technical art journals, properly from the stand-point of the studio; in general literary circles they can be truly seen only from the standpoint of the masses, as they appeal to the popular heart and not to the trained artist. This latter coigne of vantage we take. We are pleased, each one of us, as we pass from room to room to note, although untutored, how much we may learn from even a cursory glance into the seventeen different galleries. We mark, first, on passing about on the ground floor, the gradual evolution of art. There is a strange fascination about the development of anything. As children, how eagerly we watched the growth of peas or beans germinating in a glass of water. With what infinite delight do older children mark the development of their own human nestlings from infancy to babydom (the ah-goo-ing, cooing age), and from babydom to the wee toddlers, always trudging merrily about, chattering as they go. So the art lover peers about curiously in the Elbridge G. Hall collection of Egyptian and Assyrian sculpture, noting the straight, square, stiff figures of 800 or 900 B. C., and, then, with a sort of tremor of delight, gazes upon the early Greek sculpture of a later date. Ah, here is grace, symmetry of form and rounded curves of beauty! On into another gallery and we are among the works of the masters, and with what a sense of vindication of race development do we see a new beauty, the human element, the soul manifesting itself with more and more grandeur. The Assyrians seemed not to know of human tears, transfiguring love, or divine aspiration, but at last it shines forth—the god in man. In passing, with what a wondering glance does the eye compare Bologna's "Mercury," all lightness and motion, balancing on the tip of a single member, with Angelo's noble "Prisoner," massive, powerful, full of sorrow; for Michael Angelo marks the culmination of the human interest in art.

Finding we must hasten, we pass hurriedly through the E. B. Washburne, into the Loan collection. A few of these we have already seen, the familiar "Yosemite" of Bierstadt even now with suspended breath, and among others "A Sacristy in Arragon," by William T. Dannat. This has, it seems, been much criticised, but, spite of the severe surroundings and bare background, we cannot but regard it, with that figure of the stolid, bigoted, arrogant, animal-faced priest, as a most eloquent and impressive sermon against Catholicism. Turning from this, the eye falls upon Lorado Taft's "Moll Pitcher,"—a fine figure of a peasant girl, strong featured, a bold, independent defiance in the lifted head, level glance and firmly planted feet. There is at once grace, strength and motion in it. But to the Loan collection of paintings, filling in all six galleries. The most satisfactory reflection upon viewing these is, that one receives an excellent notion of the best modern art, and of its prevailing characteristics. One painting from any master hand is gratifying, but with a half dozen or more we learn to individualize and love the work of the artist. The same tender, characteristic touches we trace with delight in each new painting, and with joy recognize them as we would the loved face of a friend. And to know our friend—ah yes! we must know his limitations. So with the artists, we see their lower levels, and all the better understand their inspired moments. Thus with the master spirits in this Loan collection. We learn to long for them. He who views the paintings with any sort of care or interest will feel that he knows and loves peculiarly the work of Charles H. Davis, William M. Hunt, Fuller, Diaz, Dupré, Daubigny, Rousseau, Troyon, Corot, Millet, Breton and Dante Gabriel Rossetti, but especially the productions of the first two (our countrymen) and the last four.

One can but note in this exhibition the marked excellence of the French artists. As one young man tersely put it: "Those French fellows, they carry everything before them." And it is a remarkable fact that, spite of our traditional notion of French superficiality, coolness and sham sentiment, we find the Frenchman taking the first place in modern schools of art, not only for the grace, sensuous beauty, and marvelous flesh tints of a Bougereau, as in "The Bather," but also for strong feeling and nobility of conception. There is a strange sense of being spiritually upborn as we look upon Corot's landscapes, with those vast over-arching skies, that ethereal, tremulous foliage, almost the embodiment of spirit, and the tender air of mystery penetrating even into the deep shadows, as in "The Flute Player." The same qualities we find emphasized in the work of his pupil, Charles H. Davis, until, working out from under the shadow of the master spirit, he strikes the key-note of his own individuality in that unique and beautiful thing, "Sundown," or the "First Snow,"—the few bare trees outlined against a clear, faintly-tinted wintry sky, the snow-clad hillside with bare, brown brush protruded here and there—nothing more, but the strange intensity of feeling pervading all.

But any detailed mention would be impossible, so we will speak of only four or five noble pictures not to be passed by: Outin's "Sale of the Pet Lamb;" Millet's "The Spaders" and "Bringing Home the New-born Calf;" Jules Breton's "Song of the Lark;" and Dante Gabriel Rossetti's "Beata Beatrix." The two by Millet have the artist's characteristic merits, and bespeak, in the first, all the sadness, the gloom, the pathos, which the peasant painter appreciated and interpreted in peasant life; in the second, the same sympathetic touch, with a little more brightness—simple ecstasy over the new-comer—but the same mystery, as in the grave background. Picture to yourself a young girl, the head uplifted, one arm bearing a scythe, as if for action, suddenly transfixed, the lips parted, eyes dilated, whole attitude intense, as of one experiencing some strange new delight, and you have Breton's "Song of the Lark;" the rare atmosphere, the fiery orb just sinking beneath the horizon, the wide stubble field—all adding that sympathetic touch which makes the figure instinct with life and soul. But note the large canvas in the farther corner of the room. The representation is a woman's face, the features outlined with almost transparent clearness and delicacy—so does the soul seem to breathe through them—the rich auburn hair touched with golden light like an aureole, the soft radiance of color pervading the face, the rapt air, the drooping eye,—it is Beatrice, divinely beautiful, just at the moment of the parting of soul and body. The whole is inexpressibly affecting: every detail, the large folded hands upon which the poppy has fallen, the warm glow, the bright bird nipping the deadly stem, Love and Dante in the background—all just the right concomitants to make "Beata Beatrix" what it is—the most marvelous mingling of the modern and mediæval spirit in just the right proportions, without detriment to either.

We cannot conclude without a word of Annie Shaw, who died so recently, and much of whose admirable work is on exhibition here. Of the broad school, she was strong, original, and thoughtful in her work, never treating anything but with the reverent love of nature so quickly manifested in an artist's canvas, as in that simple but sturdy picture of "The Oak," or "The Rest," with its single splendid tree-trunk and harmonious tones. Could she have lived, she would, with such a beginning, have done no other than a noble work, and helped to distinguish an American School.

Of some of the Century drawings, Low's "Lamia" and the Gibson collection, we can only say that they will richly repay examination, being marked by a fine freedom of spirit and grace which seems to make itself only the more deeply felt in the pure black and white. Even they seem to have caught that spirit of faint imaginings, that strange, powerful mystery, which so distinguishes the finer modern art. Suggestiveness has always marked the richest fancy of the poets, and we learn every day more and more that the great law of power in art, in life, in character, demands that in all there shall be an innermost holy of holies, into which but one may enter. The Infinite Goodness is the great Unrevealed.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

An Undeveloped Side of Unity Club Work.

A PAPER PREPARED FOR THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL INSTITUTE HELD
AT CHICAGO NOVEMBER 1, 1887.

When I think of the excellent work done by our various Unity Clubs scattered throughout the land, with their multiplied activities energizing the intellectual life of the young and old, how can I dare assert "Here lies an untrodden path," or, "Behold yonder an insufficiently cultivated field." So, prepared myself for the storm of criticism which I feel sure must follow, I shall endeavor to indicate a field of magnificent proportions, which, it seems to me, has been somewhat neglected by our noble army of Unity Club cultivators.

A circular letter from the executive committee of the National Bureau of Unity Clubs says it is the duty of the church "to utilize and consecrate the forces of culture," and another circular letter gives us a programme of the great lines of thought, along which it is hoped our Unity Clubs may work, as they strive for this improvement. Now, I think a careful reading of this programme will show which department we are prone to neglect—the undeveloped side of Unity Club work. Here are to be found seven branches of study devoted especially to the fields of literature and science, all admirable in themselves, but observe the disproportionate arrangement: five distinctively literary studies, while natural science is accorded the position corresponding only to one of the five subdivisions. Poetry, fine arts, fiction, history, biography—all are of absorbing interest and inestimable value; but if belles-lettres is of sufficient importance to justify our studying it in detail, why not also science? What would be thought if we granted but one department to polite literature, and then selected for our more especial attention five great branches of natural science, as geology, zoölogy, botany, chemistry, and microscopy? May we not say, then, that the study of natural science is the undeveloped side of Unity Club work? Is there not some danger of our clubs becoming distinctively literary societies? Is there not also great danger of our exaggerating the importance of fiction and poetry, and of book knowledge generally, to the disparagement of more essential things, a knowledge of facts concerning the material world we live in? For example, twenty people occupy their study hours for an entire winter in an exhaustive investigation of the works of some novelist or poet. Now, with the exception of one or two master minds, tell me honestly, do you think there has ever been a poet or novelist to whom we can afford to give such especial attention, while the field of scientific thought, so vast and fascinating, still lies unexplored before us? Let us beware of mental epicureanism—a state of mind in which we crave only the most highly seasoned delicacies, carrying with them the seeds of effeminacy—while we avoid with repugnance the substantial food which is essential to intellectual virility.

I hope it is not necessary for me here to enter upon an elaborate defense against the charge of "soullessness" and lack of appreciation of fiction and poetry. I simply say we too frequently reverse the natural order of things and become intemperate in the use of our "continued stories" and "sweet poesy." If, in the course of the coming winter, I read ten novels and one volume of natural science, I shall make the same mistake in the utilization of cultural forces, that the gourmand makes in his comprehension of the rules of physiology and hygiene, by eating ten mince pies to one potato. When the printing press was invented, some good souls declared it to be the work of the devil, and when we contemplate the appalling amount and character of the fictitious literature which leaves the presses each year, we are led to think they were not so very far astray in their statements; for, though the "Prince of the powers of darkness" may have had nothing to do with inventing the printing press, he recognized at once the value of the discovery, and the devil has worked it with great assiduity since its introduction. You may have already observed that it has ever been characteristic of the party just mentioned, when unable to make men wicked, to turn his entire attention to making them weak. In his policy weakness is the next best thing to wickedness. At present it seems as though we were becoming a nation of novel readers. There are very few children of fifteen years of age who have not read at least one hundred works of fiction. This is certainly a serious state of affairs, and it behooves us to seek a remedy, and the remedy lies, I think, in a partial emancipation from books. Appreciating the greatness of the blessing in general, we must at the same time admit that the world is cursed with books. Our knowledge is too frequently nothing but book knowledge—our education book education. We have depended too much on our books. We have made the mistake of supposing them to be the fountains of knowledge when they are in truth but the storehouses. If we would have our children really educated we must get them away from books to a great extent. They must study the world itself. They must learn "things," not "about things." In this much needed emancipation from books science shall be our leader and savior. Here we find ourselves in a realm where the book is no longer king.

Nature is the noblest of teachers, but the earnest student must not depend upon any high priest for his knowledge of her "holy of holies." He must be his own high priest. Here then opens for our Unity Clubs an undeveloped field, and one which it seems impossible to work too much. Let there be no Unity Club without its adjunct in the nature of an association for the study of natural science, which shall be intended primarily for the boys and girls. Let us strive to have our young people do less novel reading and to learn some of the myriad mysteries of plant and animal life. Get them into the habit of attending service in that glorious temple where "sermons in stones" shall be preached to them, and then it will be but rarely you will hear them making excuses for "staying away from church." Give them an inkling of that wondrous library where are "books in the running brooks," and you shall soon find them developing a taste which scorns the improbable namby-pambyism of the average juvenile novel. Certainly we cannot employ ourselves in a nobler work than this of instilling into the minds of the young this thirst for a closer communion with nature, and stimulating in them an ambition to enter her infinite laboratory, and there to learn of God, not by what men say about Him, but by being near Him while he works.

There is in this country at present an association for the advancement of science, intended especially for the benefit of the young, which is so admirable in its nature and organization that I am persuaded our Unity Clubs can do nothing better than to work along the same line and even under the same name. I refer to the "Agassiz Association," which now has over 900 Chapters, and which ought to be represented in every Unitarian Church in the land. Of the many educational associations for independent study, this is the only one dealing exclusively with natural science, devoting itself principally to the scientific education of young people. In its method of work it endeavors to embody the spirit of that noble teacher whose name it bears,—that is, the study of science by means of actual acquaintance with natural objects themselves, rather than by printed representations and descriptions of them.

To give you some idea of the amount of real work which boys and girls will do in such an association, I will, if you please, refer to our own Chapter in Iowa City. It is composed of twenty-two members, ranging in age from fourteen years upward. They hold weekly meetings, which are conducted entirely by officers elected from among themselves, in accordance with regular parliamentary usage. The evening's programme is usually the reading of short, original papers on various scientific topics previously assigned, in notes concerning any unusual natural phenomena which may have come under the personal observation of members (as, for example, the discovery of some bird rarely seen in the locality, or hitherto unknown trait of some animal), and in the presentation and description, if possible, of specimens from the animal, mineral and vegetable kingdoms. Occasionally the Chapter indulges in what is known as a field-meeting, which is a combination of picnic with scientific work for the benefit of the Chapter. It is at such times and in the individual excursions that the specimens are chiefly gathered for the enlargement of the cabinet. During the past year the aggregate number of miles traveled on foot in these individual excursions amounted to over 600, and as a result of their labors some 500 specimens, geological, botanical and ornithological, were added to the cabinet. This can be taken, I believe, as a fair sample of the work which is being carried on by the 900 Chapters in the United States. It is a work so important in its nature, so far-reaching in its scope, that it must appeal irresistibly to all thoughtful people, and demand especial attention from Unity Club workers.

Is it not then reasonable to urge that no matter how much scientific work may be done by the regular Unity Club, there should also be as an adjunct to it, a society for young people having for its sole aim the study of natural objects. And as such an annex would be practically an "Agassiz Association," why should we not go a step farther and make it so in name? Wherever there is a Unitarian church there should be a Unity Club, and wherever such a club exists there should also be a Chapter of the "Agassiz Association," independent in its lines of work, but looking up to the maturer society for its moral inspiration and support. Is not this an inviting as well as an undeveloped field of work into which we may enter with zest, working joyously for the children of to-day—the men of to-morrow—and at the same time keeping green the memory of one who was so strong in our own cherished faith? To labor with unceasing activity to turn the minds of the young into channels of scientific investigation, should be considered as a sacred duty by every friend of a broad and liberal Christianity. Science is the great liberalizer. As the child studies land and sea and sky, he will by insensible degrees grow into the realization of the essential truths of ethics and religion, naturally developing a faith of broad proportions because of the very breadth of the universe with which he has become acquainted. He will be charitable to all others, even the most ignorant and superstitious, for he will have discovered that the lexicon of science does not contain the word "insignificant;" while the facts of retribution, the certainty and severity of punishment, the oneness of creation and the all-enfolding providence of God, will be taught him with a clearness vainly looked for in the verbiage of book theologians. Some form of monism has ever been the teaching of the world's greatest philosophers. It is to be found in the mysticism of ancient Egypt and Hindoostan. Socrates and his great pupil felt the truth of the universal soul, and what these mystics and transcendentalists grasped intuitively, the modern scientist can practically prove.

"Of Him, and through Him, and to Him, are all things," said Paul 1,800 years ago, and the best sermons from that text are to-day preached by chemistry and biology.

Teach the boys and girls natural theology in a natural way and their faith shall be so established as to place them beyond fear of danger from the subtleties of the dialectician. Go with them into field and forest, and strive to impress upon them the conception of that sublime law of evolution which makes its influence felt throughout all things, animate and inanimate. Let them but gain a just comprehension of this law and we need have no fear for the future. This law of eternal expansion is so wonderful, so sublime, that as we study it we find ourselves gradually drawn from the contemplative to the worshipful attitude. Show its existence and you prove the eventual triumph of good. It is the keystone in the rainbow arch of hope spanning that awful gulf of mystery, which opens wide and deep 'twixt humanity and God.

Nature's Undertone.

All through the day and night I heard a note
Of melody, in countless changes run;
From every flower blooming in the sun,
From air, and rock, and stream it seemed to float.

In lonely wood and dell, the strain was stirred
To deeper harmony, until it swayed
My life with all the feeling thus betrayed
By Nature's songs, without the written word.

Soul-sanctified, we heed this undertone,
Swelling its note in ceaseless ebb and flow—
God's symphony to move in fervent glow
Each heart, that draws still nearer to His own.

VIRGINIA G. ELLARD.

"Our Heredity From God."*

It is not often that a writer on the scientific philosophy of the day chooses so religious a title as the above. "Our Heredity from God" is an expression that describes both the spirit and outcome of Mr. Powell's book. The author frankly explains his purpose in his preface and says he shall be disappointed if he has not assisted in defining the positive tendencies of evolution, deeming nothing less true than that it rests on a basis either of materialism or agnosticism. "The vestibule of this study—perhaps of all study—is apparently agnostic, but I rest peacefully in the conviction that the end is the embrace of God."

* Our Heredity from God. Consisting of Lectures on Evolution. By E. P. Powell. New York: D. Appleton & Co. Cloth, pp. 416. Price, $1.75.

It is not easy to give an outline of a book like this, written in a concise, yet most readable style, with quotable passages on every page, and carrying a learned argument from chapter to chapter, every link of which it seems necessary to preserve in order to understand the whole. The book is divided into three parts. The first contains the leading arguments for evolution, classified under eight heads, forming the titles to as many chapters. Here the question of the "Unity of Nature" is discussed, together with the general theory of development, supported by the three arguments drawn from geography, geology and anatomy. The concluding lecture in Part I. is taken up with an exposition of the principle of degeneration. We are told that the first condition of degeneration is not reversion but perversion of aim. "The evil man does not go back on the line of his animal heredity, but turns aside into paths that are neither human nor animal." Part II. aims "to show the commonality of life between all creatures." Four lectures are given to this portion of the book, that entitled "Wanted Adam" being taken up with a discussion of the date and manner of man's appearance on earth. Part III. considers the problem of evolution after man is reached, and it is here that the reader, chiefly interested in the moral and spiritual aspects of the new philosophy, will most eagerly turn, and he will be well repaid. The tones of the preacher are heard all through Mr. Powell's book, warning, rebuking, and repeating the call to righteousness; but in the concluding part, under the inspiration of such topics as "Jesus, the Christ of Evolution," "Is the Golden Rule Workable?" "Ethics the Aim of Evolution," the preacher is on his native heath. Under the second of these topics the writer enumerates those factors in modern social life which tend to degeneration. Noting the waste, loss and destruction that everywhere wait on results, he concludes there is "no argument stronger against the theory of an absolute Creator than the imperfection of everything." The hope, as well as the truth of evolution, lies in the fact of a continual, if slow, progress. "The quality of the world is not determined by its perfectness or its imperfectness, but by its tendencies." In the final chapter the author talks about "That Last Enemy, Death." He has shown us that the aim of evolution is always ethical, even among nature's lowest forms, in that through all her periodicity nature cherishes "a certain, most positive, progressive purpose," a purpose also defined as intelligent will. "There is a persistency in the universe that does not fail. In the world at large it appears as function or organism; in man as character." By virtue of this supremacy of character man has become co-worker with God, standing in "personal, purposive relations with the Supreme Purpose, which relations constitute the basis of perpetuated individuality." Mr. Powell's last word is one of hope, but not of too easy encouragement. He hopes he has left his reader hungry, as he found him, for hunger is "the beatitude of all existence . . . underlying all growth, all joy and all progress." I have used Mr. Powell's own language, so far as possible, to explain his thought; but there are a few passages I should like to add just for their quotableness. "Nowhere in nature has there been as much parasitic life as among human beings." Righteousness comes only as a result of right choices; it is nothing else than a result; it is uncreatable. "The real value of all creeds and systems is in mental gymnastics." "I can no more conceive a beginning of morals than a beginning of matter and motion." "Character, like energy, is cosmical." Speaking of the shells which certain animals make for themselves, he calls them the first creeds. "But no globulina was ever fool enough to build a shell it could neither enlarge nor get out of. Man only builds a shell which he fills, and then refuses to feed farther."

CELIA PARKER WOOLLEY.

The Queer Doctrines of My Friend.

I have a friend who holds to some queer doctrines. He does not teach these doctrines from a pulpit, nor a rostrum, nor an editorial chair. He has a very queer way indeed of teaching these queer doctrines. He simply keeps them in his heart and lives them. You will call on him some fine morning and find him busy at his work. He will greet you warmly and talk with you on any subject, but he will not mention his doctrines. And yet you shall be most eloquently exhorted and taught by him. An atmosphere of sincerity surrounds him, and you become impressed with the earnestness and reality of life. You catch no tone of flippancy which would lead you to suspect that he estimates life and duty at a low rate. You watch him blacking his stove—for he lives alone in a tumble-down house and does his own domestic work—and you shall see that he touches it reverently, as a devotee would touch the altar. He is an artist, is my friend of the queer doctrines, and made his reputation at portrait painting; but he found that the world would not love his best work, and so he has laid down his brushes, and paints no more save for a friend who loves truth and beauty. But he says the world shall see that he can do other things well, and so when he blacks his stove he uses the coarse brush as he would one of badger's hair, and touches the stove as reverently and earnestly as he would touch a canvas. He finishes that work with all the honesty he would bestow upon a portrait, and says queerly that the gods care not what a man does, but how he does it. It is not the picture or the stove that is the end of his work, but the growth of the soul through that labor. Again, you may take him when he is kneading the dough for his bread. With sleeves rolled up he is putting his soul as well as his hands into the work, and when the loaf is done he says it nourishes soul as well as body. He holds that no food is so sweet as that prepared with his own hands and often one will find him mopping his garret. He believes that one who can mop a floor well may be as great as another who sits in the councils of state or conducts vast enterprises to success.

He holds a gospel of simplicity of life, earnestness and honesty of purpose. He is a thorough idealist in philosophy, and the usages of society are to him vain and meaningless. He is a non-conformist, like Thoreau, who is one of his ideal men. He eats the plainest of food, wears clothes which are plain to shabbiness, but which let through their tatters some gleams of the soul within. His favorite authors are Plato and Emerson, and the philosophical poets like Goethe. He is a lover of the subtle and transcendental philosophy of the Hindus, and some of the Oriental poets are his delight. His life is quiet and secluded. His household work, his violin, his books, engage the most of his time. He often does a job of carpenter work, or plastering, or blacks a stove for a neighbor, and thus earns an occasional dollar for his household expenses. His most steadfast companion is a kitten, which he cares for with all the affection of a loving nature. He is visited by only a few of the villagers, for his austere life and manners do not attract any save those rare spirits who can look through the rude outer husk and see the kernel of worth within. His whole life is in full keeping with his philosophy. He says that we have precepts enough, and talkers enough and to spare, and that it is time we began to live our philosophy and teach by deeds instead of creeds. He holds that the tongue is but a small part of the man, and that it should not be weighted with the whole burden of his philosophy; but that the whole man should be permeated with truth, and every part and organ preach it by divine action. And so this friend of mine lives in his garret and strives to live divinely. His doctrines are not heard, but seen; not spoken or written, but lived. And whether they be true or false will be shown when the scroll of his life is read by the recording angel who balances every man's account.

THE UNY CLUB.

Thomas Carlyle.

"A trip-hammer with an Æolian attachment."—EMERSON.

FIRST EVENING.

1. Quotations; biographical or autobiographical.
 2. Biographical sketch of Carlyle.
 3. Outline of the essay on Burns, to the paragraph beginning "But to leave the mere literary character of Burns," etc.
- Conversation.*—Instance books that Carlyle would call "lives;" others that he would call biographies? Which tragedy was the greater, the life of Burns or the life of Napoleon? Cf. Matthew Arnold's remarks on the sincerity of Burns, in the introduction to Ward's British Poets. Name Carlyle's three conditions of poetry. Do you like this estimate of Keats? Which song of Burns's is your favorite?

SECOND EVENING.

1. Quotations from the Burns essay.
 2. Outline to complete the essay.
- Conversation.*—Can you answer Carlyle's questions in the fifth paragraph of the essay, applying them to Burns? What was the effect of society on Burns? Of Burns on society? What was "The New Light Priesthood?" Do you agree with Carlyle, when he asserts that Burns, with an university education, would have changed the entire course of British poetry? Do you wish he had had that chance? What is our debt to Burns? Was there not, as Professor Shairp says in his essay on Carlyle, something of Burns's self-conscious assertion in Carlyle himself? How?

3. Readings from poems of Burns.

Essay on "Characteristics."—All the class are supposed to read the entire essay before the first evening, to select some notable or characteristic sentence to be given in the class, and to do as much supplementary reading as possible. Besides the helps in the Carlyle biographies and correspondence, advantage may be taken of such essays as those by Emerson, Lowell (in "Study Windows"), Taine, Professor Shairp and many others. Number the paragraphs.

THIRD EVENING.

1. Quotations.
2. Analysis of the essay to paragraph 13.
3. Analysis to paragraph 27, "But leaving this, let us rather look within."

HELPS TO STUDY.

Paragraph 4 Compare Helen Hunt's poem, "Joy," which was a favorite with Emerson.

Paragraph 5. Illustrate the comparison between the demonstrator and the artist. Does not the poet's instinct often precede the philosopher's reasoning? Have not poets recognized as spiritual truth that which has been afterwards formulated by scientists as natural law? Were Goethe and Emerson forerunners of Darwin and Spencer? Michael Angelo's instinct for beauty gave us the dome of St. Peter's. Later it was discovered by a mathematician that this arch of the greatest beauty is also the arch of the greatest strength.

6. "Genius is always a secret to itself." Is this always true? What of Goethe?

7. "The man of logic and the man of insight." Can you substitute for this "the man of theology and the man of religion?"

Paragraphs 10 and 11. Carlyle's Age of Heroism, when was it? His Age of Moral Philosophy?

Paragraph 15. Read the poem by Emma Lazarus, if you can find it, on the Idea, which moulded the Grecian, the Roman and the Hebrew races. It was first published in Harper's Magazine.

Paragraph 22. When do you think that intellect has advanced most rapidly? Which invention was greatest, glass or spectacles?

Paragraphs 25 and 26. Is it true that poor men are now poorer than ever? Was it true in England? Compare Ruskin's intolerance of "modern improvements." Does this feeling of discontent come from the same causes in the two men? Did the poor of other times ever find a spokesman?

FOURTH EVENING.

1. Quotations.
2. Analysis of essay to paragraph 44, "From this stunning hubbub."
3. Analysis of the rest of the essay.

HELPS TO STUDY.

Unconscious spontaneity is the characteristic of all right performance. Is it better, then, to do right from impulse than after a struggle for principle? Are the noblest deeds done from impulse? Can one have noble impulses after choosing lower things? Will there always be a struggle of some kind? "Always nearer, never near, to God?"

28. Is this the spirit of Emerson's Divinity School Address, "Churches are not built on the principles of Jesus, but on his tropes." Does the world disentangle the religion which Jesus followed from the religion which takes Jesus as its object?

Paragraphs 29 and 30. Where and how do reviewers and critics really help? (Read Cooke's preface to "Poets and Problems.")

33. "The Nature of all Life Movement." If it be recurring stages of convalescence and relapse, where is the evolution? Which is truer, dissolution and evolution, or dissolution in evolution?

35. Have we to-day this age of metaphysics?

44. Friedrich Schlegel and Thomas Hope—who were they, and what was their philosophy?

49. "No good that is possible but that shall one day be real." Read Browning's "Abt Vogler."

54. Is this your definition of a free-thinker?

Why has it been said that this essay contains the essence of all that Carlyle has written? Characterize the essay for yourself, and is it a note of depression or of encouragement to you? Does "The Everlasting Yea" of Carlyle fill him with peace, as it did Emerson? Why not? For which is Carlyle most remarkable, his greatness of thought or his depth of feeling? That is, does he think most or feel most?

Essay on Burns.—Let the quotations be short and characteristic. Bring in questions and helps from other sources whenever possible. For instance, read other essays and poems on Burns; such as the chapter in Shairp's "Aspects of Poetry," the poems by Whittier, Lowell, and others. As introductory to the study of the Burns essay, read the following poems of Burns: "The Cotter's Saturday Night;" "The Wounded Hare;" "To a Mountain Daisy;" "To a Field Mouse;" "Lament of Mary, Queen of Scots;" "To The Unco Guid;" "To The Devil;" "Mary Morrison;" Parting song to Clarinda—"Ae Fond Kiss;" "My love is like a Red, Red Rose;" "Duncan Grey;" "A Man's a Man for a That."

THE STUDY TABLE.

The World to Come. By William Burnet Wright. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Cloth, pp. 307.

The author of this volume says that in his selection of the sermons composing it he has carefully avoided all which treat of questions in debate, and has chosen those which depend for such force as they have upon principles acknowledged by the universal Christian conscience as true. Some of the most interesting of the twenty discourses are those upon "The Model Church," "What Must I Do to be Saved," "Easter," "Flower Sunday," "Decoration Day," "Harvest Sunday," "Christmas." The sermons are practical, elevated in tone, and quite liberal in spirit.

Wit, Wisdom and Beauties of Shakespeare. Edited by Clarence Stuart Ward. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 16mo, pp. 188. Price, $1.25.

This dainty little book is most attractive in appearance. It is put up in blue cloth, with full gilt edges and light gilt lines on upper side of cover, and the paper is fine cream woven.

The contents answers to the title, and is a collection of the finest passages in Shakespeare's best plays. Care has been taken to exclude selections from plays where there is any doubt of Shakespeare's authorship, and, when needed, the context is introduced to set off the true meaning of the quoted passages. There is one defect in the book—its lack of page references to specific thoughts. Should there be a second edition, its value could be greatly enhanced by such topical references. This book and the "Wit and Wisdom of George Eliot" show what can be done in this line. When shall we have the same from Dickens, Holmes, Browning and Charles Lamb? We commend the book as a "thing of beauty," and a mark of the bookmaker's taste in both literary and mechanical work.

Elements of Botany. By Edson S. Bastin, A.M., F.R.M.S. Chicago: G. P. Engelhard & Co.

In this text-book of some 282 pages the author, Professor Bastin, has used with good results his experience, gained by many years spent in teaching botany. The book is divided into four parts—namely: Organography, Vegetable Histology, Vegetable Physiology, and Vegetable Taxonomy, each part being treated very plainly and thoroughly for the necessarily limited space devoted to it. A prominent thought of the author has been to "make the work teach as much as possible by illustrations," of which the book contains nearly 500. As is shown by the title, this book is for beginners in the study of botany, and to these Professor Bastin has given many good words of advice as to the manner in which to use the book. He says, "If you study the book only, you will almost certainly find it dry and unprofitable; but if you use it as a guide to the study of plants, and study it plant in hand, verifying its descriptions by observations of your own, you will find the work not only profitable, but intensely interesting." The practical exercises which have been placed at the end of each chapter will be of great help to the student. At the end of the book is an extensive glossary of botanical terms covering nearly eighteen pages in double columns, printed in very fine type. There is also an index of subjects and an index of the names of plants.

THE HOME.

Wanted—A Little Girl.

Where have they gone to—the little girls,
With natural manners and natural curls,
Who love their dollies and like their toys,
And talk of something besides the boys?

Little old women in plenty I find,
Mature in manners and old of mind;
Little old flirts who talk of their "beaux,"
And vie with each other in stylish clothes.

Little old belles, who, at nine and ten,
Are sick of pleasure and tired of men,
Weary of trave's, of balls, of fun—
And find no new thing under the sun.

Once, in the beautiful long ago,
Some dear little children I used to know;
Girls who were merry as lambs at play,
And laughed and rollicked the livelong day.

They thought not at all of the "style" of their clothes,
They never imagined that boys were "beaux"—
"Other girls' brothers" and "mates" were they;
Splendid fellows to help them play.

Where have they gone to? If you see
One of them anywhere, send her to me.
I would give a medal of purest gold

To one of those dear little girls of old,
With an innocent heart and an open smile,
Who knows not the meaning of "flirt" or "style."
Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

A Little Hero.

The little school house stood on a grassy knoll, with waving fields of grain or wide stretches of prairie on every side. The teacher sat reading by an open window, occasionally glancing up at the little clock which ticked so loudly in the stillness, or looking from the window to listen for the children's voices. How long the nooning seemed those sultry days! It was one o'clock at last, but not one of the little band was in sight. She rang the small bell, but its faint "tinkle-tinkle" did not reach half across the stretch of prairie over which her eyes wandered. Where could the children be? They had never before failed to be back by school-time when they went off flower-hunting. Tired of the solitude, and thinking it time the stragglers were recalled, she put on her hat, and taking down her parasol from its place, started to meet them. She had not gone far before she saw them in the distance. At first she could not tell what they were doing, but soon saw that they were wading in the big slough. Still watching them, she saw signs of something amiss. Could the water be deep enough to be dangerous! As she ran toward them some of the little ones saw and came to meet her, pale and frightened and gaping for breath.

"What is the matter?" she asked anxiously, and from their mingled answers as she almost flew past them, she gathered something about "Grace" and "Allie,"—"the big hole"—and "Jule pulled 'em out." When she reached the spot she saw the children were right. There on the grass, as if dead, lay her precious little sisters, and gathered about them, crying and helpless, was the group of frightened children. Stooping down beside them, she found that they still breathed; so, sending two of the oldest ones to the nearest house for help, she dragged the little forms away from the water, and sat down by them. She took their poor wet heads in her lap, shielding them from the glaring sun with her parasol, watching for returning consciousness, and listening to the children's account, while she waited for the team to come and take them home.

They had all been wading, with no thought of danger, chasing each other about in the water, till Allie sank out of sight. Grace had gone to her as she came up, but instead of helping her had gone down with her. They had got into the big slough-well. What could they do? None of them could swim, and there was no one near enough to reach them before they would drown. But Jule, the little brother, not stopping to think of anything but their danger, rushed in after them and somehow got them out; how he ever did it not even he himself could tell, but he felt as if he "had just got to save them," so he took hold of them, one at a time, and kicked around in the water without touching bottom until he got them out.

It was strange that all three were not drowned, for Jule had never learned to swim, and both the girls were larger than he. I have thought a great deal about it, for Jule is my own little brother, and I cannot see how he kept from sinking with them, unless, in his love and fear for them, he so completely forgot about himself and his own danger that it made him swim naturally, as little animals do. However, it was a pretty big thing for a little eight-year old to do—don't you think so? And whether that was what saved those children's lives or not, self-forgetfulness—a big word, isn't it?—is a great thing, and does wonders.

GAZELLE STEVENS SHARP.

Youthful Wisdom.

One day a little girl, about five years old, heard a preacher praying most lustily, until the roof fairly rang with the strength of his supplications. Turning to her mother, and beckoning the maternal ear down to a speaking place, she whispered: "Mamma, don't you think that if he lived nearer God he wouldn't have to talk so loud?"

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Chicago.—The Union teachers' meeting Monday noon was led by Mr. Blake, the lesson being upon the seventh chapter of Luke. The first incident recorded here is the healing of the servant of the centurion. The faith of this Roman officer struck Jesus as wonderful; this is one of the two instances in the Gospels where it is said of Jesus that he marveled. The other instance presents him as marveling at unbelief among the Jews; here the wonder is at belief in a Roman. The distinction between myth and legend was explained. A legend incloses a fact, as a leaf or bit of wood may be inclosed by an incrustation of limestone; a myth presents some moral or truth in narrative form, but originated in that truth, and not in any facts such as the narrative pictures. The raising from the dead of the son of the widow of Nain was spoken of as a myth. Luke means to give an account of a miracle, of a resurrection by the power of a word, just as in Genesis the worlds were created by a word.

—All Souls church has recently opened a very good circulating library containing upwards of 300 volumes, open to the public on the payment of ten cents a month. A reading-room has also been opened for the public from 3:30 to 9 P. M. daily. A series of "Nickel Talks" has also been arranged for on Saturday mornings, from 11 to 12, for the benefit of the children; the same to be repeated on Thursday evenings for the benefit of the older people. The first will be a series of four "Emergency Talks;" or "What to do till the Doctor Comes"—by Dr. G. F. Shears, superintendent of the Hahnemann Hospital—beginning Saturday, December 10. This congregation recently enjoyed a rare treat in listening to a Sunday evening lecture from Rabbi Hirsch, on "The Pharisee and the Sadducee," and are looking forward with interest to the coming of Mr. Mangasarian, of Philadelphia, who is to preach with them on an exchange with their pastor next Sunday, and to lecture next Monday evening, on "Mohammed, and the Rites and Ceremonies of the Turks."

—The Channing Club held its first meeting on the 30th ult., at the Tremont house. Rev. T. J. Milsted opened the discussion upon the "The Personal Element in Charity," and was followed by Joseph Shippen, W. Alexander Johnson, of the C. O. S., Andrew Crawford, Esq., and others. Owing to other local attractions or distractions, the attendance was not large, but the evening was such as to prove the value and service of such an organization as the Channing Club.

—The new movement of the colored people, under the name of the Temple church, really the Fifth Unitarian church of Chicago, seems to be moving quietly on to success. Plans are already made and published for a sensible church building, with interesting accessories, which, in addition to the land, will cost $30,000, and we understand one-half of the money is already subscribed. Members of this society gave a pleasing concert on Friday evening, December 2, at the Third Unitarian church, in the interests of this building fund, and the concert was repeated at All Souls church on Wednesday evening last. It can not be mentioned in these columns this week, but Mr. Blake wrote of their last week's performance: "We had a charming evening with our friends of the Fifth Unitarian church of this city, called the People's Temple church, and the first African Unitarian church in the world. They gave us an admirable concert. Our people were greatly pleased with it and with them as well as with their performance, and gave them a warm personal greeting afterward. You will be charmed with their entertainment and their presence."

—Brother Batchelor's face lights up the headquarters at Chicago whenever he is in the city. His visits to the western churches are everywhere spoken of to his credit, and he seems to find much that gives him joy and hopefulness for our western work in these churches. Recently he has visited our churches in western Iowa and Kansas, and after the Michigan Conference will face eastward for the holidays.

Philadelphia, Pa.—The exchanges projected, the series of Union meetings, of which one has already been held, the establishment of the Institute, together with the hearty support which has been extended to Unity Journal, which proposes to be broadly representative of the work achieved hereabouts, are proofs of a renewal of the spirit of jointure in the liberal churches of this vicinity. To demand, effect, and maintain such a fellowship, which would dare include ethical, as well as other societies, would testify to the performance of a gracious and important duty. —Rev. Mr. Longfellow's sermon at Germantown made an excellent impression, and will be published. Its radical references to the ethical societies were worthy not only of the speaker, but of the man for whom he that day substituted. It is the foreshadowing of an inevitable union. —The quarterly to be issued by the Union of Ethical Societies is to have Philadelphia as its place of publication, and Miss Charlotte Porter, of Shakespeareana, and S. B. Weston, as its editors. H. L. T.

Boston, Mass.—Rev. J. Freeman Clarke's society has, for the forty-six years of its existence, held to the free-pew system, really welcoming strangers to their services with a choice of any seats in their hired hall of the early days, and in their present church. His church has always seemed very homelike to new attendants. Families all the year usually occupy the same pews, yet are not disturbed if a stranger enters, or even for a single Sunday dispossesses their proprietary habit. The sexton makes the system work satisfactorily, by knowing his business well. Mr. Clarke thinks that a society in a large city which finds its surroundings changed and its former families and pew owners scattered, would still be successful by making theirs a people's church, with free seats—supporting itself, as his society has done, by voluntary subscriptions. He argues that all our church rates are voluntary subscriptions, and that in many churches maintaining pew rentals, an annual deficiency of the treasury is paid by a voluntary collection from friends most able and most interested. E. R. B.

Certificate of Fellowship.—Mr. Giles B. Stebbins, of Detroit, Mich., having presented to the Committee on Fellowship, appointed by the National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian churches, satisfactory assurances of his desire and fitness to enter upon the work of the Unitarian ministry, we hereby extend to him the hand of fellowship, and commend him to the confidence of our churches.

Wichita, Kan.—Unity Sunday Circle, organized by Rev. J. R. Effinger, is growing steadily, not only in numbers but in hopes and "great expectations." Rev. Enoch Powell, of Topeka, has preached three excellent sermons for us, and last Sunday gave notice that Rev. N. S. Hogleland, of Greeley, Colo., would be with us to stay, and in the near future we hope to build the handsomest church edifice in the "Peerless City." The Sunday-school has had only two sessions, but has twenty for a beginning. Mrs. Fannie E. Seward is superintendent. Mr. Effinger may well be proud of the work he accomplished while here, for it was well and faithfully performed. The pay was small, but a greater reward is in store for him. Our numbers are small, but in "unity" there is strength. J. L. SEWARD.

Cincinnati, Ohio.—Mr. Thayer is preaching a series of Sunday morning sermons on the Truths and Errors of Orthodoxy. The following are the subjects: "Orthodoxy and Heterodoxy;" "Trinity in Unity;" "Inspiration and Revelation;" "Predestination;" "Atonement;" "Resurrection;" "Everlasting Retribution;" "The Assumptions of Catholicism, True and False."

Jamestown, N. Y.—Mr. Hosmer and Dr. Townsend exchanged pulpits on Sunday last. Both spoke twice, morning and evening. Mr. Hosmer also lectured to a good audience in Dr. Townsend's church on Friday evening on "The Crusades."

EDITORIAL.

THE editor of the Standard is troubled because Dr. Armistage, author of a "History of the Baptist," knows what a "trump card" is. This Baptist editor does not know what it is, nor does "any of his household," he assures us, and they are very happy in their agnosticism.

THE Universalist tells a good story of the wife of Gen. Crook throwing some water-cress out of a car window while traveling through Arizona; the savory herbs fell into a brook and took root, and now cresses grow abundantly in that part of the territory. This is the way to civilize the arid territory of human nature. Our unconscious planting brings often the greatest results.

It is said that the crisis and change in the French government has had, and will have, a very unfavorable effect upon De Lesseps' canal scheme at Panama. Poor De Lesseps! His immortality was sure without undertaking this stupendous work, the dividing the American continents and uniting the two greatest oceans; and yet, somehow, this failure in his old age will prevent our feeling his greatness as we should have felt it had he rested upon his honors without undertaking it. The case is even worse than that; his failure involves the loss of their hoarded earnings by many thousands of people in France who can ill afford to lose, and we rightly attach blame to him, through whose unwisdom the innocent suffer.

THE Christian Union suggests that the time may come when in our cities every ward shall have its free library and reading-room, just as it now has its free school-house. The expense of such libraries would not be great, would be insignificant, indeed, compared with that of the schools, and the good done would seem to be more immediate, as the reading classes are older than the school children. Such libraries, however, should be carefully selected and managed; for they could only be justified—as, indeed, the public schools are chiefly to be justified—as a measure of prudence, economy and self-defense on the part of a republican form of government.

THE leading article in the Atlantic for December, written by Mr. E. H. House, is entitled "The Thralldom of Japan," which title will doubtless give it a wide reading. We Unitarians, at any rate, are much interested in Japan just now, and hope the United States will do her duty in regard to any thralldom under which the Japanese may be suffering. Mr. House's article, however, we fear will not make a very favorable impression. He describes real wrongs without doubt; but a much simpler and clearer statement of them, with less vehemence of argumentation, would surely have produced a better effect.

OUR Methodist friends are the champion financiers of Christendom. Is that a compliment? We do not know. A recent number of the Northwestern Christian Advocate speaks of a successful dedication of a church in Wisconsin. The improvement cost $11,000, and on the day of opening $8,500 was unprovided for, but a Chicago doctor of divinity preached and "managed the finances," this secured a subscription of $6,500, which, with the "better leverage the church will have upon the public, leaves matters in a hopeful condition." The italics are ours. Is it a "leverage" on the purses of the public that the church is to aim at? The same paper speaks enthusiastically of a Chicago pastor, who, finding that there would be a $6,000 debt on a new church,

"proceeded to devise all kinds of partnerships, members' funds, Sunday-school syndicates and special class treasurers to assume the fat ends of the cost;" and so the church was "presented to the Lord" free from debt! What has that church to say, for some time at least, against booms in real estate, bulls on board of trade, Standard Oil trusts, monopolies, and sharp bargainers in "futures?" The editor prays that this church, beautiful in $65,000 cost, may be the "cause of thousands walking the streets and boulevards of the New Jerusalem."

THEY have been having an interesting case of conscience in Dubuque. Some of the leading ladies of that city, who are interested in the Iowa Home for the Friendless, have been in the habit of giving a ball in support of that institution annually. This year a revival was in progress in the Evangelical churches, and the time of the ball was postponed on that account—giving the revival, as was supposed, time to culminate, mature, and reap its fruits. The time, however, seems to have been insufficient, and the revival was still in progress when the date of the ball approached. The ministers interested in the revival offered to raise as much money as the ball would probably net the ladies for the Home for the Friendless, if the invitations to the dance should be canceled. No attention was paid to this offer, and a little later somebody else offered the ladies a thousand dollars—much more than they would net by their entertainment, if they would desist. Then the ladies took the matter into prayerful consideration; but, with woman's proverbial pluck, they came out with a declaration, from which the following sentences are quoted:

"As a band of Christian women, working for a charitable institution, we cannot consistently, or in justice to ourselves, admit or assume, for any consideration, that this innocent amusement that we have for years provided as a means to help us in support of our charitable work, can be in any way inconsistent or detrimental to a Christian life or character. We earnestly recommend these young converts . . . to lean not on any human arm for counsel or support, but, as individuals, to search their own consciences, . . . follow its dictates fearlessly and cheerfully."

AN important conference was held in Washington, D. C., last week, consisting of leading representatives of the Evangelical churches of the country. That they were assembled in the interest of high concerns and perplexing problems, is evident from the following extract from the call: "The Christian church has not yet fully recognized its relations to the entire life of the community and the nation. All Christian men, preoccupied with private concerns and overburdened by the demands on their time, are prone to neglect the public welfare, and are loath to accept any responsibility for existing evils. Denominations and local churches, each intent on its own good work, have fallen into a harmful competition instead of engaging in an intelligent and comprehensive co-operation. Our marvelous material growth and the progress of invention have produced new conditions, to which business has been quick to adapt its methods. Do not important changes in population and in the habits and temper of the people require some changes in the methods of Christian work? Among the questions to be discussed are the following: 1. What are the present perils and opportunities of the Christian church and of the country? 2. Can any of them be met best by a hearty co-operation of all Evangelical Christians, which, without detriment to any denominational interests, will serve the welfare of the whole church? 3. What are the best means to secure such co-operation, and to waken the whole church to its responsibility? This is another significant sign that the trend of thought is toward unity. Why draw the line at Evangelical Christians? But it is a great step forward to ignore the smaller lines inside. Let the Evangelicals unite; let the Liberal forces unite, and by and by these two alliances will strike hands.

THAT Jacob Sharp should be at liberty, and Anarchist Most behind the bars, will probably be taken as a sign of the times by a certain class of foreigners contemplating emigration to America—let us at least hope so! And it seems at least not unlikely that the same sentiment may have had something to do in bringing about the results in the two cases. That sentiment may be worded, "Law and order at any rate, righteousness and liberty if we can." The sort of liberty some classes seem most desirous of finding and enjoying in this country, no government can guarantee or maintain. It is the sort of liberty looked for by the foreigner in the old story, who, met by a furious dog, attempted to pick up a paving stone to throw at him, and, the stone remaining firm in the pavement, exclaimed: "And you call this a free country, with your stones all chained, and your dogs let loose!"

THE Interior says that "the Congo Free State bids fair to be almost literally destroyed by the barrels of whisky, and still worse forms of spirituous liquors, which the Christian nations of Europe are yearly pouring upon the untutored but rum-loving people of the great Congo valley." It further says: "Two or three years ago 900 barrels of whisky were landed on the shores of Madagascar, with a brand which indicated that they had come from a professedly Christian nation. The authorities of that once heathen nation actually purchased this cargo of whisky and knocked the barrels in the head, that their vile contents might be swallowed up by the sand rather than by the people." Surely, how empty a thing is the Christian name ever in danger of becoming! And yet this same paper sees no hope for the pagan millions, save through the name of Jesus Christ!

WE regret to read in the last number of The Open Court, that that paper under its present name and editorship is to be discontinued. With Mr. and Mrs. Underwood in charge, our neighbor has deserved its name of "Open Court" by the fairness and the solidity of its articles; and, if their "Court" must close, we hope the same trained judges will be heard from elsewhere, serving their old cause of freedom and character in religion. We copy part of their farewell:

When the editors of The Open Court came west, early in the present year, to establish and conduct this journal, they entered upon a work which they then hoped would continue many years. Some months previously, B. F. Underwood had notified the trustees of The Index, of which he had been manager and co-editor five years, of his intention to resign that position at the end of the year to take charge of the new journalistic enterprise. Subsequently the trustees voted to discontinue The Index, and among the considerations which led to the decision was the belief that the new paper, under the management announced, would "continue the work of The Index," and be not an unworthy successor of that paper.

Mr. Hegeler had long entertained the thought, and had often mentioned to B. F. Underwood, his purpose of founding a liberal journal in the west, and had repeatedly expressed the desire that he should have charge of it. Now, when the work is but just begun, only a few months from the date of the first number, the editors have to announce that this work, so far as their connection with the paper is concerned, is at an end. It is sufficient, perhaps, to say that the immediate cause of the editors' resignation is Mr. Hegeler's expressed desire and purpose to make a place on The Open Court for Dr. Paul Carus, who never had, it should here be said, any editorial connection with the paper, who never wrote a line for it except as a contributor and as Mr. Hegeler's secretary, and who was unknown to Mr. Hegeler when his contract with the editors was made. To the request that Dr. Carus be accepted as an associate editor, the present editors, for good and sufficient reasons, have unhesitatingly refused to accede; and although always willing to make concessions when required in the interests of the paper, a point is now reached where they feel compelled by self-respect to sever all relations with this journal rather than yield to Mr. Hegeler's latest requirement. At the same time the editors acquit the proprietor of the paper of any intentional injustice in this matter, and appreciate his high purpose in founding and sustaining The Open Court. May its future fulfill his highest expectations!

It is with deep regret that the editors now abruptly bid farewell to the contributors, to whom the paper is indebted for almost all that has made it valuable, and the readers of The Open Court, among whom they count many personal friends.

Who are the Descendants of the Puritans?

We are approaching Forefathers' Day, which, following hard upon the Thanksgiving joy, leads to a commendable pride among those who boast of Puritan blood in their veins; and this leads us to inquire, who are the true descendants of the Puritans?

Not they who are yet fighting the battles of the seventeenth century, and go stalking about like goblins in the grave-clothes of a dead generation; not they who are trying to sow the broad fields of a new West with the creed-corn found in Cromwell's haversacks, but they who are dealing Cromwellian blows to the evils and the falsehoods of to-day; they who are still Pilgrims riding the unmapped main of some new Atlantic in another "Mayflower" of progress to some other Plymouth Rock of an advanced idea; they who are to-day willing to sign some new Declaration of Independence, demanding some larger liberty; they who are battling for an emancipation from tradition and conventionality, who are repudiating the doctrines that have been drained of their inspiration.

"They were men of present valor, stalwart old inconoclasts,
Unconvinced by axe or gibbet that all virtue was the past's.
But we make their truth our falsehood, thinking that hath made us free,
Hoarding it in mouldy parchments, while our tender spirits flee
The rude grasp of that great impulse which drove them across the sea.

"They have rights who dare maintain them; we are traitors to our sires,
Smothering in their holy ashes freedom's new-lit altar-fires;
Shall we make their creed our jailer?
Shall we, in our haste to slay,
From the tombs of the old prophets steal the funeral lamps away
To light up the martyr-fagots round the prophets of to-day?

"New occasions teach new duties—time makes ancient good uncouth;
They must upward still, and onward, who would keep abreast of truth;
Lo, before us gleam her camp-fires: we ourselves must Pilgrims be,
Launch our 'Mayflower,' and steer boldly through the desperate winter sea,
Nor attempt the future's portal with the past's blood-rusted key."

Who are the descendants of the Puritans? Not the president of the Andover Theological School, who, with his co-laborers, takes solemn oath every five years that he thinks the same thoughts that his grandfather did; rather Emerson, the lineal descendant of seven generations of Puritan preachers, is the true descendant of the Puritan; for Emerson has inherited the independent character—the spirit of the Puritan; the Andover man has inherited the Puritan creed. This Andover man has a doleful task on hand. He has mounted guard over a chest of dead bones. He is walking the beat, like the sentinel on the ramparts of Quebec, of whom Henry Thoreau tells us, armed to the teeth. His presence there, as the corporal explained to Thoreau, was because "there hused to be ha harsenal 'ere many years hago, hand the guard 'as never been discharged, sir." Let him, then, who would enter into the spiritual line of the Puritans, who would really inherit their message, hold aloft the white banner of conscience, upon which is written in letters of living light the Puritan's battle-cry, nay, the battle cry of every true soldier of heaven since time began—"Duty." Let this banner be held above the time-serving, thought-shrinking battalions of men. The old battle of our Puritan forefathers is still raging. It has shifted ground a little. The desire for popularity gags the religious teacher now, as in the day of the Roundheads; conscience is muffled by the god, Conformity, now as then; expediency, cat-like, stealthily treads and purrs around the altars of religion, now as then; the marts of trade and the halls of state, now as in the days of Charles I., are threatened by those who would buy peace at the cost of liberty, and sell honesty for prosperity. We need to marshal another Cromwellian army—an army given to plain speaking, an army sworn to call things by their true names. We need a new Puritanism to call "a spade a spade" in religion. There are grave questions waiting such a discussion—questions far more vital than any that can come in dogmatic theology. These awful questions, nay, let me say sublime, inspiring questions of capital and labor; of temperance reform; the claim of woman, asking that her place in society be determined by the measure of her intelligence, the purity of her purpose, the quality of her service, rather than by her facility of enduring a march, of carrying a musket, or the place prescribed for her by Miss Prudy, Madame Grundy or the self-appointed lord of creation, who is so anxious to help the Lord of the universe keep woman within her proper sphere—these are questions pressing hard upon us, and they call for the Puritan idea to preside over the discussion.

We do not say that the Puritan idea belongs to one side of any of these questions any more than to the other. It is not a conclusion, but a method of mind; it is an attitude of soul. It is not a stake to which you can tie, but the road upon which you ought to travel; it is that which is opposed to timidity, to insincerity, to time-serving and to partisanship; it is opposed to indifference and hollow pretension. We know how fallible the human judgment is, how treacherous even the decisions of conscience sometimes are, and what a sorry dance duty sometimes leads its devotees, and yet we believe it to be the highest and safest standard taken by man. We believe in the virility of conscience and the vitality of self-reliance. You say it will not work in society, it can not be applied to politics. We point you to the supremacy of Massachusetts over the sisterhood of states, and Massachusetts, more than any other state in the Union, has been carved out of Puritan loyalty; point you to the beauty and power of the lives of our public men who have been most obedient to the Puritan idea—they who apply to public as to private problems but one question, "What is the right in the matter?" who always measure their conduct by the yard-stick of duty—Horace Mann, Gerrit Smith, John Pierpont, Lloyd Garrison, John Andrew, and Charles Sumner—aye, even such grave dreamers as Henry Thoreau, and the grim hero of Harper's Ferry, grand old Osawatimie Brown. Condemn his methods as we must; deplore his deeds as we do; scoff at his insanity as we may; call him mad, which he may have been, yet, in spite of all this, he stands in history like Michael Angelo's Moses in art, a clear cut, majestic, commanding, marble figure, because his spirit was right though his methods were wrong, his conscience was erect though his deeds were crooked, his madness was of the prophetic kind, by virtue of which he wrote his name with his own hand among the imperishable records of the immortals. His story will set sluggish blood boiling in the hearts of men way down in the dim vistas of futurity, and when the names of his proper and kid-gloved critics will have passed forever from the face of the earth, the picture of the pinioned old man, smiling at the serene loveliness of the Virginia hills as he passed to his execution, saluting the colored people for whose liberty he was giving his life in ransom, will remain clear and conspicuous in the gallery dedicated to human nobility—not because he loved truth wisely, but because he loved her strongly; not because he followed duty judiciously, but because he followed it so loyally. God pours his infinity into the arm that wields the flashing steel even, if duty has consecrated it. Through the mistakes of men right has triumphed, if their mistakes were illumined by the Puritanic glow of sincerity.

Mr. Batchelor's New Book.*

We were interrupted in the reading of Mr. Batchelor's interesting book, by the arrival of the Christian Register. In it our author is giving an account of his experience among the western churches, to which he comes as a representative of the American Unitarian Association. He seems to suppose he may be in the enemy's country, and displays a weapon or two to let the western churches know (we suppose) what may be expected if he is attacked. In other words, he writes: "To make my point of view absolutely clear then, let me say that two propositions are rejected by my intellect, conscience and common sense. The first is the statement that ethics is the basis of religion. The second is that any good man, working for good things, is a Unitarian." Mr.

Batchelor freely admits that others may honestly differ from him on these points, and be useful to the cause of religion; but the emphasis of his protest remains.

To take up the second proposition first, "that every good man is a Unitarian." This, it must be said, is like stretching another word, which is growing a little fixed in meaning, and saying that all good men are Christians. Dr. Parks, of Andover, once declared, in the enthusiasm of orthodox jubilee festivities, that every man of common sense is a Calvinist. And yet, inexact as the language is, there is a certain breadth and magnanimity of sentiment in such utterances, which contrasts favorably with that narrowness of spirit which would exclude every one from the use and privilege of a name, unless he can accept it as historically or philosophically defined. We are reminded of the language of the lay-brother and of the Jew in Lessing's "Nathan the Wise," who saw in each other's virtues something beyond the theologies which separated them—saw a deeper life which united them:

Lay Brother. "You are a Christian, Nathan! Yes, by Heaven, you are a Christian! Never was a better!"

Nathan. "What makes of me a Christian in your eyes, makes you in mine a Jew. Happy for both!"

So when we consider the make-up of our own churches, and other similar people who are not in them, but ought to be, we often, undoubtedly, depart widely from Mr. Batchelor's idea of a Unitarian, in our use of the word. We think of certain liberal tendencies of thought; of the emphasis laid upon virtue and right living as compared with rites and confessions; of persons who have inherited the faith, but who do not care enough about it to learn what it is; in short, we think of Unitarianism as we were taught to think of Christianity—as a life rather than a theology; as an attitude toward truth and duty rather than a system of determined doctrines. And we have hitherto been willing to have any and all men wear the name who wanted to, or were in general sympathy with our aims.

Dr. George Putman said in his sermon on Unitarianism: "There are more Unitarians—a thousand to one—outside of the Unitarian organization than inside of it; that is, Unitarians essentially, in spirit and in principle, without the name and without the technical doctrines." Now if Mr. Batchelor thinks this a very loose and dangerous way of talking, which ought to be corrected, he will certainly find friendly allies in this western field. But all the same, we fear the looseness will continue—or, at least, until some rigid and vigorous and authoritative definition of Unitarianism is promulgated and made the test of all fellowship under the Unitarian name.

We imagine that test, however, will not be made on the question of the first proposition, which Mr. Batchelor rejects, with his "intellect, conscience, and common sense," viz., "that ethics is the basis of religion." This involves philosophical distinctions of considerable difficulty—distinctions which, we are persuaded, are not well understood, even by writers of speculative ability; while those who write from a practical standpoint are just as contradictory in their utterances.

This proposition concerning the relation of ethics to religion, naturally brings us back to our author's book. For we find that, what seems to us the most ambitious essay in it, has for its object to deny that religion has either an ethical or a scientific basis. As a matter of speculation, this problem needs clearing up. Unfortunately for us, Mr. Batchelor has not succeeded in doing it. In the struggle between intuitional and evidential systems, we find ourselves still clinging to some of the old-fashioned notions. Indeed, the very ingenious chapter on "Religion its own Evidence," has raised more difficulties than it has settled. Our impression is that the words "science," "ethics," "religion," "facts," "experience," "basis," have other meanings, sanctioned by usage, which lead to a very different conclusion. Nor are we convinced that our author is always consistent with himself; although we need to bear in mind that the book is made up of essays, written somewhat independently of each other, and separated by considerable intervals of time.

* Social Equilibrium, and other Problems, Ethical and Religious. By George Batchelor. Boston: Geo. H. Ellis.

But Mr. Batchelor, though sometimes tempted, like other strong writers, to make a paradoxical statement, says things hard to forget, and worth remembering. He stimulates thought, and most perhaps where we find in his language a questionable sense. Those of our readers who have met with some of these papers in the Unitarian Review, or elsewhere, and who appreciate the grace and vigor of Mr. Batchelor's style, will welcome this collection. There is not one that is not worth reading. One of the best seems to us to be, "The Natural History of the Moral Ideal;" while "Questions and a Correspondence," by Rev. George Axford, would make one of the best tracts for denominational use that we know of. It addresses itself to a great number of people in our times, west as well as east, who, like Mary Alden, effected by "scientific" thought, waver in their belief in God and immortality, yet who never waver on the path of duty. And the solution of the difficulty is in the direction indicated by Mr Axford: "I do not expect to find God in matter until I find him in spirit. Find him there, and you find him everywhere. Miss him there, and you find him nowhere." For, as Lecky says: "Our knowledge of the Supreme Excellence, our best evidence even of the existence of the Creator, is derived not from the material universe, but from our own moral nature." Moreover, to quote the historian of "European Morals" a little further on the relation of religion to ethics, he says: "The lines of our moral nature tend upward. In it we have the common root of religion and ethics; for the same consciousness that tells us, that even when it is in fact the weakest element of our constitution, it is by right supreme, commanding, and authoritative, teaches us also that it is divine."

And Fichte writes that that morality which is but jurisprudence or legality, "forbidding injustice between man and man," suggests and passes on to a higher morality, which is the foundation or the gateway to religion. His words are: "Through the higher morality alone, and those who have been inspired by it, have religion—and in particular the Christian religion—wisdom and science, legislation and culture, art and all else that we possess of good and venerable, been introduced into the world."

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

Recompense.

An idle page, turning a rusty key,
Made the strange discovery.

For years it had lain in the casket there,
Treasure long-lost and rare;
Envy of many a noble duke and earl,
A dead queen's splendid pearl.

By a chance as strange, proving greater wrong,
I found this poet's song;
Unhonored of men, whose slights he forgave,
He sleeps in a nameless grave.

The pearl was bestowed on the kingdom's heir;
The song saved my heart from despair.

CELIA PARKER WOOLLEY.

Our Every-day Charity.

A SUNDAY CIRCLE TALK.

Although we may sometimes be puzzled over just how far charity shall enter into the punishing of crime, we may be quite sure of this fact—that charity can be very safely exercised in nearly all our homes. It is a well-established saying that charity begins at home. But if charity within the home has been so universal as to give rise to this saying, why have we not happier homes? I do not refer to your home—nor to yours—but to some of those homes in the great world outside —homes where the hearth-fires burn dimly, and the flowers of love and faith droop and wither for lack of just a little of the sweet dew of charity. Nothing of what the newspapers would call "shocking" occurs in these homes. There is no wife-murder, no husband-shooting, no beating of children to death, but yet there is death in the air—a slow death under the cold, dismal, everlasting, equinoctial storm of fault-finding, mean retaliations, persistent discouragements and petty exactions, which know no cessation. Charity has no beginning in these homes. And yet it is in them that the outside friend will be sweetly welcomed and the friend's child amused and petted; the table will be attractive, bright smiles will be worn, pleasant themes chosen for conversation, and personal faults and shortcomings be given as wide a berth as if they were dynamite bombs with the fuse smoking! But the guests depart, enfolded, so to speak, in pleasant good-nights and cordial good wishes, and—what then? The good cheer is turned down—along with the gas! The wife is perhaps upbraided for some little thoughtless speech, or the husband rebuked for a trifling neglect of etiquette. Charley has "eaten too much cake," little Grace is roundly scolded for the chocolate stain on her white apron, and both are hustled off to bed, without even one of the many smiles and good-nights that so pleasantly cheered the departure of the company.

Sons and daughters growing up in such homes become dwarfed and warped in the damp and depressing atmosphere. They leave home gladly, and are glad to go separate ways, and if they ever obtain happy and symmetrical moral growth, they owe it to outside aids, or to the unfolding of some divine character-seed, that has escaped the general mildew of home influence. And yet the people in these double-faced homes pretend to love each other! The scolding mother would give her life for her child; the brother who teases his sister into a crying fit would promptly knock down any other fellow attempting a similar facetiousness; and the husband who scolds and grumbles at his wife, year after year, and is never once sorry, would wear very deep and very heartfelt crape on his hat, if the object of his petty tempers should die. But what avails this most successfully hidden regard? It is not only in death or other occasions of grief that we most need the tender and patient side of love which is called charity. We need an every-day charity, a good, stout week-day charity, that will wash and wear, and always be as good as new.

It is everywhere considered great moral good manners to speak well of the dead. Why not speak well of the living? Why not be as tender of the heart that struggles beside us against the current of existence as of the pulseless and lifeless one that is laid away in the dust, deaf and unminding? Why can we not bestow our charitable feelings where they will pay best and bring the largest returns? Why should we persist in having "Careful thoughts for the stranger,

And smiles for the sometime guest;
Yet oft for our own the bitter tone,
Though we love our own the best?"

Report of the Directors' Meeting of the W. W. U. C.

The directors' meeting of the Western Women's Unitarian Conference was held Thursday, December 1, at the headquarters, 175 Dearborn street, Chicago. There were present: Mrs. West in the chair, Mrs. Brown, of Hyde Park; Mrs. Warren, of Hinsdale; Mrs. Jones, Mrs. Hilton, Miss Hilton, of Chicago.

The reports of the secretary and treasurer were submitted and adopted. Resignations from Miss LeDuc, of Minnesota, and Miss Roberts, of Chicago, were read and accepted—the latter with special regret, owing to her long service as director and former secretary to this conference. Mrs. F. M. Houts, of Decatur, Tex., was elected to fill the vacancy caused by Mrs. Roberts' withdrawal, and the secretary was requested to correspond with Mr. Crothers, of St. Paul, in reference to a successor to Miss LeDuc, for Minnesota.

Letters were read from the directors, Mrs. Learned, of St. Louis, reporting for Missouri. From Kansas City the following: "The Women's Aid Society is in good working order. All seem enthusiastic, earnest and hopeful. They have paid one-fourth on a $2,000 lot, the eventual sale of which is to go toward furnishing the church parlors. They are working for the poor, and have a literary club of old and young just organized." The church of the Messiah, St. Louis, have a Postoffice Mission Committee, and are distributing liberal literature. The church of the Unity, St. Louis, are doing earnest Postoffice Mission work with increased interest and vigor. The branch association of the W. W. U. C. has held four well attended meetings. The last was to consider the "Ideal Church," which aroused a discussion full of interest, and a declaration from several that they had never held a better meeting.

Mrs. Udell, of Grand Rapids, reported for Michigan. Detroit—"The Unitarian women are interested in three directions, namely: The raising of money by a Christmas sale, to be used for any good or needed purpose; the benevolent work for families outside the church fellowship, and the living interest in the conference, or "Independent Class," the papers and discussions of which follow the opening exercises of the Sunday-school, both men and women participating. "At Manistee and Jackson the women do no charitable work as a church; the former are active in a Ladies' Aid Society of the town; the latter in an association composed of all churches, and in proportion to its size, it does more than any other. The building of the church parlors is the result of their last two years' work. In East Saginaw they have a Woman's Society and Unity Club, and were never in a more prosperous condition. At Midland the women are helping to carry on the church work, but have no Unity Club or special church interest. Kalamazoo, Big Rapids, Grand Rapids, Grand Haven and Muskegon have little to report, and the societies are all more or less in a comatose condition. At Athens and Sherwood, Miss Hultin preaches once a month, and at the former town they have a sermon and Sunday-school each Sunday.

Miss Gould, of Davenport, for Iowa—"At Humboldt there is a Postoffice Mission Committee, but doing little for lack of means, though Miss Murdock is in hearty sympathy, and wishes to extend the work. A Unity Club is in active operation there. At Iowa City no organized work, but Mr. Beavis distributes A. U. A. tracts among the students. At Fort Dodge no services have been held since spring. There is quite a group of Unitarians there, but no unity of work. At Des Moines the Postoffice Mission Committee have started to work with considerable earnestness. At Sioux City the Postoffice Mission work is steadily growing in the hands of an active committee. At Davenport the society is very active." A Postoffice Mission Committee carries four registers, and proposes to raise money for its work by lectures rather than church collections—a suggestion that other committees would do well to note.

Mrs. Hiscock, of Denver, for Colorado.—At Denver "great enthusiasm is felt in all of our working departments." A Unity Club is in active operation, which dispatches one of the ten great novels each evening. The Ladies' Aid Society will give its usual festival in December, and the Woman's Auxiliary Conference has an increased membership, and is holding its meetings regularly for hearing papers and discussions on religious, literary, and reformatory subjects.

Miss Gale, of Cleveland, reports that the Postoffice Mission Committee keep an advertisement in the daily paper, and have frequent requests for papers and sermons. She is sure that "liberal thought is spreading fast in our part of the country."

Mrs. Jennings, of La Porte, for Indiana.—In Hobart the women are very active in their church work, and in the absence of a permanent minister the success of the society depends largely upon them. La Porte.—The most earnest temperance workers are Unitarians. The president and secretary of the Women's Christian Temperance Union are both Unitarians. Two free kindergartens have been established and controlled by our women, although the membership is very general. The Unity Club is studying Emerson, feeling deeply the harmonizing and uplifting influence of the work.

Mrs. Roberts, of Aberdeen, for Dakota.—The Postoffice Mission work is largely in the hands of eastern friends. At Aberdeen need of money is the great hindrance to strong work.

A letter was read from Mrs. Sunderland, presenting her resignation as chairman of the Religious Study Class Committee, which was accepted, and Mrs. Learned, of St. Louis, elected as her successor. Mrs. Jones was elected our delegate to the Michigan Conference at Jackson, December 6 to 8. Canon Farrar's address on "Temperance" was submitted to the directors for consideration as a suitable tract to be distributed from this office, through the Conference. The meeting then adjourned.

While the above reports show good work being done, they prove that there are great opportunities for zealous Unitarian women of the west to serve their cause. Every woman in our denomination ought to belong to the Western Women's Unitarian Conference. Then we should not only have the great momentum which a strong body of sympathizers gives to a movement, but we should have the many single dollars which would make it possible to carry forward this work in the large and dignified way in which it should be done. Wherever there is a church, society or circle, there should be a delegate membership of $5.00, sent by the women, which entitles them to three delegates to the annual session of the Western Women's Unitarian Conference. Among every such group of Unitarians there should be a Postoffice Mission Committee, advertising and distributing our literature. There ought to be among the women more distinctively religious study-classes, rather than so many purely literary. In the state of Missouri there are but four Unitarian churches; in Dakota, two; in Colorado, three; in Indiana, three; in Kansas, two; in Kentucky, one; Nebraska, three; Ohio, three; none in Oregon, Idaho, Indian Territory, New Mexico, Texas.

Ought not such facts to arouse our women to renewed energy—to realize as never before the great fields waiting for our labors, and to remember always that our organization exists to spread freedom, fellowship and character in religion? And let us be true to our trust.

THE UNITY CLUB.

GREELEY, COLO., November 8, 1887.

MR. A. J. RICH, Cor. Sec'y Unity Club Bureau.

Dear Sir:—Your "introduction" for the work of the coming winter, published in last UNITY, was read with much pleasure and I am eager to do something that will help on the cause. For the last eight years I have been more or less closely connected with organizations of a local nature that had always for their object "stimulation of individual thought." My most interesting labor has been in mapping out courses of reading for individuals that should develop and liberalize at the same time; and one of the greatest sources of satisfaction is that I have "converted" a round score from a life of orthodox sloth to one of liberal activity.

Our club work will not be fully organized until we are able to offer something for individual as well as combined efforts at improvement—I mean until we have some plan by which individuals in isolated places can pursue a systematic course of study,—something, for instance, like the Chautauqua course, to which, in its place, I have always given my hearty approval. That course has done a vast amount of good, and there are very few liberals who can not say to its leaders, "God speed!" Still many liberals, and no doubt a few orthodox people, have often wished for something broader to be put forward,—a course of reading and study which should offer less restraint to individual development, which should have for its purpose development of thought rather than belief. I may not make myself understood, and may be wrong as to the inside workings of the Chautauqua course, but from a superficial examination of their text-books it has seemed to me that the ultimate object of their work was not so much to follow wherever the truth might lead, whether toward orthodoxy or heterodoxy, as to make from and of all its members rational and intelligent Methodists. I judge this from the tone of its text-books and the inclusion in its bounds of such works as the "Plan of Salvation" and the exclusion of all liberal or dissenting authors in scientific or philosophic fields. Thus far I do not recall having seen anything of such authors as Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, Gray, Spencer, Fiske, Lecky, Draper, Buckle or Lewes, and no culture could be considered wide or thorough that did not include some of those authors.

Sincerely yours,

FRED E. SMITH.

The Unity Club and the Religious Life of the Church.

The major part of the work done by Unity Clubs relates to literary matters, to intellectual study—all of which is most commendable. But many Unitarians have received a false impression from the record thus far, and quite unjustly and hastily allot to these organizations no scope beyond literary lines, and so do not consider the feasibility of using them in the distinctive religious work of our liberal Christian societies. This is an error. A Unity Club is capable of most efficient service in developing the religious activities of a church. This article is to show, in outline, what can be done.

I. Such a club of workers can carry on a Department of Religious Study and Discussion. The old-time Bible class is to give way to a section of investigation and thought, answering to the thing put aside, but broader and deeper in its methods. To ask the minister to be responsible every Sunday for this department, is too much. He may enter when he can; but the responsibility shall rest on the club. Into this class the scholars, too old for the Sunday-school, may go, and those of any age who desire. Such a church section for religious instruction and discussion exists, I may say by way of pointing the theory with fact, in my own Sunday exercises, employing leaflets of our own based on Dr. Clarke's "Common Sense in Religion." Religious interest deepens when people can be made to think on religious topics; just as literary or historical zeal grows when studies in literature and history abound.

II. A Unity Club can have the care of festivals and church observances, such as Christmas, Easter, Flower Sunday, etc. By taking this as a duty, these celebrations in their regular course are smoothly conducted and firmly held to a dignified and impressive result. These great object-lessons and rallying occasions, when the religious sentiment can be stirred, are too often left for the minister and a few faithful women to arrange and fulfill. Instead of being passive spectators, many might be co-workers, receiving a stimulus of consecration from the mere fact of participation.

III. The religious fervor of a church is chilled or warmed a great deal by its habits of hospitality. The religious side of Sunday worship is not simply its praise and prayer and sermon; it is greatly in the aspect it offers to the public when the church doors are opened and the spirit says "come." What do the pew-holders say? A Unity Club can give life, heartiness, and a truly Christian repute to a church by seeing that ushers are in the aisles, and everything done to make the stranger welcome. Parish committees never perform this duty except spasmodically. To have this properly carried out, let eight or ten of the young men of a Unity Club take this as their part of the co-operative work in hand.

IV. I have found great aid from an organization of this kind, though not the same in name, in my own church, in the way of personal help, members acting as aids or agents to the minister in saving his time, in consulting with individuals upon purely religious matters, in maturing his plans.

V. Another channel is the origin and conduct of special meetings outside the usual church services. It may be the support of popular theater preaching, or school-house meetings, or poor-house or hospital exercises. A minister stands ready to broaden his religious work, to go out of his routine; but when he looks around for singers, and companions, and a little body-guard of inspiring supporters, he must call and rally each time, with indifferent results. A Unity Club ought to have resources for such enterprises.

VI. What a center of influence such an organization would be; it would naturally engender loyalty to the church, and diffuse zeal through the society. Taking hold of religious work in such practical and earnest temper inevitably expels that apathy so frequently found in our churches, which need a consecration of working faith; faith, generally, they have in plenty.

VII. Unity Clubs could do much to distribute our literature, establish libraries in churches, place our tracts in church vestibules, and maintain a systematic sowing of liberal documents in the particular communities they occupy.

These are only a few practical hints. There is a great field for Unity Club work along religious lines. In the Unitarian denomination distinctive church organization is weakening; our elders do not talk religion with their children; the union and solidarity of intellect and emotion, of things "secular" and religious, is not clearly taught. The young people must be induced to feel at home in working for church and religion; they must be lead into naturalness of thought and action. We want a revival of church love and loyalty. The Unity Clubs can do a great deal to quicken denominational enthusiasm and rally our people around the things that remain. The culture that ends in something unrelated to religion is imperfect culture; the culture that does not correctly emphasize religion is deficient; and with imperfect and scant culture no Unity Club should be content.

THE Unity Club at Denver divides its work into literary, musical and dramatic sections. The first section will study the "Ten Great Novels," the first evening being given to "Anna Karenina."

Golden Keys.

A bunch of golden keys is mine,
To make each day with gladness shine.

"Good Morning!" that's the golden key
That unlocks every day for me.

When evening comes, "Good Night!" I say,
And close the door of each glad day.

When at the table, "If you please,"
I take from off my bunch of keys.

When friends give anything to me,
I'll use the little "Thank you!" key.

"Excuse me," "Beg your pardon," too,
When by mistake some harm I do.

Or if unkindly harm I've given,
With "Forgive me" key I'll be forgiven.

On a golden ring these keys I'll bind,
This is its motto: "Be ye kind."

I'll often use each golden key,
And so a happy child I'll be.

Scattered Seeds.

Opportunity.

We have much to say of opportunity; but I complain that it is used only in the singular number. For always, unless much I miss the point, it ought to be used in the plural; nay, I think great troubles and ills in life come of looking at opportunity as if only a bachelor pirate or a lone siren. Shakespeare has given his great authority to this way of looking, in a splendid passage about opportunity, in "Lucrece." 'Tis opportunity, he says, that "executes the traitor's treason," that points the season after the sin is plotted, that "spurns at right, at law, at reason;" nay, he says opportunity never is the "humble suppliant's friend," nor "brings him where his suit may be obtained," nor gives "physic to the sick," nor to the pained ease; he cries,—

"The poor, lame, blind, halt, creep, cry out for thee,
But they never meet with opportunity."

Now, who will set at naught the great bard, and say that he has sung both well and not well—that is, that he has made rich numbers to set a false stone? Why, that must I, even poor I; for a man on the eagle of a moral thought may fly even above Shakespeare if he have not the thought. Therefore, again I say that the great bard has gone far wrong to speak of opportunity in the singular number, and especially thus to say that then it is like a bachelor thief creeping to his crime, or like a maiden siren steeping the will in soft sounds. For I must maintain that opportunity goes never unmated, but always there are two at least, like "Juno's swans, coupled and inseparable," and in general many more than two. This appears in many ways, of which I will mention three.

First, it is plain that one opportunity never comes but that its mate, which is the opposite of itself, is with it; for if there be opportunity to do any wrong, there is at hand also the opportunity not to do it, but to do the right. Whence it is plain that never one comes alone, but always two together. And this is a very great point, and, if one will attend to it, will save a man from making many valiant excuses to himself when he ought rather to confess shame; for, if rightly he speak, he will not say that he was overcome by opportunity, but that two opportunities being before him, a fair and an ugly, he chose the ugly and turned the fair away. For no man can have opportunity to hate but therewith opportunity to love, nor chance to take life but therewith also a chance to save it, nor freedom to withhold but also therewith power to give; and so following, through ten thousand pairs; for no moral opportunity but has his mate and comes wedded.

But not only opportunity comes twofold, but many fold; for I know not in what case there is not a troop of them together. Now, here I will confess what brought these thoughts to me: it was that this morning I found, to my vexation, that the strong wind in the night had drawn out the fire of the furnace, which was cold and dark when I looked for warmth and light. At this I was vexed much, and was about to fall on the circumstance with ireful grumbling, when I bethought me that here was a whole host of opportunities,—not only opportunity to kindle the fire, mated with the opposite opportunity not to kindle it, but also no end of opportunities to do it handsomely, as without grumbling, and without a dust of flying ashes, and quietly and without calling everyone to the calamity; and, in short, in every way handsomely. This, I am sure, is a great point in life; which, if everyone would consider, there would be more peace in our households; for then there would be two graces in everyone, and I know not which of the graces the better—I mean a good deed, and a handsome manner in the good deed.

Now, as there are many opportunities always—I mean as they come never singly but in troops—this carries another opportunity, namely, to study that all the opportunities in a troop be discovered. This, I am sure, is another great point in life, if one will attend to it; for surely there can be nothing needful to be done which is not worth study as to all the good things to be got from it, and no good glass to be taken without a fitness of study how to drink every drop of it. Therefore, opportunities move in companies marshaled by a captain—that is to say, by the chief of them all, namely, opportunity to study all the others to make the most of them. Now, if one will do this, what beauty and happiness in all places will come about, and especially in the home! For if a man when about to do anything, will say: Let me study now how in this one point I can achieve many, and how especially I can turn it to account in this pleasure for that one, and in this help for another, and in that bit of love for another, truly his life will be like a crystal,—not only clear, I mean, but with a wonderful number of faces plain to the light.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

The Michigan Conference met at Jackson, December 6, 7 and 8. A majority of the Unitarian churches of the state were represented by their ministers and lay delegates. George Batchelor represented the American Unitarian Association, John R. Effinger the Western Conference, Mrs. J. L. Jones the Woman's Conference. J. L. Jones, of Chicago, was on hand to preach the opening sermon. T. B. Forbush, who had removed from the state since the last session of the Conference, returned to take his old place as presiding officer.

From the opening sermon on Tuesday evening to the social reception which followed the adjournment of the Conference on Thursday evening, the exercises were full of interest. The reports from societies gave encouragement as to the future growth and prosperity of our work in Michigan. Mr. Connor, of East Saginaw, reported a congregation of 750 and many turned away on Sunday evenings.

On the afternoon of the 7th, the new church parlors of the Jackson church were dedicated with appropriate exercises. After hymn, reading by Mrs. Louie Bell, prayer by J. L. Jones, and response by the choir, came reports from H. A. Hodge, secretary, and A. M. Tinker, treasurer of the Building Committee.

We learned the history of the church parlors: First, a wish two years ago, then a settled purpose, then subscriptions and plans; and finally, by the purchase of shares in the Jackson Building Association, the ladies of the church raised the money—$3,100 and over—to pay the whole cost of the improvement.

Ten-minute addresses followed, by Mrs. J. T. Sunderland, J. L. Jones, J. R. Effinger, Rowland Connor, L. R. Daniels, A. Walkley, E. L. Rexford, J. T. Sunderland and C. F. Elliott. In the evening there were three addresses by J. T. Sunderland, E. L. Rexford, and Rowland Connor. Brother Sunderland spoke for the Christian element in Unitarianism. He defined Unitarianism as natural universal religion developing in the light of the nineteenth century, and said that though Jesus brought no new truth to the world, and was doubtless mistaken in some of his conceptions, Christianity was possessed of the elements of a universal religion. It meant ethics, worship, humanity, or love to God and love to man, and in this, Unitarianism was synonymous with it. Unitarianism calls itself Christian because it sees no larger word, no holier work.

Dr. Rexford, of Detroit, Universalist, spoke on the Universalist position in regard to Christianity. He said: "I don't think God is any more interested in the Christian than the Jew; and I believe a good Jew is nearer God's heart than a bad Christian. If I wanted to study Christianity, I don't think I would go to books at all. I would study man. The best man is the best Christian, no matter what his theology may be. A Christian is a person who bears a good spirit, and there is where I get the warrant for saying that the best man is the best Christian. God is educating the world. You can't put all people in the same class. The great work of this life is to keep our hands busy and our hearts warm."

Rowland Connor, of East Saginaw, spoke for the extra Christianity in Unitarianism. This he thought consisted in the absorption by Unitarianism of certain elements which were not in it at the beginning. It started with Christianity, but has assimilated to itself elements that were not of Christianity. Unitarianism is the only ism pretending to call itself Christian, which gladly recognizes the discoveries of modern science. It is the only one in the world that dares to do away with the dogmas which have been regarded as essentials of Christianity. We are all marching toward the same goals. He recognized all men as his brothers, and that the whole world was growing nearer and nearer together; and he did long for the day when all could work together.

The president of the conference, T. B. Forbush, congratulated the large audience present on the ability and breadth of the three addresses with which they had been favored, and remarked that though they were given from widely different points of view, it was the glory of Unitarianism that it was broad enough to take them all in.

On Thursday at 10 o'clock Ex-Governor Austin Blair, the old war governor of Michigan, gave a forcible and stirring address on "The Relation of the Church to Society," which was followed by discussion. At 2 p. m. T. B. Forbush read a paper on "The Growth of the Hebrew Bible," which called out much interesting discussion. At 7:30 p. m., the closing sermon of the conference was given by Reed Stuart, of Detroit. After the sermon a reception was tendered to delegates and visitors in the church parlors. Refreshments were served and racy addresses enlivened the parting hour. Thus ended a most stimulating and helpful session of the Michigan Conference. As at every State Conference the friends voted it the best conference ever held, the ministers the ablest, and the papers the most brilliant!

Denver, Col.—Readers of UNITY may be interested to learn that the happy possessors of the new Unity church here are not idle. Work in all departments is moving bravely along. The pastor, after a momentary feeling of discouragement, in spite of many new duties and not perfect physical health, has resumed his evening services, and the trustees, in addition to an increased salary, have promised all possible necessary co-operation. Mr. Van Ness is devoting his Sunday evenings to a review of ancient eastern religions, and his morning themes embody the living issues of the day. The newly organized Unity Club has awakened great enthusiasm in both its literary and dramatic departments, and the Women's Auxiliary meetings are well attended. Perhaps no more encouraging sign of growth is seen than in the fact that new members are constantly being added. Several persons united on Sunday last. The chorus choir proves a most valuable adjunct, and altogether the entire service is satisfactory and uplifting.

A flying visit from Secretary Reynolds, and an impromptu reception for him, are among the pleasant features of last week.

The Women's Aid Society yet remains a necessity and is striving to make the forthcoming festival a pecuniary success.

Appended is a copy of the cards distributed last Sunday: "UNITY CHURCH.—1. Name a theme upon which you would most like to hear a sermon. 2. Do you think the church of to-day is doing the work it ought? How can it be improved?" Of course it remains to be seen whether the pastor will gain much enlightenment from the pews, but the request is certainly most complimentary.

Charleston, S. C.—The Unitarian church, many of whose hymn books were destroyed in the promiscuous demolition of the earthquake, takes a step forward and adopts the Association's Revised Edition. The demolished organ is now receiving its new front of ornamented pipes; the young people's society, "The Helping Hand," has just renewed the upholstery of the chancel chairs and reading desks; and so, with home efforts seconding the great gifts of the friends abroad, the slow work of restoration goes satisfactorily on. —As to the quaking earth, though the local papers studiously ignore any vibrations within 200 miles, yet the tremors continue to that degree that the United States government is just now establishing a seismic station at Dorchester on the Ashley, about sixteen miles from Charleston, where is thought to be located one of the foci nearest the earth's surface, and so most favorable for study.

—On December 4 Mr. Brome preached in his own church in the morning, and in Savannah, Ga., 115 miles away, in the evening. The number of the congregation is not given, but the News of next morning says it showed that there are in Savannah many believers in the doctrines of that church, and pronounces the sermon a very interesting one. Mr. J. M. Barnard, son of our revered Rev. C. M. Barnard, of Boston, gave the "religious ambassador" most cordial welcome to his home, and that kind of conference and counsel an ambassador finds most valuable.

—The schism in the Independent Presbyterian [that is southern for Congregational church,] resulting in the return north of Dr. Bacon after one year's ministry, seems to be purely political, and one of the most stupendous instances of religious blindness and sectional stupidity on record, even in a country prolific in such things. He is confessedly the most talented preacher ever in Savannah, and had already done for that old church what had never been done for it before. But actual independence in thought and utterance is the last thing an independent Presbyterian church in this climate can stand. Dr. Bacon did not realize that "independent" is a word to put in the title-page, but by no means to put in practice.

—The Synagogue, a beautiful little Gothic edifice, is undergoing repairs and embellishments. "The Hebrews own Savannah," it is said, and they are spoken of as a very desirable and refined class, who have ample social recognition.

Chicago.—Rev. Mr. Mangasarian's lecture on Mohammed, before All Souls Unity Club, was so highly appreciated and there was so strong a desire expressed to hear him again, that the club will postpone its Monday evening Novel Section to listen to a talk from him on his native land, Armenia. Admission, 25 cents; children, 15 cents.

—While Mr. Mangasarian is in this section, it will be a misfortune to the interests of our churches and clubs if they let the golden opportunity escape of catching the spirit and lore of this child of the Orient.

—The People's Temple church (colored Unitarian) have secured permanent quarters at 2906 State street, where regular Sunday services will be held at 11 A. M. and 7.45 P. M.

Philadelphia.—An important and extensive movement is afoot here for the establishment of neighborhood guilds for the masses throughout the city. Weston has been the head and front of the project, which is to be in no way sectarian, and has enlisted the sympathies of many well-known citizens.

—Mr. Morse is about to put the finishing touches on his head of Carlyle. His success in this work is indisputable. The Carlyle is a mate-piece to the recent Emerson.

—Ames is to address the Camden Ethical Association on "Good Society" at its January meeting. Mr. May is down for an address on Priestley some time during the winter. I am told that the Camden Methodists are, many of them, considerably chagrined because of the ignorant attacks one of their preachers has made on Unity church.

—The Press is up in arms because a Philadel-—Emerson.

WE can not pass by without a word the great treat offered to the cultured by the ten lectures on Dante, which we have noticed elsewhere in UNITY. Truly, we shall have high thinking in the midst of Christmas joys. We are also glad to learn that a reception will be tendered to the lecturers at the Art Institute, on the evening of Saturday, December 31, which will doubtless prove a most interesting occasion.

WITH "Peace on earth, good will to men," let the welkin ring, a sweet undertone singing its way through our hearts and into our lives. For Christmas is nothing if it mean not praise to God and love to man. In one of the liberal churches of this city, the Christmas season will be remembered in a truly Christmas spirit. All presents hung upon the tree are to be given to the poor little jail children, of whom there are many held in confinement awaiting trial, with nothing to lighten the dragging hours. Poor little waifs of humanity, God's poor! Truly, if "ye have done it unto the least of these my children, ye have done it unto me," and how many bare lives may not each one of us brighten in this glad Christmas time!

WE were interested to note that the Pundita Ramabai, on being questioned concerning her religious belief, confessed that in Boston they thought her a Unitarian, though she was not, nor a Trinitarian. Evidently the Pundita stands on that broad liberal ground which emphasizes not creeds nor dogmas, but simply noble living patterned after the pure life of Jesus of Nazareth. As she put it, Trinitarianism was not woven into the "convolutions of her brain in childhood," as Miss Willard declared was her case, and in the Bible she found not the word Trinitarian. Surely, this high caste Hindu woman has the clearness of conviction and earnestness of purpose which will make her labors for her unfortunate sisters over the sea of great moment to them and to her country.

HE would have enjoyed a unique entertainment, who should have spent the evening of December 15th at the club rooms of the Sherman House. There, under the auspices of the Illinois Woman's Press Association, was given a most interesting rendering of a musical programme, each number of which represented the musical compositions of women. They were largely those of "G. Estabrook," who composed all the numbers included in the term Ballade Recital. The original compositions for the piano were by Fraulein Adele Lewing, full of feeling, and well rendered by the artist herself, while several of the vocal numbers, notably "Adieu," "My Love is Coming," and a duet, "The Reconciliation," were enthusiastically encored; also a solo and chorus not down on the programme, and suggested to the composer by the recent victory for the woman suffragists in Wisconsin. It was very spirited, and sentiment and music well fitted to each other. We understood from "G. Estabrook" that should a similar occasion present itself in the future, she hoped to make the programme broad enough to include the work of a number of women composers. We should say, Let the good work go on! Nothing so inspires excellent results as the wise encouragement of small but earnest beginnings. It is time women placed themselves creditably on record in this line of art here in our busy metropolis.

THE Advance strikes a good chord in the following: "The idea of proportionate giving is a matter which is arresting attention among Christian people. Is not the time coming when persons with comparatively large means will be found giving to the on-moving causes of Christian enterprises, not in the measures which betoken the narrow mind and the small heart, but in degrees of largeness of beneficence corresponding to their ability, 'as the Lord hath prospered them?' Within the past ten years there have been many shining tokens of Christian progress in this respect. All our great missionary societies are witnesses of this, as are also our Christian colleges all over the land. And yet it can not be denied that there is still a woful disparity between the sums lavished on selfish gratifications, in one form and another, and the amounts devoted to unselfish uses. Dribbling runnels of charity; flood-tides of luxury! But not always will it be so."

THE following noble words are found in the Pittsburgh Chronicle-Telegraph. In this age, of skepticism, such words should be whispered in the ears of our young men, who, in their revolt from the irrational dogmas of the popular theology, are apt to lose sight of religion itself: "The church spires that we see pointing heavenward in the cities are not as gloomy as stone jails with grated windows. They invite to peace. The forbidden prisons tell of punishment and woe. Who can hear the strains of devotional music swelling within churches, and not feel that the worshipping men and women can not at least be harmed by such exercises, and that there is an overwhelming probability that they are saving themselves from perils? Think as you will of dogmas, but beware of a hostile attitude toward religion and those who associate themselves to proclaim and extend it. Such an attitude is not only unreasonable, but it is full of danger to yourself. It makes bad men claim fraternity with you on the score of the common scoff. Can you afford that?"

LAST Sunday night All Souls Church of this city was crowded to overflowing to listen to brief addresses on "The Debt of the World to Jesus," by Messrs. Salter, Gannett, Mangasarian, and the pastor of the church. Mr. Salter found in Jesus the heroic believer in absolute justice, the noble soul discontented with the present. In him was a burning zeal for better things. Mr. Gannett traced the forces that lifted the sandaled Jesus from the carpenter shop to the Calvary heights, and the still more sublime forces that lifted the Christ from the Calvary heights to the throne of the universe. He found in the human loyalty of the one man and the religious hunger and ideality of the million of men causes for profound gratitude and high Christmas joys. Mr. Mangasarian found in Jesus the ideal of the centuries personified, and the nobler enthusiasms of men directed to permanent ends. The meeting closed with the thought that it was Jesus who dared speak to the Samaritan woman, to commend the deed of another Samaritan, and that his name was the last element in the seething chemicals of the spirit that precipitated into organic crystals the diverse elements of nations and races. Jesus is the name that spans the distances from the Ethical Culture Society to the Catholic church. It overarches continents and bridges the centuries. In view of this great debt of the world to Jesus we hail the Christmas time with merry greetings, knowing that in every reasonable attempt to do justice to Jesus we heighten our power of appreciating his kindred, of whom the annals of the race are rich. Jesus is really known only by him who knows others. Jesus stands not alone, but is one of many. So knowing him, we know his song of "Peace on Earth, good will to Men."

WE do not need to help Santa Claus; he is getting very intelligent in these days; but happy is the boy or girl that finds on Christmas morning Robert Collyer's brand new book, "Talks to Young Men" (with asides to young women); Edward Everett Hale's new book on the "Life of Washington Studied Anew," or his old book in its elegant new edition "In His Name," or the new compilations from Thoreau's Diary, entitled "Winter," recently published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. The older ones will be glad of the one more volume of Edwin Arnold's poetry, "Lotus and Jewel," just out, or of the beautiful Lyrics from Browning, compiled, we understand, by Horace Scudder, published by the Houghton, Mifflin House, or the little parchment collection of poems by Edmund Rowland Sill, which will hold its place among the favorites, because it contains "The Fool's Prayer"—if all the others were valueless—not to forget the strangely fascinating story-embowered wisdom in the little book made by the pastor of the Third Unitarian church of this city with the help of his artistic parishioners, "Legends from Story Land."

MISS MARY E. BURT, in The Intelligencer, has an article on "Good Literature in the School-room," in which she not only gives her opinion on that subject, but also on written examinations. Miss Burt is the compiler of that admirable little book, "Seed Thoughts." She speaks right out of an experience of years—an experience in which she has not only put time, but life, thought, soul. She says a very large percentage of our children are compelled to leave school at ten to earn their living, without the ability to tell a good book from a bad one, and thoroughly infected with the examination fright—that cancer which is eating the vitality out of public schools." There is no question but that text-books, which should be made attractive and interesting to the children, are absolutely divested of most of their real helpfulness to the child's mental and moral progress by their association with "examination papers," and that the extreme nervousness of our children is in a large measure due to this school-room hobgoblin. We are told that our mothers were "born before nerves came in fashion." Aye! and they were born before "written examinations" became fashionable, too. I have in my mind the picture of two little ones who, under the strain of preparation for examination, had carried their books to bed with them. There they lay in the full light of the gas jet, the open books partially covering their pale, troubled faces, asleep only to dream of figures and failures. Said a friend at my side, "How I wish that picture could be put where it would teach its lesson!" Said another, "I've always been a strong advocate of our present school system, but this is a side of it I never dreamed of." Then, too, the strain on nerves, time and strength of the teacher! She must go carefully over all these papers, perfectly conscious, if she is a thoughtful woman, that they very imperfectly indicate the child's real attainments. She knows that thoughtful, conscientious Benny, in his nervous anxiety, has blundered all the way through, while rollicking, haphazard Tim, by "sheer good luck," has made his mark. And now for the result. Modest, self-deprecating Benny has lost all confidence in himself—he is discouraged and more or less disgusted, probably. Such a child's self-reliance is jeopardized by this process, while Tim has gained a cheap victory, and his life's aims and ambition are cheapened accordingly. Now, this is not mere theory, but the result of investigation and the testimony of some of our very best teachers. How constantly are we reminded that we have to fall back on the country school house for our best public men! Now, why is this? Certainly not because culture is debilitating. But it is because this thing isn't culture. It is only text-book gymnastics. Says Miss Burt: "The first business of the public school ought to be to give a child a confirmed taste for good literature. If a child leaves school at twelve with a hunger for good books, he is started in the way of self-education." This is unquestionably true, and with the life of labor, which ought to keep a wholesome balance of the intellectual and the physical, this poor boy, with his mental digestion in vigorous active operation, will at thirty stand before the world every inch a man, while your boy who has been pushed on through the various grades—standing high in his markings all the way, graduating promisingly from the high school, and then from the university, disappoints all his friends—he has no taste for a profession, no adaptability to business. Why? Because he was taught, not EDUCATED.

S. C. LL. J.

If history repeats itself, it also apparently contradicts itself. Here have the papers been bubbling over, like a super-heated caldron, with ebullitions of wrath against our northern abuse of the negro on account of his color, and in the very midst of it all starts forth the anomaly of Thomas L. Johnson, the sable dish-washer, receiving tribute from a brilliant assemblage in Kinsley's banquet hall. The "why," which it is the duty of the latter-day philosopher to put to every unusual phenomenon, is in this case easily answered. While Thomas Johnson was first a slave and later a dish washer, he rose, and rose by rapid bounds to chief dish-washer, dining-room man, captain of the watch and head waiter. Then on to the missionary post in Colorado, to Spurgeon's College, London, and off to the dark continent as a missionary! Doubtless the white man, had he contented himself with only menial occupations, would now occupy the place of the colored race—providing, of course, the latter had fulfilled the duties now devolving upon his paler brother. The northern negro is at last well rid of his greatest dead weight, slavery, and will undoubtedly push forward in the future with constantly increasing strides. The colored race have in their make-up an element now absent from our civilization, which will in later years prove a valuable factor. And even now the people of the new Unitarian Temple church are showing us something of their grit. They have our Christmas greeting.

Some More Editorial Wanderings.

Again UNITY paragraphs have been dropping into the mail bag as the editor has been rolling around the country. Returning from the Michigan Conference (reported in our last) on Thursday, the 8th, on Friday, the 9th, he took the "cannon-ball" train for Philadelphia, finding hospitable shelter in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Mangasarian, preaching next morning and evening from the platform of St. George's hall to large, earnest and fresh congregations. There is an elasticity about this independent movement, as in that of others of the kind, which suggests a constituency which belongs to Unitarian churches, which, must we not admit, from internal defects, we have not yet been able to reach. On Monday the senior editor gave his lecture on "Browning," before the New Century Club in the afternoon, and in Mr. Ames' church in the evening. On Tuesday he studied Philadelphia on those points which do most vitally touch the interests he has nearest at heart. The fraternity existing among the liberal churches of Philadelphia seems delightful. The three Unitarian churches of Philadelphia, the Camden church, the Independent Society at St. George's hall, with the patriarchal spirit of Dr. Furness, give five ministers who promptly respond to every call of co-operation.

Last Sunday a Round Robin exchange had been planned for, when every one preached in somebody else's pulpit; and it is intended to set the wheel going in this fashion once every two months,—the results of which must be exceedingly gratifying. Tuesday gave time for a glimpse into the school-rooms of the Ethical Culture Society; the studio of S. H. Morse, whose beautiful head of Emerson the UNITY publishers have made available to western buyers; the Manual Training High School of Philadelphia, with its 300 boys, whose faces are illuminated with enthusiasm by the school, which to us seemed to be, all things considered, the most perfectly equipped and admirably managed institution of the kind we have ever visited. But the thing most interesting in Philadelphia to "ye editor" is the Children's Aid Society and Bureau of Information, which in five years' time has revolutionized the treatment of dependent children in the state of Pennsylvania, emptied the almshouses of the state of over 1,300 little ones, closed two "institutions" in the city of Philadelphia, and saved to the city thousands of dollars of money—all by following the divine method of "setting the solitary in families" as opposed to the human method of setting the solitary in "institutions." On Tuesday night we met a gathering of Mr. Mangasarian's people, and at midnight started for Boston. Thursday was Unity Club day at the Unitarian headquarters on Beacon street—the first of many institutes, we trust. Nearly forty different clubs and churches were represented. The addresses of Messrs. Hale, Cooke and Dole, and the papers of Messrs. Rich, Lyon and Spaulding, with the questionings and the answers intermingled, gave an impulse to thinking and studying activities of churches which we trust will justify the outlay of strength and time which the meeting involved. Thursday, 7 P. M., the editor started for Chicago, which he reached on Saturday morning in time for some communings with the genial and earnest Armenian, whose sincerity and eloquence charmed the six different audiences that were privileged to greet him, and in time to put the child-saving methods of Philadelphia into the last Sunday morning's sermon, and to find the accumulation of duties which conspire to impoverish these editorial columns, but not to dampen our holiday joys or to weaken our Christmas greetings.

Ideas of God.

"We See As We Are."

We see in God what we are in ourselves. We call ourselves finite, him infinite; but that which we think of as infinite for him is what exists as finite in ourselves. The difference to our minds is of degree rather than kind. At any given time, the God whom the nation worships is the reflex of its own highest conception of power and morality and intelligence. As man grows wiser and better, our image in the heavens takes on beauty.

It is so with things much less important than God's character and wisdom. Very long ago it was noticed that the Ethiopian gave his god a black face and woolly hair, while the Thracian gave his his own blue eyes and fair complexion. In our Christian art the Virgin's face betrays the nationality of the painter. Murillo makes her a Spanish peasant girl; Raphael, an Italian woman, with some Roman ruins in the background. The German artists made their angels round-faced fraus. Two or three hundred years ago a Dutchman wrote a book to prove that Dutch was the language of Paradise. But the old Epicureans thought that the gods probably spoke Greek; and Brigham Young said that English is God's language; and Swedenborg, with ear laid a little closer to the truth, reveals that the angels always seem to be talking in the tongue to which each listener was born. And thus it is throughout religion. If our idea of creation is mainly that of manufacture, then God is the great machinist, making and repairing his worlds; and anything but that will seem a little like "atheism." If our idea of providence be still that which the ancient Jew held, and very naturally held 2,500 years ago, then God is the arbitrary elector and pre-ordainer of a man's and a nation's destiny; and if one deny "special providence," and answers to petitions, he will seem to us a man with no religiousness. If our idea of divine goodness and of justice be still that of Augustine's age, 1,500 years ago, then we can believe in the literal dogmas of transmitted guilt and transmitted propitiation and the fearful fate of unbelievers; and God will be the great merchant, then, bartering man's salvation for so much suffering paid over by another. Let one doubt the moral possibility of such a transaction and we shall tell him—at least, in this nineteenth century, dear friends tell us,—“You are not feeling the enormity of sin.”

This instantaneous creator, this special providence, this interposing God, this chosen nation, this supernatural deliverer and teacher, have had their place in the seeing of the past and really made men's joy and faith, because by these symbols their minds have best grasped the idea of God's life in nature and history. As men are, they see in nature and in history. To accept the theologic origin of the earth from the book of Genesis, is as if we should believe the nurse-girl's tale to the three-year-old boy about the origin of his little brother that has just been born into the home. The legends of the book of Genesis were noble science for their own day; they make a noble poem, but no science at all for our day. Or again, to judge of an historical question, like the "origin of Christianity," save from the standpoint of a somewhat wide study, is as if a man should lecture on the sun, knowing nothing of what the spectroscope and telescope have shown within the last thirty years. Very noble are the words of the New Testament; but he, again, who insists that their nobleness is utterly beyond parallel in other bibles, or that they are unmixed with intellectual error, or that they represent all moral ideals, or that the spiritual impulse Jesus and Paul gave to the Roman world, can not be explained except by miracle,—such a friend betrays his reverence, indeed, for his parents and his minister, but reverence rather than a sense of the greatness of the human mind and the wonder of the universe. He does not betray ripened knowledge. The vast good which a Jesus and a Bible do is to emphasize, and so to introduce, the better view. The harm which a Jesus and a Bible do is that the reverence for them keeps the old views prominent when it is time for farther change. That is not their fault, but ours. No,—hardly our "fault." Our fear of losing some vision that we know has been helpful, tends to make us disown the actually better vision that comes afresh to us, who have eighteen hundred years more of insight organized within us. It is true that one may not only rashly give up, but rashly lay hold of, the better thought; in which case it will not do him all its good. But the fact remains, that, with the broader reading of to-day into the long processes of man's development, the seeming exceptions disappear, and we are led on to grander glimpses of a God as uniform in history as in the operations of the rest of nature; led on to see that in accordance with great laws,—

"Through the ages one increasing purpose runs,
And the thoughts of men are widened with the process of the suns."

This, the grander view, is the later one. Why? Because the earlier ages could not see the truth in it, man's eyes not then having acquired enough experience. As the light flows into our minds and shows us all phenomena in new relations, one by one the old ideas fade and vanish, not into nothingness,—we need never be afraid of that in regard to anything that has once been profound conviction of the world,—not into nothingness, but to give place to something akin to the old thought, which is truer than the old; and this in turn, no doubt, must suffer change into something better yet. Never think that you have got to the end of your thinking; never dream that there is not a truer and better yet than you ever thought.

And with that caution ever borne in mind, and openly avowed, it seems higher truthfulness to utter the best truth possible to our hour rather than to keep the shut lips in religion which some men prefer; higher truthfulness, for instance, to say of the One Almighty Force of the universe, "It is our Father," rather than to call it "the Unknowable." To that extent—its righteousness—it is not unknowable; the mystery lying not below, but above, all our ideas of human personality and goodness, and life. God is all that we think and name, and infinitely more. I know we have our wonders over much in nature that looks heartless; I know we can not answer our own questions or another's about much in aches and tragedies in birth and life and death and history; I know that there is an easy-going "optimism" that is not the real "faith in goodness" so much as a real numbness to other people's pangs; I know that some of the very best men and women, those most sensitive to other's pangs, and whose life is a long self-sacrifice,—that some of these are among those most ready to confess their mental bewilderment over nature's seeming Calvinism. And yet I know, too, that tested by serenity in trial and by power of making others serene in trial, these very persons are often the very ones who make true Jesus' beatitude, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see—God!" Be pure, you see the pure,—for "you see as you are." Be the brotherly, you see the Fatherly and Motherly, for "you see as you are." Be loyal to the good, you can not help, deep in your being, seeing and trusting in that Good as source and end of all,—that is, seeing and trusting in what other men call "God;" for "you see as you are."

Trust that little spelling lesson of the five short words. It will spell us out life's deepest riddles finally. Let faith in it sustain us and make us brave if ever our minds feel compelled to give up cherished old beliefs and go wandering forth, at first not knowing what new shelter will take the place of the old homestead. It is often a great comfort when beset with religious doubts, or with the great life-darknesses of any kind, to remember that "we are seeing only as we are," and therefore that we never are seeing to the bottom of the fact; and that, meanwhile,

Our faiths are foolish by falling below,
Not coming above, what God will show;
That his commonest thing holds a wonder vast,
To whose beauty our eyes have never past;
God's fact, in the present, or in the to-be,
Outshines the best that we think we see.

Discovery.

The flower I sought of early morn,
At home, in nooks of dew-strewn grass,
Another, coming travel-worn,
Had plucked upon the mountain pass.

Was the sweet secret his or mine?
I quarrel not that men have known
By other ways a glimpse divine
Of truths I deemed my garden's own.

HORACE L. TRAUBEL.

Widows in India and "the Ramabai Circle."

Although India is often vaguely thought of as inhabited by semi-civilized heathen or by negroes on a plane with African savages, it is in reality a country that has had a settled and highly organized civilization for at least two thousand years, and its people are of the same blood as the ruling nations of the world. They have progressed little in many centuries, it is true; but with their elaborate social and religious systems, their educated class, their venerable traditions, they can hardly be regarded as barbarians.

One of India's most harmful characteristics is its degradation of women. Hindu women are of two classes only, wives and widows, betrothals and marriages taking place in childhood. All women are considered inferior to men. They exist for men, and not for themselves; they hold no property, receive no education, have no power. A wife is literally her husband's slave—of use only to bear his children and do his work. A widow is even worse off. From the moment of her husband's death she is a creature to be despised and tormented. Dressed always in the garb of disgrace, she can eat but one meal of coarse food a day and must fast two days every month, abstaining from drink as well as food. She can attend no merry-making, no household or religious festival. She can never marry again. In the eyes of the people a curse rests upon her, and they shrink from her look or touch. If the betrothed husband of a child dies before the marriage, she too is a widow until death. It is believed that in some previous state of existence she has murdered this betrothed husband, and that now as a punishment he is taken away from her. Therefore her parents and friends hold it a sacred duty to carry out the punishment which is for the purifying of her soul. She is shut away from her companions, made to fast and do the meanest work, allowed no recreation or pleasure, and in every possible way made to feel that she is, and must always be, an outcast, cursed by heaven and despised by men. If, as often happens, she is in the care of her husband's family, she is regarded with hate, as being the instrument of his death, and all the necessary miseries of her position are aggravated.

The widow has no chance of escape except by death. If she runs away from her home she can hold no property, and so throws herself upon the world penniless. By this action she loses caste, and being both an outcast and a widow, no one, however low his social position, will either hire her for any kind of work or receive her into his house. Formerly she was encouraged to sacrifice herself upon the funeral pyre of her husband, thus gaining the highest place in heaven for herself, and also enabling her husband's soul to ascend quickly to its rest.

Through the efforts of certain Hindus, and by the intervention of the English government at their request, this custom has been prohibited, and now the widow's only chance for escape by honorable self-sacrifice is to drown herself in one of the sacred rivers. That act, she is assured, will purchase exalted happiness for herself and her husband; and numbers of these unhappy women avail themselves of this mode of deliverance.

No doubt natural affection to some small extent lightens these terrible burdens of widowhood; but it is a system rooted in thousands of years of custom, and demanded by tradition, by public opinion, by law, and above all by religion.

From this nation comes one of its women, and a widow, the Pundita Ramabai, asking for sympathy and cooperation in her life-work, the elevation of women in India. With the exception of her cousin, she is the only Hindu woman who has ever come to this country; her presence is as novel as her message is thrilling. Her father, one of the educated priestly class, held the view that women should have the same educational rights as men, and in the face of bitter persecution educated his wife and two daughters. When Ramabai was growing into womanhood he died, and his wife and older daughter soon followed him. One brother was left, and with him Ramabai traveled through India, studying its customs and religion, and finally began to lecture. She became a member of a school of eclectic thinkers, called the Brahmo Somaj, the members of which, having given up the degraded popular form of their native religion, accept the good things in all religions and try to live true lives according to their own sense of right, and through them Ramabai was led to become a Christian. Her brother died, and then followed her marriage with a man of her own choice, an educated native lawyer. Two years later he too died, and soon after she went to England, where for two years she held the chair of Sanskrit in a Cheltenham College for women, and gained during that time complete command of the English language.

In March, 1886, she came to this country to be present at the graduation of her cousin, Dr. Anandibai Joshee, from the Woman's Medical College of Pennsylvania, and since that time she has visited various places in the United States, with the view of arousing interest in her work. Her cousin was to have been her helper; but death that has been such a fate to her has deprived her of this support, and now she stands among us entirely alone. She is a small, gentle woman of twenty-nine years, with erect head, sensitive mouth and chin, and a soft, well-managed voice. She speaks with perfect ease and self-possession, and her words bear witness to a fine culture, a broad mind, a keen reason, a clear sight, and a cool, indomitable courage and persistence that puts to shame our theories of woman's incapacity and Hindu inferiority.

Her object is the elevation of Hindu women through education, and chiefly by the Hindus themselves. Natives would have an intimate knowledge of the people's needs and of the most effective methods of work among them. Not having to contend against the prejudice and aversion felt toward all foreigners, especially the English, they could work with far less friction and waste. The mission work in general is sadly hampered by this prejudice, and the mission schools for girls have especial difficulties. Pupils are obtained with great difficulty, and even then are allowed to remain in school but two or three years, being withdrawn by their parents by the time they are ten years old. They are not permitted to study at home; and their life after marriage is such as to counteract and obliterate whatever good they may have received during their short school days.

In view of all this Ramabai wishes to put the women in the way of helping themselves. She believes that work can be begun most effectively among the high caste women—that is, among the women of the class which already educates its men. Her plan is carefully thought out and defined. As soon as she has money enough to make a safe beginning she will return to India, taking one or two American women as assistant teachers, and in the most cultured portion of the country open a woman's school. Her pupils are to be educated with the ultimate object of going out as teachers for the women in their homes. The wives, of course, are not available; but the widows—especially the "child-widows," who are just of the educating age—have nothing to bind them to their homes, everything to force them away; and of these high caste widows alone there are 600,000 in India. In view of their miserable life and its utter hopelessness, the Pundita has ground for believing that they would gladly avail themselves of this avenue of relief and substitution.

The school is to give at least the ground-work of a thorough modern Christian education, teaching especially science and the English language and literature. Although it is to be entirely secular in the subjects taught, the Bible will be placed in the hands of the pupils, and they will be encouraged in every way to give it their private study and attention. By this means, by familiarizing them with Christian literature, and by the constant influence of the Christian lives of their teachers, it is hoped to win them from their perverted and inadequate religion to a practical Christianity. While no formal religious instruction will be undertaken, the tone of the school will be distinctly Christian, and the Christian principles upon which modern civilization rests will pervade its teaching.

As to the obstacles in the way of this work, there are doubtless many. In the beginning, at least, little co-operation can be expected from the Hindus themselves, for in the main they have not yet awakened to the need of the work. Little can be expected from the resident English. Ramabai hopes, however, that when once started the school will attract a good number of the unfortunate widows, and that, sooner or later, some among the educated men—a few of whom are already beginning to recognize the need of woman's education—may see its value and give it their aid and patronage.

In regard to her fitness to carry out this plan, no one who has seen the Pundita can doubt that her cool common sense, her practical methods, together with her knowledge of her people, her education, her devoted Christianity, and above all her quiet firmness of purpose, would make probable the success of schemes more doubtful than this. In support of her project, she says: "There is no better way—as far as my knowledge of my own people goes—of introducing the kingdom of God and the gospel of our Savior in India, than by approaching the philosophical Hindu mind in a rational and practical way."

The school can not be self-supporting for some years. As women can hold no property, the pupils will be without money, and must be fed and clothed as well as educated; but Ramabai believes that ten years will either establish it on a self-supporting basis or indicate it as a failure, and she asks for help for that time only. Besides support and accommodation for pupils, teachers must be paid, books and apparatus bought, and various other expenses met; and the Pundita has estimated that there will be needed $7,000 dollars a year for the ten years.

A few weeks ago, at the invitation of the young women of the Cornell University, the Pundita Ramabai came to Ithaca to speak regarding her work and plans for elevating Hindu women. Four meetings were held, and so great was the interest and enthusiasm aroused, that steps were at once taken toward the formation of a permanent organization to assist in her work. The result was the establishment of the "Ramabai Circle for the Elevation of Woman in India." The officers of the circle are a president, Miss Tupper; a secretary, Miss Cutting; a treasurer, Miss Edwards; and an advisory council consisting of Professors Oliver, H. S. Williams, and Jones. The pledge of payment of one dollar a year for ten years admits to membership. Communication with Ramabai is to be kept up, and meetings are to be called at the discretion of the president. The object is to furnish money for Ramabai's school, and it has been suggested that the circle endeavor to support one of the American teachers whom Ramabai desires to take with her to India. Already about thirty professors and fifty students have become members of the circle, and the sums pledged per year range from one to twenty dollars.

We would refer any who desire further details to a work* recently published by Ramabai, at the request of her American friends, in which, to use her own words, she has tried, as clearly as she could, "to give a correct idea of the high caste woman's life, her social and religious rights, her needs, and how we can meet them."

The Three Stone Steps.

Dante, the great poet, was seeking a way up the mountain of Purgatory. Although Purgatory is described as a steep mountain, the poet intended its highest meaning to be to us the willing bearing of the pains and trials found along the rugged ways of life. Thus the soul becomes cleansed from sin. It is so natural to be impatient with our troubles. But Dante saw, as wise men all see, that the true course is to desire that frame of mind to turn these into good. The famous Latin poet, Virgil, was his guide. Yet sometimes he was obliged to turn to others for advice when the way became devious. Such was the case now. Since reaching the foot of the mountain they had looked in vain for the path to the summit, which signifies that it is not easy to learn how to bear ourselves in the various struggles of life. They had, in fact, wandered the whole day long, and the evening was now at hand. What made their position more difficult was, one they met told them that they were now liable to be attacked by a great serpent. "Yet keep on," said their informer, "until you reach the green dell hollowed out in the mountain side, where a company of people are resting, and two angels will protect you there."

The poets came to the dell. It was clothed in the most vivid green, and embellished with flowers of hues more beautiful than any Dante had seen on earth. The company were singing. Dante saw that they were kings, emperors, and others of authority, who had, on account of their many duties, put off till the last moment the day of repentance. Here they still lingered. So hard is it to overcome habits of procrastination.

nation! Suddenly some one cried, "The serpent!" In great terror Dante drew close to his guide. The horrid reptile came gliding through the grass and flowers, sometimes turning back its head and sleeking itself after the way of beasts. But even before it was seen, two beautiful angels had hovered downward, and now they moved protectingly near—one on each side of the dell. They were clad in green, their green wings being like gauze, and each bore a flaming sword.

At sight of their glittering weapons the serpent retreated. And now, as there was no further danger, the angels took their flight back toward heaven. By the serpent Dante meant the fear which glides into our hearts when all is uncertain before us; by the angels, he meant hope that springs up ever fresh and green. Hope will put fear to rout.

Dante's mood grew calmer, and he fell asleep. Because he had so patiently sought the way, and was so eager to be freed from his sins, help was to be given him. Another angel appeared, and gently bore him to a place not far from the true entrance to Purgatory. How surprised he was when awakening! Virgil bade him be of good cheer. "We are sure now of ascending the mountain," he said. Dante looked about him and saw what seemed a gallery of rock. But near by was a gate, with three stone steps leading to it. On the topmost step rested the feet of an angel, who sat on the threshold of the gate. Dante tried to fix his eyes upon him, but could not for the brightness.

"Whence come you?" asked the warder. "This man was brought here by a messenger from heaven," answered Virgil. "He may enter, then, if he is able to cross these steps." Dante hastened to examine them. The lowest was pure and polished white marble. The second was like dark rock that had long been burnt in the furnace, being cracked through its length and its breadth. The third was deep red, like blood—a glowing porphyry. He saw the meaning. Would he be able to cross them? First, did his mind clearly mirror forth to him his sin, with none of it concealed, as the white marble indicated? Next, was his repentance so sincere his heart was broken at thought of his guilt, bearing the sign of the cross, like the second stone? And, last, was he willing to give his life in the eager strife for purification, as the flaming, blood-red stone suggested?

Dante felt that he could answer, "Yes!" In humbleness, yet with great gratitude, he ascended the steps without faltering, and the heavenly porter "pushed open the sacred door."

THE STUDY TABLE.

Miss Curtis: A Sketch. By Kate Gannett Wells. Boston: Ticknor & Co. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co. Cloth, pp. 271. $1.25.

There is excellent discipline in reading such a book as "Miss Curtis." To those who happily have learned to enjoy life with undisguised adaptation to its disciplinary predominance, the volume offers rare opportunities. There is for them an exhilaration in the exercise of sustaining mental balance under difficulties. This book supplies such difficulties to a lavish degree, the ruling one being its subtlety, which really comprises them all. To one who is impervious to discipline—and we have known one or two such—who laughs, cries, is horrified, amused, exalted or scandalized in rapid succession by passing events, either in or out of a book, without a troublesome sense of personal responsibility as to the application of those emotions or their causes, this story is very beguiling;—especially if that one be living a life closely embedded in "social" intricacies. To the plain-going reader, who does not like to be perplexed, we do not recommend it.

The perspective of the narrative is an interesting feature. The whole spirit of it, as relating to the human undercurrent of life, is pathetically, "so near and yet so far," that it is filled with the odor of incessant tragedy from beginning to end; as there is no "plot" to the story, the cause of this tragedy is sufficiently invisible to resemble the dim, vanishing point of sight in a sharply perspective etching. One wonders whether the author intended to convey tragedy or comedy in high life, or to be thoroughly realistic, which is as much as to say that each of these phases is artistically evidenced.

The remote and impersonally personal attitude of each of the specimen characters and their principles of action, throw the whole scene into a certain Japanese relief which is very striking. We might say the book is intensely modern, and stop just there, except that it would leave the less subtle, but mutually intense half of life in the modern, entirely unrepresented. It might have been called a fairy story outright, or a goblin nightmare, and have done with it. But it isn't. It is called a Sketch, and is aërated character study. There is a quaint, antique air with its modernness, which is peculiarly contradictory. That is sometimes one of the subtleties of highly frictionized society, where church and parish life and religious elements run through it all.

It begins with two children, who are not children, but offerings upon an altar of "character," "principle," and social demand. Their experiences in the first of the story are the most strongly marked features in the book. No such childish maladies as measles or mumps appear; but the little girl, while passing out of her childhood, and not yet a young lady, charges herself, in her journal, "in imitation of mock philosophy" with being something far more difficult to deal with—"a potentiality and a conscious personality." The mature decision and prompt action of the brother and sister are startling products of their surroundings and of the inculcated self-suppression of a minister's family. Miss Curtis, who figures as an eccentric benefactress, begins by being an ogress, is gradually warmed by the genuine spirit of the young girl, and ends by revealing to her at the last the undeveloped possibilities for tenderness that have lain hidden and encrusted all her life. Many points that we would like to speak of, we must pass over for want of space. The sketch is like an etching, because all that which is not there stands out in bold relief from the scarcity and sharpness of the outline which holds it together.

THE HOME.

Christmas.

Swing in your steeples, swing,
O Christmas bell!
With melody ascending,
Your music swells;
While little children sing
Their happy voices blending.

This day, long years ago,
A life began,
And grew in heavenly beauty—
A son of man.
Men learned of him to know
The holiness of duty.

O dreaming soul, awake
From visions dim,
To find a joy unswerving,
Through following him!
In healing hearts that ache,
In lowly, faithful serving.

How Blossom and Royal Prolonged Christmas.

Christmas was almost there. Papa had been off on a long jaunt, and wrote that he would reach grandpa's Christmas eve and wanted wife and babies to meet him there. But mamma's arm had been "all bokted up" and was weak, stiff and painful; the roads were "all bokted up," too, and anything but inviting to hospital and nursery traveling, besides mamma had on her hands a minister who was "all bokted up," also, having resigned his pulpit, withdrawn from one denomination, and had come asking fellowship in another. Bessie had gone home for a regular Norwegian festival. The rain outside, the depressed guest inside, the maimed mamma, the absent papa did not seem to promise a very brilliant Christmas for Blossom and Royal, but they were a cheerful, loving little couple, full of "faith, hope and charity."

In the sitting-room hung a small wood-cut, called "Homeless." The forlorn, ragged little waif was a living reality to them, and they often tried to comfort him, especially as the holidays drew near, telling him daily that if he would only "tome Twistmas we'll vide our tandy wis you." The day before Christmas a lady called, saying that she was trying to get a bit of Christmas for two children near, whose father was a worthless man and the mother ill. The six-year-old girl carried milk to customers and had no mittens. The little boy was still younger. Mamma had just finished a pair of such pretty blue seamed mittens. Blossom had watched their slow growth with great interest, for mamma could only knit a few minutes at a time with her lame hand. They were done now, tassels and all, ready for wear.

The little couple had listened attentively to the story. Homeless had come sure enough, and brought his sister with him. Mamma gave the children the candy she had bought for their Christmas, telling them that they could do as they pleased with it—give it or keep it until to-morrow, but that she could not go out for any more. Roy took the candy, looked it carefully over, sighed, meditated awhile, looked at Homeless, who seemed more utterly forlorn than ever, and probably thought, "I only promised to divide;" then at Blossom, who said slowly—

"'Es dive it to 'em."

Carrying it heroically to Mrs. K., he said tenderly: "I've dot a dood papa, an' my mamma isn't in bed."

Blossom held the pretty mittens in her hands and looked at them, then at Homeless. These mittens had grown stitch by stitch, and there had been knit into them so many day-dreams, they matched her new blue plaid cloak, and papa hadn't seen them either, and it would take mamma oh! so long to knit another pair. She thought it all over, for mamma had said, "They are yours, dear, but remember how long it will be before you get others." She turned pleading eyes on Homeless, but there he sat as fixed in his woe as the weeping Niobe. Then she thought aloud (a habit of hers—)

"Her monner is sick. S'e has to tarry milk in 'e told, an' s'e's dot no mittens."

Thrusting them behind her, she backed up to Mrs. K., saying: "Tate 'em, tate 'em to 'e 'ittle dirl," and she ran into mamma's room and closed the door.

The little ones went to bed that night with their heads so full of the surprise in store for Homeless and his sister that they forgot all about their own stockings. In the evening a gentleman called with a package, saying: "Mrs. K. told me about the candy and mittens. This is for the children, and not for missionary purposes, remember."

Next morning Roy awoke, saying in surprise: "O-o-h! Blossom!! We fordot our tockin's nast night."

But the wise Blossom replied seriously: "Nezer min'. Papa dinka det home an' mamma touldn't do out, an' Bessie's done, so I duess it's no matter."

At breakfast mamma handed them the package the gentleman brought the night before, saying: "Mr. F. left this for you two, last evening." It proved a box of Gunther's choicest candies. Oh, how lovely! How came he to think of it? How good he was; and in the fullness of their gratitude, Roy exclaimed—

"Oh! Oh!! Oh!!! We'll det him a whole ballel of tatterpillers next summer."

"'Es," added Blossom, "an' toads, an' dear 'ittle snakes."

"An' tatoe buds an' gwasshoppers," chimed in Roy. "Oh, aint you dlad 'e ozer chil'ns has dot 'e ozer tandy, taus now we'se all dot tandy," he added.

"An' 'e ozer 'ittle dirl's dlad s'es dot sut nice mittens to teep her finders warm," said generous Blossom, as she looked out of the window and saw the air full of flurrying snowflakes.

Soon the expressman came with the Christmas box from grandma and the aunties. Then the "ohs" and the "ahs," and the dancing of feet and the clapping of hands—all the more intense because the little hearts had expanded, purified and refined under the influence of their self-forgetting. There was no reproach to them now in the attitude of Homeless. Had they not warmed him with mittens and comforted him with candy? Suddenly into their joy came a new thought. Couldn't they have another Christmas when papa came home? Taking out a few caramels to celebrate this Christmas, they put the candy and Christmas box away. The next five days were spent in devising all sorts of surprises; rehearsals were held, and no end of suggestions advanced.

New Year's Eve the kindergarten teacher must be invited, and "the stranger within their gates" was there still; papa had just returned, and after tea all were seated around the bright fire in the back parlor when Mamma and Roy quietly disappeared. Mamma returned soon, and Blossom looked very conscious and mirthful. Papa asked, "Where is Roy?" The answer was a bugle-blast on the other side of the sliding doors. "Oh! Papa! It's Santataus! Open 'e door twick!" cried Blossom, clapping her hands. Papa threw the doors apart, exclaiming: "No. It's Kris Kringle, our Christ child."

There in a sleigh, covered with a robe of fluffy white cotton, with a little red cap surmounting his crown of golden curls, eyes as blue as the heavens on a bright June day, and cheeks whose flush rivaled that sea-shell tint that ever mocks the artist's brush, surrounded by his gifts of sympathy and love sat Roy, a living emblem of "Peace on earth and good will to men." Blossom immediately became his little almoner, distributing the gifts with a suspiciously wise knowing who they were for. Every one was remembered more than once, and last of all came the box of Gunther's best for general distribution.

But lo! papa had disappeared, and just as little Kris Kringle thought he was through, a live Santa Claus, looking so like papa, slipped up behind and filled the sleigh in the rear. Again there was something for all, and another box of candy "for Blossom and Roy." This was unlooked for. "How did papa know we were doin' to have a Twistmas to-night?" He didn't, but he meant they should, and had come prepared accordingly. Such an exuberance of joy, in the midst of which Blossom suddenly caught a look in the minister's face that arrested her mirth.

"I wis' you' chil'ns was here," she said. "You'll has a Twistmas wis 'em when you det home, won't you?"

"I hope so," he replied sadly.

Then there was a little whispered conference in the corner, and she returned with the full candy box, saying: "Tate 'is wis you to he'p mate it." And these little messengers of love sowed the seed of still another Christmas, and increased and prolonged the joy and good-will on earth.

Is not the miracle of the widow's cruse of oil an ever-recurring event, where hearts are warm and generous?"

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

The Pacific Coast Unitarian Conference met November 20-23, at Oakland, Cal., and was the largest and most successful session yet held. The presence of Rev. Grindall Reynolds, secretary of the A. U. A., and his companion in apostolic journeying, Mr. S. A. Eliot, of the Cambridge Divinity School, added greatly to the enjoyment and profit of the occasion. Mr. Reynolds has visited every church and mission of our faith on the coast, and speaks with great hopefulness of the outlook. The essays were by Rev. B. F. McDaniel, on the "Growth and Permanence of the Religious Sentiment"—a fine, thoughtful utterance; "Our Unitarian Need," by Mr. Massey, of Sacramento, who thinks us lacking in zeal; "Books and Morals," a fresh treatment of a hackneyed theme, by A. W. Jackson, and soon to appear in a magazine; Horace Davis' excellent paper on "Christianity in Japan," since published in the Unitarian Review, followed by Missionary Knapp's catholic enunciation of the principles and methods which are to guide him in his novel and important work in that country; Dr. Stebbins' admirable address on "The Future of the California Society," which the daily press printed in full; and the essay which produced the profoundest impression of all—Thomas Eliot's "Divorce and Divorce Laws." The latter will shortly appear as a tract in the conference series. It is a strong utterance from a wise and good man.

Here, surely, was variety and interest enough! The platform meeting on "The Outlook for Liberal Religion" was addressed by Mr. Reynolds, Mr. Greer of Tacoma, Mr. Goodenough, the Oakland Universalist pastor, and a liberal Jewish rabbi, who made the best speech of them all. The Sunday-school and auxiliary meetings were not given time enough, but this will be remedied at the next session. Strong temperance resolutions were passed and testimonies concerning the public school system and the gambling habit. The attendance during the day was from 50 to 150, and evenings from 200 to 500. An excursion was made to the California state university, at Berkeley, five miles from Oakland. A crowded sociable with pleasant addresses concluded the session. The report of the secretary, Rev. C. W. Wendte, was optimistic. He said in his report that publication work had been undertaken in a modest way, and various leaflets and tracts issued. The women's auxiliary societies had distributed thousands of printed documents through the mails, and conducted a missionary correspondence with sympathizers all over the coast. The conference had made its first concerted effort to raise money for domestic missions during the past year, and some $350 was sent to Tacoma—a small showing, but at least a beginning. To the Unitarian Association $463.40 had been given by the churches of the conference, while the former had expended upon this coast $5,782.85. The amount of this missionary aid needed would, however, be much reduced during the coming year. A young Japanese, he said, was about to enter a Unitarian Theological seminary at Meadville, Pa. The report next spoke of hopeful and thriving movements at Oakland, Spokane Falls and at Sacramento, and of projected societies at San José, Pomona and other places.

In March last Mr. Wendte visited southern California, and very cheering accounts were given of the Unitarian churches in those parts. In the view of the secretary, there is not a town of 5,000 inhabitants in any part of California where a Unitarian church could not be successfully started.

The relations between Unitarians and Universalists were discussed in a broad and genial way. The great difficulty, the secretary said, was the scarcity of able ministers and preachers, the Unitarians being particularly fastidious in this respect. It was hoped to start a Sunday-school and church service in Alameda in the near future. Santa Cruz, Napa, Stockton, Reno and Fresno were available points for liberal societies. The Starr King Monument fund was commended to the churches. Every Unitarian society on the coast was now conducted on the free seat plan.

In June last Mr. Wendte went north and visited Salem, Portland, Tacoma, Seattle, Spokane Falls, Helena, and other places, in most of which Unitarian societies exist. He had traveled 4,500 miles, made 200 visits, written 1,200 or more letters, in addition to his work in Oakland. The visits of John Fiske, A. M. Knapp, Robert Collyer and Mr. Reynolds were pleasantly referred to. But the best results of the year were spiritual, and not to be set down in statistics.

The treasurer, Mr. C. A. Murdock, showed that the conference receipts had been $689.07, of which $365 had been contributed for Tacoma. It was resolved to raise $750 for the A. U. A. the coming year among the churches, the amount to be apportioned, also, to raise an equal amount for home mission work. Every society, save one, was represented at the meetings, and the spirit throughout was hearty and unanimous.

DELEGATE.

Boston.—The demand for admission tickets to our Globe Theater on a recent Sunday evening, to hear the sermon of Rev. Edward Everett Hale, was very great. The house was crowded. A large part of the attendants were non-churchgoers. Whether now visible or invisible, the results of such people's meetings are certainly great.

—Rev. C. F. Dole's lessons at Channing Hall, on Thursday afternoons, before Sunday-school teachers and others, are well attended. They are highly instructive to young and old. In January the course of lessons by Rev. Francis Tiffany, on "Ethics," is expected to be widely popular.

—Rev. Henry G. Spaulding, our Sunday-school secretary, though in the midst of his winter's work of editing newspaper, festival services of song, and new Sunday-school manuals, and filling his leisure time in attending local conferences and teachers' unions, has accepted the invitation to join in the institute meeting of the National Bureau of Unity Clubs. Rev. J. L. Jones will be the guest speaker, and Rev. A. J. Rich the mainspring of the movement. Rev. C. F. Dole and W. H. Lyon and other clergymen will assist in making the bureau appreciated.

THE GRANDEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED!

Theodore Parker's

Lessons from the World of Matter and the World of Man.

SELECTED FROM NOTES OF UNPUBLISHED SERMONS, BY RUFUS LEIGHTON. CLOTH, 12MO, PP. 430; REDUCED FROM $2.50 to $1.25.

"This volume is by all odds the best one-volume introduction to the great preacher. Kindling passages caught on the wing by the stenographic pencil of an appreciative listener, they give the glow and the fire of one who dispensed both light and heat in days that were dark and chilly. The reduced price ought to give this perennial book a fresh lease on life and a new field. * * * The book contains one of the best portraits of Theodore Parker extant, good enough to be cut out and framed if the owner is willing to mutilate the book."—Unity.

LOVE AND THEOLOGY.

A Novel. By CELIA PARKER WOOLLEY.
1 vol., 12mo. $1.50.

"It is not only entertaining, but interesting from the highest point of view. It goes on from chapter to chapter with ever-increasing force and power. No book of fiction that Ticknor & Co. have published has had, to my thinking, the depth and value of this, and nowhere have the present study and questioning of theological subjects been more clearly and satisfactorily presented; for, in all this presentation, there is not a hint of irreverence or flippancy of any kind. There is, instead, a very beautiful presentation of the very best interpretation of the liberal thoughts of to-day,—an interpretation that contains the highest spirituality. Herein is the book of great value; and that it will be reckoned among the books that will be of service to all intelligent inquirers I have no doubt. It is, I should say most decidedly, a book to own, and not to merely read for amusement only, and then to throw aside; and this for the characterization as well as the presentation of the newer interpretations of the Bible, etc. This characterization is exceedingly well done, showing no effort, but a natural gift of character-painting. The dialogue is something more than mere made-up talk, and the reflective portion contains philosophy of the most cultivated kind; and this, of course, includes the fact that this philosophy is free of narrow and vulgar self-assertion."—Nora Perry. Mailed, on receipt of price, by CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 175 Dearborn st., Chicago.

APHORISMS OF THE THREE THREES;

BY

EDWARD OWINGS TOWNE.

"Every ninth night after the first night of each month following the ninth month of the year, nine gentlemen of Chicago hold what they call 'Ninth Night Banquets.' Seated in threes at three three-legged tables, they spend the evening in conversation, discussing a great variety of topics, 'from grave to gay—from lively to severe.' From the volume of wit and wisdom thrown off by these banqueting philosophers. Mr. Edward Owings Towne has collected and arranged one hundred and eighty-one aphorisms, which are published in a neat volume bearing the curious title, 'Aphorisms of the Three Threes.'—Public Opinion.

"Each Aphorism is like a bubble from the glass, afloat and reflecting the sunlight with many hues. Be it wit or satire that lights, or literature or life, humanity or the individual, that is revealed, some truth is made bright and attractive."—Boston Globe.
Bound in silk cloth, gilt top and side stamp. Price, $1.00. Mailed to any address on receipt of price by publishers, CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 175 Dearborn street, CHICAGO. Catalogues free.

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XX.]

CHICAGO, JANUARY 7, 1888.

[NUMBER 19.]

EDITORIAL.

CHARACTER is contagious. Wherever it makes its appearance it is sure to spread.

THE spirit of religion has uses for names and words, but it is larger than them all.

LOVE, the primal force of the universe, is the ever-growing power in society.

WE read the records of the crimes in the world in the newspapers, but most of its virtues must go unrecorded, they are so numerous.

TRUE piety to-day seeks to denominationalize the charities, to unsect the philanthropies, to destroy the creed fences and break down the party walls of society.

LOVE is the only charity. The loving soul will make a home in a sod hut; but Vanderbilt has not wealth enough to make a home for a crippled newsboy without it.

THE case against Prof. E. C. Smyth, of Andover Theological Seminary, is to be placed on the calendar of the supreme court of Massachusetts, on appeal.

THE English Church receives in tithes about $20,000,000 a year. Of this amount $5,000,000 is expended in schools, hospitals, church buildings, etc., and the remaining $15,000,000 goes to pay the salaries of the clergy.

THE Messenger asks a question full of significance: "While the church of Christ has been gathering in not more than three million of converts from the heathen world, the natural increase of that world has been twenty millions. Must not a tremendous advance be made somewhere along our lines of work?"

It has been said that the greatest magazine article of the year just gone is Gladstone's "Universitas Hominum," in the December North American Review. In this he foresees the commonwealth of souls that "will include the sum total of human life and human experience as lived and as gathered on the surface of the globe."

THIS year let us all work to convert our churches to the work of religion. Let us direct the enthusiasm of the competent to the lasting but modest interests of humanity, that the petty interest of the "creed" and the "scheme" may go. Let our churches direct the high energies of our men and women to the renovation of this world, and the next will take care of itself.

THE Methodist Recorder well says: "It is not the men who make the greatest display in public, and do the greatest amount of fine talking, that do the most good; it is the quiet, earnest, faithful, persevering workers who find something to do, and, instead of talking about it, go to work and do it, that in the long run, accomplish most for God and humanity. It is work that tells; and it is workers that the world needs. The mightiest forces in nature are the silent forces, that are always in operation, doing their work. And the men who accomplish the greatest good are the men who are always about their Father's business, quietly and unostentatiously, it may be, laboring to save souls and extend the cause of the Redeemer. "Go work to-day in my vineyard."

WHAT a Japanese reviewer in a native magazine has recently said of Christianity will some day be said of it in all countries: "Its perpetuity in our country depends upon the general enlightenment and learning of its teachers, not on the value of its dogmas; its adjuncts, and not its doctrines, will decide its fate. To their claim to supernatural origin we are supremely indifferent; to the value of the influences which accompany its propagation and acceptance we are keenly alive."

Iowa and Kansas are giving practical illustrations of the possibility and the legitimacy of uniting the public sense and conscience in a righteous law against the innovations of a demoralizing traffic in a pernicious poison—a traffic which is lifted ever into dangerous proportions by vicious appetite and the greed for money. Said a skeptical, but intelligent and candid witness: "I have more respect for prohibition since traveling through these states." Says an Iowa gambler: "The shot that killed Haddock at Sioux City has shattered our business in Iowa for good."

Is it left for a Boston man to discover and announce the sacred antiquities of Chicago? Edward Everett Hale writes us: "Is it a matter of common talk in Chicago that La Salle called the Chicago river the divine river? His text is, 'Pour aller vers la rivière divine, appelé par les sauvages Chicagou,'—in order to approach the divine river which the savages called Chicagou." We fear that the Chicagoans are not fully alive to the sacred traditions of their local Jordan; but in this respect they are not much different from their fellows in other parts of the world. It is high spirituality that discovers the sanctities of things near.

WE are sorry to hear a report that our contributor, Rev. J. C. F. Grumbine, of Syracuse, has been asked to resign his charge, on account of his interest in the Henry George movement. Mr. Pentecost, as will be seen from an extract in another note taken from his resignation sermon at Newark, N. J., attributes the final friction which necessitated the step to the same cause. A recent number of the Nation jeers at both these men and the movement they represent. Surely the Anti-Poverty Society will have to take up more collections to save its apostles from poverty. We confess our incompetency to arrive at even a working judgment upon the merits of the propositions of Henry George and his associates; but we have no difficulty in seeing that they are earnest men, grappling with momentous problems, and that the present relations of capital and labor, of wealth and citizenship, are not ideal, that many things are bad and need mending, and unless the pulpit has a right to take a hand in any attempt at improvement and better adjustment in the spirit of love and the humility of wisdom, so much the worse for the church. The world will love those who labor for its elevation, even though they blunder, and the church cast them out. We like much the prophetic spirit in the charge which was given at the installation of one of our western ministers not many months ago: "Young man, preach upon the living questions of the day, even though you make a fool of yourself."

provide training in drawing, clay modeling, tile-making, wood-carving, metal work, etc., to adults, free of expense, who desire to teach these handicrafts to needy children in the mission schools of the city. This normal class meets every Wednesday morning, from 10 to 12, in the modeling room of the Art Institute Building, corner of Van Buren street and Michigan avenue. "Six of the leading churches in the city are preparing to introduce handwork for boys." In Great Britain there are about 150 handwork classes in operation now, and "many of them have become self-supporting from the sale of work."

It is said that the pope received 2500 congratulatory telegrams on New Year's day, besides a magnificent array of presents from the crowned heads of Europe. A contributor sees in this an alarming sign, and fears that the Roman hierarchy is moving onward to the strength that may need bloodshed to thwart and break its power. We are no friends of priestcraft, and we see much to deplore in the Catholic church; but to us this church is still so instinct with humanity, so full of pathetic loyalty and persistent devotion, that we are willing to trust it in the world a while longer, and to believe that it, too, has its work to perform, its message to give.

ETHELBERT STEWART, in the Journal of Industrial Education, has a very telling article upon such education in relation to crime. Of all the facts such as statistics gather, what is the most common fact about our prison convicts? Not that they can not read and write: of the 552 convicts received into the Eastern Penitentiary of Pennsylvania in 1886, 477 had had a "fair common-school education,"—and that proportion seems typical. Not that they have not been to Sunday-school: of the 564 convicts received in the same prison in 1885, 515 had been Sunday-school scholars for longer or shorter times. Not that they are intemperate: of the 552, 104 were total abstainers, and of the 564, 99 were total abstainers. The most common, the most generic fact, is that the convicts know no trade. Of those 552, 39 had learned a trade by apprenticeship; 10 had been apprenticed, but had left before finishing; 62 had "picked up a trade or two by working at them;" leaving 441 "entirely ignorant of trade knowledge." Of the 564 received the year before, 459 had no trade knowledge. Of the 461 convicts received in 1884, 361 had no trade knowledge. Of the 471 male prisoners received in 1883, 378 had never learned a trade. Between 1876 and 1885, this Pennsylvania penitentiary received, in all, 1069 convicts under twenty-one years old; of these, 864 had fair common-school learning, but 993 had never learned a trade. How is it in a western prison? Of the 1494 convicts in the Joliet prison, Illinois, 151 are "illiterate;" 127 can read, but not write; 1087 have fair education; 129 are college graduates! That shows it is not lack of letters that takes men into crime. Of the same number, 413 are classed as "intemperate;" 764 as "moderate drinkers;" 317 as "total abstainers." That shows that total abstinence by no means keeps men out of crime. But light comes again when we learn that of the 668 received at Joliet between October and October, 1885–6, 478 had no trade knowledge. Do the prisons all around bear witness to the same fact? If so, it seems as if the weak spot in our educational systems lay plain in sight. After reflecting upon these figures, single out Chicago alone and consider three items more,—that Chicago spends yearly $18.93 for each pupil in its public schools; that it costs her $33.00 per arrest for each of her 44,261 arrests made in 1886, and that the city of Chicago never expended a dollar to teach a boy a trade. London pays from the city treasury $385,000 a year towards the support of trade schools, and Mr. Stewart asks, "May there not be some connection between this fact and the fact that in 1883 there was in London but one arrest for each 48 of the population, while in New York during the same year, there was one arrest to each 21 of the population; in Brooklyn one to 23; in St. Louis one to 20, and in Chicago one to 15?"

197 Christmas Cards.

Concerning Christmas cards, a neighbor journal writes: "One clergyman, not long since, told the writer that he and his wife received the year before 197 cards, ranging in price from ten cents to $3.00. When asked, 'What did you do with them?' he replied, 'Burned them' and added, 'It nearly ruined my wife's eyes acknowledging them all.' But why spend eyes on the acknowledgments? And why spend the ten cents and the dollars in the sending? And why condemn the pleasant custom instead of finding out a better way to practice it? If it is pleasant to hear the "Merry Christmas" from the house-mate, it is pleasant to hear it from the heart-mates a thousand paces or a thousand miles away. You have, perhaps, some twenty correspondents, but you have a hundred friends with whom this custom gives the chance of interchanging easy greeting once a year. The Christmas card is an unwritten letter to them all. It is the dumb message, "I remember you." It is the nod and the smile to the passer-by upon the distant streets. But to be this, the card should hold words after one's own heart; and to send it to your hundred or two hundred, it should cost but little money and but little time. One way to compass both of these conditions is to take in three or four like-minded comrades, select or write the greeting words together, have a thousand copies printed, and divide. Each card then will carry your message, and the sending to your whole wide circle need cost scarcely more than twice the postage. And, of course, it should be sent without expectation of acknowledgment. The joy lies in wanting to send it and in believing it is welcome.

The Past.

Two great changes have occurred of late in men's ideas of the Past; the first concerning its duration, the second concerning its disappearance. Till some half-century ago nearly the whole Christian world held it for fact beyond suspicion that a little sheaf of six thousand years held the complete back history of our earth. How grandly the genealogy of Jesus, given in the New Testament Christmas story, chronicles the generations, only some eighty of them in all, back to "Enos, who was the son of Seth, who was the son of Adam, who was the son of God!" And this world of ours was just six days older than that Adam. "Creation" still heads the almanac in our bibles with the date "4004 B. C." Oct. 23 I once saw given as Creation-Day. A day and an hour there must have been according to the common notion of "Nothing—and then two elephants!" But that most important anniversary of all has somehow fallen out of the calendar. And once, while looking through an old religious book, I found in it the tracks of some earnest reader who had been reading it a hundred years before; he was a President of Yale College, too, I think. And he had left on the fly-leaf his sober computation, based on the long lives of those early bible-men, that "only four generations were needed to hand down the tradition of Creation as far as Abraham," when real history, it might be said, began. The tradition of Creation! To-day it is guessed that some of the Swiss lake dwellings may date as far back as 4004 B. C.; and it is considered settled that long before the lake-dwellers, European savages peeped from the mouths of their caves by the river banks to see their huge contemporaries, the mammoth and the woolly rhinoceros, come to drink, with other creatures of mighty bones and mighty names, whose race has all run out. For behind all written records we pass to the borderlands of tradition,—and tradition hands us on to legend, and legend hands us on to myth, and myth gives us into the guidance of language, which leads us far, far back along the human pathways to old Asian homesteads where our ancestors with cousin-nations, now for ages sundered by land, sundered by speech, sundered by differing civilizations, once lived together as own brothers, thinking the same thoughts, using the same names, doing the same work. And even back of these word-fragments imbedded in our common speech, we have the fragments of old tools and weapons imbedded in those cave-deposits, to hint how life went on in days when men perhaps were still learning how to change their growls and grunts and groans to "talk." Bunsen, studying Egypt, asks for twenty thousand years as the theater on which to draw out the phenomena of human civilization. Darwin knows not what period will account for even the later steps of man's ascent from brute conditions. And this is human history alone; while human history, however long its span, is but as the last tick in the hour of life upon this earth. The geologists divide that earth life into three great zones, according to the kind of creatures that have lived. Twelve ages, three ages, one age, 12 to 3 to 1, shows the relative duration of these zones, by Professor Dana's reckoning; and man appears on the scene toward the end of the period designated by that final "one." Others, who venture to put their guess at Mother Earth's age into figures (it is all a guess, for she is a woman and will not tell her age), reckon from 1,000,000 to 9,000,000 of years for the organic life which has existed here; and these millions have to be multiplied past conjecture to reach the horizon of the time that represents the successive condensations, first nebular, then liquid, at last solid, which must have preceded organic forms of life.

That is the "tradition of creation," as we spell its record out in rocks and stars. Such is the past, as we have learned during this last century to conceive it. Contrast it with the earlier thought! Christendom, in its haste for a future eternity, has never appreciated the eternity behind. More than one of the older religions had a truer insight. The old time stoic, for instance, believed, as firmly as Herbert Spencer believes to-day, in great world-cycles, vast processes of evolution and dissolution. And the Buddhist speaks on this wise: "A kalpa," he says, "is the period during which a universe lasts. Now, if there were a high rock, sixteen miles long and sixteen broad,—and if once in a hundred years the rock should be touched by a bit of the finest cloth of Benares, that rock would be reduced to the size of a mango nut before a quarter part of one of these 'kalpas' had run by." Thus stoicism guessed and Buddhism poetized before Christianity was born. But at last Christendom has begotten the sciences whose prose outdoes that poetry by actual computations. The western mathematics have caught up with the classic prophecy and oriental imagery.

The second change in the idea of the past concerns its disappearance. Not long ago we used to think of it as mostly dead. Now we think of it as deathless—hardly as vanished, even. It is like heat and light and electricity, which never die, but are transformed into other modes of motion, converted into correlates. No old experience which we have lived through dies; it is converted into inward correlates. A "dead" look on a face—it lasted but a moment when it was a look—is one of our companions now to comfort or to terrify the days. A "dead" word is playing marches for us still to keep us to the front. A "dead" belief is broadening from a petty dogma to the vision of some law of nature. A "dead" hope diffused has become the serenity of peace. A "dead" love has become the secret spring of sympathies in us. A "dead" endeavor has become that future which we now remember so consciously to bless. A "dead" sin's trail of retribution we are dragging still; and we believe in judgments to come because we see so well the judgments that are lasting on in our own life and in the lives that we have neighbored. No old experience dies; it is converted into inward correlates. We may forget it, but it never forgets us. That is the new doctrine of the Past that we to-day are learning to believe. Among the major prophets of the doctrine is that subtle analyzer of the soul, George Eliot.

And in yet wider scope this new conception is taught us by the men of science as the doctrine of "heredity." The ancestral past is deathless in us as our very self's. The inward correlations, however hidden, hold good in the race-life as well as in the individuals; so say the little Darwins and the little Spencers now—their name is legion—who write the histories, the essays and the poems, the editorials and the sermons, of to-day. It is getting hard to think of ourselves in the singular number, so conscious are we growing of our grandfathers: everyone is a "we,"—himself and all his forefathers. And wider still the new conception stretches, till the greater Darwins and the greater Spencers change the word "heredity" to "evolution," and the correlations of experience are dimly tracked from race to race, from grade to grade of body and of mind, at last from world to world! And all the Past is seen immortal in the passing instant. Such is the storage of time as we know it now. William Blake was called the mad poet: was it his insanity, or his sanity, that wrote—

"To see a world in a grain of sand,
And a heaven in a wild flower;
Hold infinity in the palm of your hand,
And eternity in an hour!"

W. C. G.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

To Rev. Chester Covell on His Seventieth Birthday.

Seventy swings of life's pendulum
Seem many and slow to count;
Seventy rounds in the ladder of life
Seem long and toilsome to mount.

But every swing of the pendulum
Means life as well as time;
And the wider view from each ladder round
Should make us willing to climb.

Pendulum swings to you have meant
"Do good, do good, while you can!"
Ladder rounds said, plain as could be,
"Draw higher your fellow man!"

Pendulum swings—are they many more
Ere the last its word has said?
Ladder rounds—are they many or few
That your feet must slowly tread?

We, who love you, might swing too long
The pendulum of your years;
We might, in love, build a ladder so high
That its climbing bring pain and tears.

God, our Father, the pendulum swings,
And He will swing aright;
God, our Father, the ladder builds
That leads at last to the light.

JUNIATA STAFFORD.

Perfect Personal Liberty.

The constitution of the United States guarantees to every man life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. In this western world the phrase should be more tersely put—the constitution guarantees to every man perfect personal liberty; for whether it be the far-rolling prairies, accustoming to limitless vision, or the invincible Puritanism within him, here man thinks himself but dead, robbed indeed of life and the pursuit of happiness, if he be not free to speak, to act, to govern. Like Sterne's caged starling, he will continually cry, "I can't get out." Not that the liberty of every man is absolute, for that would imply equal breadth in every soul, but that the Englishman, the German, even the volatile Frenchman, finds a pleasing intoxication in the air; is, as it were, new born to his own possibilities. Hopes springs in even the most despairing peasant heart at the mention of America. A bigot in Europe turns into an American tolerant; the tolerant into a liberal; the liberal perhaps into an ultra liberal—but what of that; to be eccentric, even unbalanced, is it not better than to be dumb to the issues of life?

Not many days since a sermon was preached from a Charleston pulpit, and the following week the political machine, the press, the people, were seething with excitement, because the minister noted the fatal danger of opposing liberty, whether in church or state. Said he, "A morning newspaper is a sort of a missive or messenger designed to form our opinions and guide our action. As I laid down the paper a few days ago, having been greatly impressed by its contents, my eye fell on another page lying open on the table. This was likewise a missive designed to form opinion. It was a letter from Paul to the church in Corinth, and has been adopted by many churches since as good instruction still. One document said, spreading it on two pages, as if it were the one thing to be impressed, 'Independency in thought and action is fatal to the Democratic party.' The other, on which my eye immediately fell, said: 'Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.' " His conclusion embodies the thought as in a nutshell: "Accepting the verdict [of the Democrats] so offered us, two things impress me: 1st. The damaging effect of the confession on the party that makes it. 2d. The confirmation it gives to the method of the Liberal Church." In a word, either liberty is utter ruin to Democracy, or the lack of it is ungodliness. Which statement shall we accept, that of the Democratic party or of St. Paul? Which is truth? We need not hesitate for reply. Every great humane movement, intellectual growth or spiritual development was at bottom founded on the principle of liberty. The old, old story of Adam and Eve, whether regarded as fact or fable, demonstrates the utter impossibility of permanent limitations for the human mind. From the most conservative standpoint, supposing the scriptural record a plain statement of fact, that Omnipotence foresaw and permitted plucking the forbidden fruit, effectually proves the beneficence of the outcome—human freedom in the choice of good and evil. Every great wrong will, must right itself if the soul—the God within us—be left unfettered, for that feeds on truth, and truth in the end annihilates error.

In the early days of the anti-slavery movement, William Lloyd Garrison and Benjamin Lundy united in the publication of the Genius of Universal Emancipation. The pure, true, kindly Quaker believed in gradual emancipation, and so wrote; Garrison in immediate emancipation, and thundered forth his doctrine. How reconcile the two voices! Finally Friend Lundy said to Garrison: "Well, thee may put thy initials to thy editorial articles and I will put my initials to mine." But the result may be easily imagined. To use Garrison's words: "My demand for immediate emancipation so alarmed and excited the people everywhere that where Friend Lundy would get one new subscriber I would knock off a dozen." The problem, however, which might have been a difficult one to solve, solved itself, Garrison being arrested for libel and thrown into a Baltimore jail. Such is the logic of events. We may fret under the difficulties of the temperance problem, of the woman question, of the trend of religious thought, and even while we fret event steps in with her magic wand, and lo! affairs ultimately arrange themselves as naturally and beautifully as the crystals fall in order from the solution of a salt. The law which provided for the growth of the human mind also provided for entire safety in the operation of that law.

With the most superficial vision, each of us may note the way the world is tending. The genuine apostle of freedom nobly demands not only for himself untrammelled action, but accords to all his fellow-men equal privileges. Jesus said: "I come not to destroy but to fulfill the law." So the Goddess of Liberty brings with her a noble retinue—justice, peace, progress, hope, charity, and their attendant virtues. And the millennium—do we not see it coming, very, very slowly but surely?

Every mechanism in nature was constructed, so to speak, with a stop-cock or safety valve. So of personal freedom. "How!" thunders capital, "Do you call this liberty? Do you call it justice? I pay my men regularly every Saturday night, and when they choose, they say 'Look a here, boss, I want more money for this here job and I'll hev it or quit.' And quit they do, and whisht! I'm $20,000 out of pocket. Now, do you call that fair?" The laborer says, on the other hand, "Do y' know what it is to slave and slave and never lay by a cent, and see another feller rollin' in wealth? Well, that's me. And if I ask for more wages, the boss says, 'Pshaw! You git out! I can get plenty more like y' at half yer price.' And so he kicks me out." Neither sees on both sides, and the result is, labor combines against capital, and capital against labor. After a long series of battles capital finds itself either supplied with unskilled hands or served in a dogged, devil-may-care spirit. Labor finds itself either unemployed or working under pressure. Neither party is content and at last they arrive at the truth, born of bitter experience and the resultant of entire liberty—that capital and labor, to work harmoniously, must work together, capital appreciating and rewarding faithfulness without labor's pleading, and labor working for his employer as himself, giving good measure, pressed down and running over. This is the necessary outcome of freedom and freedom only, for any large truth will seem but a half truth until its reverse fallacy is understood, which can only be through the possibility of failure. Hence the ponderous pivot on which turns human progress, physical, intellectual, moral, spiritual, is liberty, perfect personal liberty. To put it very strongly, and as the South Carolinian, before mentioned, thinks the broad Unitarian might put it, "Perish the party, split the machine, perish even the church, but do you, every man of you, think for yourself?" For thus you will elevate the party and infinitely upbuild the church.

BELLE L. GORTON.

The New Knowledge and the Old Faith.

All the old conceptions of Deity are forced to undergo a change. An individualized God creating and directing from without is an impossibility in an infinite universe. The prevalent theological ideas came into existence when there was no slightest apprehension of the true majesty and grandeur of the cosmos. Born of narrow thought, they are wholly inadequate to convey any proper sense of that boundless Being who gives matchless life and order to this infinite multitude of suns and worlds. We can not any longer familiarly name this Eternal, speak of his plans, discuss his attributes or speculate upon his purposes in the old, assured, careless way. The God of the theologies has forever vanished, and in his place comes a subtle consciousness of all-embracing Life and Power,—a sublime sense of a serene Presence,

"Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
And the round ocean, and the living air,
And the blue sky, and in the mind of man,
A motion and a spirit that impels all objects of all thought,
And rolls through all things."

And if we still adoringly call this incomprehensible Presence by the old sacred name, it is not to claim familiarity, or to suggest knowledge, but because that name, God, is so ancient, so simple and so strong that our English speech has none better wherewith to indicate the ineffable Spirit which is the living soul of this vast universe. Although the old name is spoken, let none imagine that the old idea is cherished. The new thought transcends the old as the universe of science transcends the heavens and earth of mythology.

With this change in his thought about God there has come a correspondent change in man's thought about himself. It lowers man's esteem when he realizes the cosmic insignificance of his little planet. He loses a little of his egotistic certainty that all creation is for his special use and behoof, as he stands in awed wonder before the vastness and multiplicity of being which his own intelligence has discovered. And how presumptuous grows the thought that the great cause and life of all has in any way withdrawn itself from its eternal ongoing to serve his purposes or to plan his salvation! All claims to favoritism of any kind shrink into nothingness when the stupendous distance between the individual and the universe is realized. Then man begins to realize that he can have no monopoly of God.

But while a wholesome consciousness of littleness is thus awakened, there also arises a cheering sense of kinship with and at-home-ness in the universe. Man no longer stands alone, a being specially created by divine will for a divine purpose, but lying under the deep shadow of divine displeasure. He is part of the unfolding of the eternal life within and around, is one with it all, partakes of the universal spirit, and is moving with the whole creation towards some mighty mysterious destiny. Born of the earth there is in him such power and such aspiration that he is steadily freeing himself from bondage to the earth and rising higher in the scale of intelligent being. He transforms the face of the planet with his cunning hands and soars beyond the farthest stars in his daring thought. There is much of the old, fierce, animal fire in his veins, but it gives him power; power to contend with the material forces which environ him, power to wrest from them their helpful secrets and to obtain mastery over them; power even to temper and control the very source whence it springs, to transform passion into reason, to replace appetite by conscience, to elevate a brother of the brutes into a child of the spirit. The old, ruined, condemned race has disappeared, and in its stead stands a noble, aspiring, conquering race, ever rising into brighter light and developing a nobler manhood.

How this change in our ideas about God and man destroys the whole fabric of old theology! The fall of man, the anger of God, the impending doom, the plan of salvation, the descent of Deity, his sacrifice on the cross, the conditioning of eternal life upon its acceptance, the awful shadows of penal punishment,—how they all vanish before growing knowledge, and “the places which once knew them know them no more forever.” And with them goes the old idea of divine sovereignty, considered as the enactment and promulgation of special, moral and religious laws for human government, which laws are supernaturally written in a book and interpreted by a priest. And in its place stand the great moral instincts and religious aspirations of mankind, born out of its steady contact with the all enveloping infinite and its manifold experience in solving the problems of life, and growing ever clearer and brighter, more powerful and more perfect, as it rises in intelligence and gains finer spiritual sensibility. The new thoughts are too vast and grand to be compassed by the old theories. Man's relations to God can not be the strained and artificial ones which those theories assert. The eternal Life beats in every breast and finds expression in every soul. There is no shutting out its presence, no intermitting its blessing. Whatever man's animality, he is not cut off from the infinite helpings and inspirations. He needs no mediator to bring him face to face with that Supreme Being in whom his own life inheres, no atonement to induce the Power which always “works for righteousness,” to aid him in every upward endeavor. Thus the old theological gloom which has so long clouded the heavens and darkened the earth melts away, the infinite blue shines over all, full of light and tenderness, studded with inspiring stars of hope and trust.

Nor is any precious thing lost in this great transformation. All that was ever real and true remains, and is more real and true than before. Nothing disappears but guesses and imaginations, but crudities and falsities. The great facts of God and his universe and that eternal order which men call Providence, are all here, all ours, and surround us more livingly and lovingly than ever. Our new thinking only brings us closer to the heart of these and makes them more wonderful and glorious. It is a fresh revelation of the divineness in everything. It does not destroy the verities of morality and religion, but manifests their true nature and sets them in right relations. The more we know of life the greater its mysteriousness and sacredness. The more we know of the ways of the incomprehensible Being whence all proceeds, the more deeply we marvel, the more reverently we adore. Let us not fear that true religion will suffer from increase of knowledge. The sun still shines, the stars stand in their old places, morning and evening are fresh and beautiful, the glad spring buds and blossoms, though man's thought about the laws and relations of the universe suffers change. And the great facts of God, duty and eternal life do not vanish because we grow into some better apprehension of their meaning and mightiness; they rather fill the whole arching heavens with clearer light and serener peace.—From a Sermon by Rev. T. B. Forbush, of Milwaukee.

A Delayed Christmas Greeting.

CLINTON, N. Y., Christmas, 1887.

MY DEAR UNITY—I have long felt a desire to express my love for you and yours. This morning I have jogged my pen to help me fulfill my neglected joy. It is a little easier to put it in rhyme.

Ho, western brothers! Do you not yet know
That thoughts, like Empires, have a Westward flow?
You could not, if you would, the East renew,
And dear New England on the prairies view.

Twice round the world, since history begun,
Has man rolled onward with the rolling sun;
And still he moves, with a propulsion strong,
On newer fields to wipe out older wrong.

Our Aryan fathers, that we left to hold
Our homestead, where the sacred Indus rolled,
Behold,—unchanged through twice five thousand years,—
Their children's progress with pathetic tears.

Those children, resting on the Persian plain,
Their offspring's roving restlessness complain.
But who the strong propelling will can stay,
That bears the Orient on its Westward way?

Till Nature shrines herself in Grecian art,
Finds new expressions for the human heart,—
Till where were only warriors, Christs are seen;
And Gods grow human in the Nazarene.

First poets sing, then Saviors lead the way
To fields of hope from out the far Cathay.
Shall Europe, conquered, swept of every foe,
Be able then to stay the onward flow?

Nor church, nor creed, nor ancient book hath power,
To make the dial mark the self-same hour.
Time laughs at fagots; is itself a screw,
To make stern bigots bend to visions new.

Go on, my Western brothers! plant the field
With that which will the larger harvest yield,—
Of manhood, Godhood, truth and liberty,
Till golden harvests touch the Western Sea.

From there you look straight to our fatherland,—
The Aryan homestead on the Hindoo strand.
So round the world man moves with steady pace,
Still gaining in intelligence and grace.

THE UNITY CLUB.

The Unity Club Institute.

We met in Channing Hall, Thursday, December 15. It was a rainy day; and just a comfortable class of about sixty came together,—pastors, Unity Club officers, and members. Double as many would have made it an audience, and spoiled it as an institute. And yet, with wider notice and more time to get ready, we should be able to test the success of a much larger number, many feeling disappointed not to have known of the meeting. The idea was the Chicago Institute repeated. The programme was in different lines, for the most part.

Rev. Dr. Hale, president of the bureau, made the opening address, his special topic being the philanthropic side of Unity Club work, or, as he preferred to call it, "Public Spirit." I need not give in detail what he said; for all know very well how practical, helpful, earnest, humane, religio-industrial, scientifico-angelic, hand to hand, heart to heart, world-widely sympathetic work of club or church or state must be to meet his mind and be the true evangel. Death is coming to the clubs, as to any association, intellectual or religious, that does not connect itself with the great humane interests of man. So we had a rich and racy send-off. Rev. A. J. Rich then read the opening paper, on "Plans and Work of Unity Clubs" in the different sections of the country. It was only in part the same paper which he read at Chicago, to report which here would be to spoil it for a fuller publication, which may follow. His idea was that the Unity Club, representing the thought and study side of church life and activities, should not stop with intellectual life, but make that the basis and quickener of social and philanthropic work, everything centering in the well-being of the church and the community.

Rev. George W. Cooke followed, with an address on "Unity Clubs in Country Churches." His leading thought was that church life in most country parishes is exceedingly barren of anything literary, social, or life-satisfying, and that, as an antidote to bickerings and personal hatreds and petty gossip, which fritter away so much of the time and thought of the people, a Unity Club might prove a Godsend, be a healer and a stimulus to a better way of home, club, and society life. This would come about through the reading and study of great authors, which would tend, also, to re-enforce religious life.

Rev. Jenkin Ll. Jones, vice-president of the bureau, taking the chair, started discussion on the several papers and addresses, his own ringing words from a full heart and wide experience in club work and church work being gladly received by all. Mr. Jones took the ground that the Unity Club should stand primarily for co-operative study, for the intellectual life of the church. He would have the social and the philanthropic sides of church life emphasized, but would not connect them with the Unity Clubs, or, rather, having the intellectual well provided for, that would insure all else good for the church and for the community. And he would have old and young come into the club, which should have its different sections adapted to the needs of the varying tastes and capacities of the church constituency. Mr. Jones did not like the word "club," and hoped we should get a better term to express the idea. With him, it is a church movement; and, instead of membership fees, he has a ten-cent admission at each meeting, and the club is open to all in or outside the church who wish to come on these terms, unless the attendance becomes so large that it outgrows the capacity of the room, or grows too unwieldy for successful membership.

The afternoon came, with a paper to open with from Rev. W. H. Lyon, on "Half-hour Reading Circles," which he believed would be of great value in the way of intellectual stimulus and of actual and useful knowledge. It might be the only associated literary work of the clubs and classes, or it might supplement other intellectual work. Sometimes all the school teachers in a city or town join in this half-hour study, and meet to compare notes, and find it of great interest, and helpful in their profession and socially. The suggestion is a good one, blending the Chautauqua and the Unity Club work most happily.

The next paper to follow was by Rev. H. G. Spaulding, on "The Study of Art," which was artistic in its presentation, and gave valuable suggestions to persons wishing to pursue the study. This paper will most happily supplement the leaflet just published by the bureau, on "The Study of the History of Italian Art," by Miss Ellen Hale. It is a good thing to see our churches waking up to the larger life that is before them, and opening ways of culture and of work for the young people, who have not so much to interest them in associated life or work connected with our churches as is to be found in other churches. If we do not have the prayer-meeting and missionary work to bring our young people together, it is well to have this intellectual nucleus and inspiration, which, religiously guided, may be a most excellent initiation into the more proper church life and work, and so hold them for ourselves.

Rev. C. F. Dole gave an address on "The Citizen and the Neighbor," suggested, I suppose, by his Sunday-school manual of that name; and a very fine study of social ethics it is. With his penetrating and telling way of putting things, the topic was made interesting to us all, and suggested the necessity of treating conscience with holy reverence, and of teaching and practicing a high code of ethics. This was the last set address which, together with the others, was discussed, Mr. Jones manipulating the meeting, and firing up each lagging part. A general feeling was expressed that the bureau needed money to print and circulate more helps and for other expenses. Clubs were urged to join the bureau, not so much for what they could get for the fee, as for what they could do for the bureau, in order that it might in time serve them.

Hardly daring to advertise this Institute, it being the first Eastern experiment, its great success encourages the managers to try it again for a more extended series of meetings. In executive session, the matter of next summer meetings was discussed, and the following committees were appointed: Rev. S. C. Beane, Rev. G. W. Cooke, Rev. A. J. Rich, to devise plans for a week's "Summer School of Theology and Science" at the Weirs, should it be deemed best; and to arrange for a similar meeting at Chautauqua, Messrs. Jones, Cooke, and Rich. It is the intention of the National Bureau of Unity Clubs to arrange for a public meeting in Boston during the May Anniversary Week.

A vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Jones for his earnest and self-sacrificing efforts in making the institute a success, and in doing so much to help all our churches by stimulating the members to a livelier interest in intellectual studies, and, through that, to every other good thing.

There is more in this movement than seems on the surface. Let all be patient and try to help it on, only keeping in mind the need of making the Unity Club, or literary work under any other name, a means of culture as a means of re-enforcing the entire life of the church, and making it more and more a school for training men for all higher life.

A. J. R.

THE intense interest with which almost every one in America follows the course of events in Ireland, makes the present a specially favorable time for studying the history of that unfortunate country. Prof. William F. Allen, of the University of Wisconsin, has done an excellent service for Unity and other similar clubs, by the preparation of a little pamphlet entitled "Outline Studies in the History of Ireland." It contains valuable advice for a general course of reading on this subject, and an outline of fifteen lessons for club study. The latter begin with the general topic, "Ireland and its People, Geography, Ethnology, Archæology," and then trace the history down to the present time, closing with the present "Social and Economical Condition of Ireland," and "Home Rule." The introductory note opens with this sensible bit of advice: "Clubs that wish to take up the study of history are advised to select, each year, some nation or period which has special interest at the time ;" and no country at present meets these conditions more fully than Ireland.

THE STUDY TABLE.

Natural Law in the Business World. By Henry Wood. Boston: Lee & Shepard. Paper covers; pp. 222.

This is a popular edition of a work which has gained some very favorable comment from critics. It aims to apply the principles and tendencies of natural law to questions of political economy, including labor problems, socialism, arbitration, economic legislation, wealth and its distribution, panics and their causes, railroad consolidation, corporations, and numerous other topics. It is conservative in method, and opposes the theories of Henry George and other writers of like tendencies. It has met with favor among business men and conservative citizens generally, and is intended as an antidote to much of the literature of labor reform.

The Little Flowers of St. Francis of Assisi. Translated from the Italian, by Abby Langdon Alger. Boston: Roberts Brothers. $1.00.

This is an attractive volume, giving a sketch of the life of the founder of the order of Begging Friars, together with a number of quaint and pretty legends of him and his disciples. The actual life of Francis of Assisi, breathes an atmosphere of ecstatic devotion and self-sacrifice. Some of its events bore such resemblance to those of the life of Jesus that, after the death of the saint, a crowd of legends sprang up, making of him a second savior. While every tale contains its miracle, these legends differ from the Apocryphal New Testament stories, which are mere wonder-tales, in that these tell over and over of devout humility and loving tenderness and faith. Especially charming are the stories of Francis preaching to "My sisters, the birds," and taming the wolf of Gubbio. There is a tone of simple piety and devotion throughout the whole book, which gives it a very real charm.

The publisher need not have tried for quaintness by means of the old form of the letters, for the translator seems to have succeeded in her effort to preserve the "naïveté" and antique flavor of the original.

An Unknown Country. By the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman." New York: Harper & Brothers. Cloth, pp. 238.

The aim of this handsome book of travels in Ireland, is indicated by the following, from the first chapter: "Without presuming to come forward with any panacea for the ills of poor old Ireland, . . . it struck me that a woman—only a woman—Irish by blood, and English by education, old enough to possess a certain amount of experience as well as common sense, . . . might see things which cleverer people failed to see, and say things which less unbiased people dared not say, concerning a country which is so little appreciated, because so little known." In her journeyings through the picturesque country in the north of Ireland, the author made many observations, the record of which sets forth the land and the people in a new light. The book is filled with graphic descriptions of historic scenery, keen comments on the life and manners of the people, and much wit and wisdom of a general nature. The following is a specimen of the author's side observations, "I detest all religious warfare—the creed, not of love but of hatred, into which, alas! Christianity has been corrupted, until it is made by many to consist, not in holding fast your own faith, but in trying to tear limb from limb—spiritually, sometimes bodily—every one whose faith is different from yours. I believe that men of all faiths, nay, even those poor souls who have no faith at all, ought to live together in brotherly peace, neither meddling with nor condemning each other; sure that God can manifest Himself through the righteous of every creed or no creed; and that, however we may hate one another, he hates no man—except the bigot and the hypocrite."

The book is well printed, from large type, and embellished with numerous engravings illustrative of the text.

THE HOME.

The Souls of the Roses.

Where do the souls of the roses go
After they cease to bloom and grow?
They bloom and they fade and disappear,
Leaving no trace of their presence here,
In the air above or the earth below.
Then, where do the souls of the roses go?
Surely Infinite Beauty's ray
Lighted their loveliness day by day;
And something thrillingly tender ran
From the roses' blush to the soul of man;
Can Infinite Beauty fade and die,
And cease from the universe utterly?
When we wake to fuller life,
Leave our toiling and cease from strife,
Pure in spirit and perfect in grace,
Stand in the porch of the heavenly place,
The breeze will bear on its breath, I trow,
News where the souls of the roses go.

—Lucy L. Stout in Young Days.

The Bird and the Looking-Glass.

Do you know the little canaries you keep in cages are fond of mirrors? We have seen little girls, and older ones, too, who were fond of mirrors; but who ever heard of birds that used them? I will tell you about a little canary that lives at the house where I board.

Some time ago our landlady got a canary and put it in a cage alone. The little bird was taken from a large cage holding a dozen birds. He was very homesick and lonesome, just as you would be if taken away off among entire strangers, away from mamma, papa, sisters, brothers, and everybody you ever knew.

Just so our little birdie cried and moaned, and would not eat nor sing. It wanted to go home and see its mamma. That was too bad, wasn't it? The lady did all she could to comfort it and make it feel at home. She talked to it and petted it, giving it clean water, good seeds, apples, and everything she thought it would like. But it was of no use; birdie kept crying, and wouldn't make friends, but wanted to go home.

One day his mistress brought him a large piece of a broken mirror, as big as my two hands, and placed it on one side of his cage, where he could see it readily. Do you suppose he cared anything for that? Indeed he did. He hopped down, and going up close, looked in, appearing to be perfectly delighted. He chirped, and hopped about, singing and putting on all the airs he was master of. He was not homesick at all after that. He spends much of his time before the glass; and when he goes to sleep at night, he will cuddle down just as close to the glass as he can get. You see, he thinks he is sleeping close beside that other little bird. His mistress often lets him out into the room where he can have more liberty. She may put that glass anywhere in the room, and he will find it, and spend most of his time before it.

One day the little fellow acted very naughty. I think I shall have to tell it just as it was. He got real angry and tried to get into a fight! It all happened because he wanted his own way and could not get it. He went up to the glass so lovingly, and tried to coax the other bird to come and play with him somewhere else. The looking-glass bird would not follow him, but went the other way every time. Then the canary got provoked, and flying at the bird in the glass, tried to have a real fight with him. He tried it only once, and then he looked so ashamed of it. The blame, you see, was all on one side, and shows how foolish it is to get angry and pick a quarrel. He washes himself before the large mirror in the room, pluming his feathers, and making his toilet with much satisfaction, and like all folks that spend much time before the glass, is getting very vain.—D. M., in Youth's Instructor.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Boston.—Secretary Reynolds, since his return from California, has taken great pains to inform eastern inquirers about the hopes and prospects of the Pacific churches. He finds many purses ready to help as occasion may require, and hopes to find young ministers to become the needed missionaries. Oakland, Cal., just closed a fair, adding $600 to their building fund, and Brother Wendte is starting a project to erect soon a church. His hall is now filled weekly, and standing room is growing valuable.

—Rev. Thos. R. Slicer gave, before the Monday Club, an essay on "The Emperor Julian and the Pagan Afterglow." The audience was large, and the subject was treated in an enthusiastic as well as a scholarly manner. Julian, born A. D. 331, died A. D. 363. Severely moral and temperate, his religious character eclipses that of his uncle, Constantine the Great, who made Christianity the religion of the Roman Empire. The decline of Rome and the rise of Christianity both followed fast upon Julian's death. The lives of Constantine and Julian would be excellent studies for Unity Clubs, and an abridgement of Rev. Mr. Slicer's essay would make a valuable Unity Manual. The Monday Club will next week discuss Unity clubs and the National Bureau.

Denver, Colorado.—The Unity Club of this city has been on a search for the Ten Great Novels, on their own account. At a recent public reception of the Club the result of the quest was read, and the Republican of that city publishes the individual preferences of a large number of public men, including the state officers, newspaper men, preachers and educators. The following is the list receiving the highest number of votes. It will constitute the one that the Club are to study: "Les Miserables," "David Copperfield," "Scarlet Letter," "Ivanhoe," "Vanity Fair," "Romola," "Jane Eyre," "Adam Bede," "Ben Hur," "Uncle Tom's Cabin." The eleventh book on the list is "A Tale of Two Cities;" this is followed by other novels in the following order: "Middlemarch," "The New-comers," "John Halifax," "Last Days of Pompeii," "Mill on the Floss," "Henry Esmond," "Anna Karenina," "Don Quixote," "Vicar of Wakefield." One preacher in a neighboring town puts down "Papa's Own Girl" in his list, and a prominent judge selected "the book of Genesis." "Stepping Heavenward," "Miss Gilbert's Career," "The Pilgrim's Progress," and a great variety of books by an infinite number of authors appear on the lists sent in. Rev. Mr. Van Ness read some of the more interesting lists last evening, and interlarded some very humorous remarks with his reading. "She" received two votes. The favorite authors with Denver readers, according to the lists presented, are Victor Hugo, George Eliot, Scott, Dickens, Thackeray and Hawthorne. In some three or four names nearly all the lists agreed. Outside of this they varied greatly. George McDonald, Tolstoi, Wilkie Collins, Charles Reade, Dr. Holland, Rider, Haggard and Alexander Dumas have evidently many readers here. As a matter of course a club working sincerely upon these lines must be a prosperous club. It counts a hundred members, and the best forces of Denver are represented there.

Chicago.—Mr. Jones led the Union Teachers' meeting Monday, and commented upon the 10th chapter of Luke. The chapter divides itself into three parts. First, the sending out of the seventy missionaries, which gives a glimpse of what seemed to be a flash of success in that Galilee country. It suggests also Jesus's relation to the Gentile world. Was not Paul the first world-inclusive missionary? The second division contains the parable of the Good Samaritan, which story, with the parable of the Prodigal Son, the leader said, would keep alive the name of Jesus in the world if all else were lost. The element of danger in the neighborhood of the wounded man, was emphasized; to stop and help was to run the risk of a similar attack from the banditti, so the Samaritan exemplified courage as well as charity. The question was raised whether such an incident could occur to-day in this country. Is there ever a "Priest or Levite" who would pass by to-day? The third passage is the Mary and Martha incident. The leader did not like the modern fashion of wrenching the true lesson from the paragraph by glorifying Martha. He thought it very probable Mary could make the better bread. At least she was the best home-keeper, even if Martha was the best house-keeper. The distractions of many cares should not overshadow our interests in great truths and high living.

—Brother Batchelor, after spending his holidays at home, in Massachusetts, is among us again, and will continue his tour of inspection among the churches of the west. He expects it will take till vacation time to get around. He was cordially greeted by the worshippers at All Souls last Sunday morning, and he occupied a seat on the platform with the pastor. His genial face lights up headquarters with the radiance of good-fellowship. Let him go on until he knows western Unitarianism as it is, and be able to report it with the ability and fairness that is his.

Philadelphia.—The two addresses given by Coit before the Ethical society, in December, are to be published. One of them treats of the ethics of Shakespeare, and the other makes some statement as to what the ethical movement contains. —The Camden Post gave almost a full report of a recent sermon from Haskell, upon the Shakespearean text—"There's a divinity doth shape our ends," etc.

—On the second Sunday of Mangasarian's absence west, Mr. Ames occupied his place at both services, while Doctor Furness and Clifford, the first in the morning, the second in the evening, substituted on the Spring Garden platform.

—The Henry George party is about to start a weekly paper in this city. Among its editors is W. H. Johnston, until a couple of years ago an Episcopal minister at Muncie. Mr. Johnston has spoken for Mr. Haskell both at Vineland and Camden.

—The Contemporary Club gave a reception to Irving on the 20th ult., on which occasion the actor read an address treating of his English predecessors upon the stage.

—The union meeting in January is to be held at the First church.

—The Camden fair netted between four and five hundred dollars.

—I heard Krauskopf's New Year's sermon, treating of "Past and Present," and can now well understand, as I did not fully before, the attraction he may have for the large numbers of those who seem so eager to hear him. He is a strong speaker, alive to the newer thought, and healthfully disregarding of Jewish traditions.

Quincy, Ill.—"This church is starting out on the new year in excellent spirits, out of debt, good-natured and wide-awake." Parson Bradley and his wife are being acclimated by the goodness of his people.

Moline, Ill.—There was a delightful Christmas tree for the poor children, erected at this place, largely directed and inspired by H. G. Stevens, pastor of the Unitarian church. Other ministers joined in. Forty dollars in money and gifts to 200 children were gathered from the branches of the tree.

Duluth, Minn.—We clip the following from the letter of a Duluth correspondent as an interesting and inspiring bit of news: "You may not enjoy cutting your way to church as I did yesterday, with axe and snow shovel, through a mile and a quarter of ice and sleet up to your knees, with occasional drifts to your eyes."

Cincinnati.—The Unity Club's series of Sunday afternoon lectures, ninth season.—Its programme is before us. It contains ten lectures, by the best known lecturers in the country, Mrs. Mary A. Livermore opening the course. Ten tickets are sold for a dollar; single admission, 15 cents. We know of no other club in the country that has begun to utilize the Sunday afternoon in so high and beneficent a manner as this one in Cincinnati, and its example ought to be followed in many places.

Care for the Children

Children feel the debility of the changing seasons, even more than adults, and they become cross, peevish, and uncontrollable. The blood should be cleansed and the system invigorated by the use of Hood's Sarsaparilla.

"Last Spring my two children were vaccinated. Soon after, they broke all out with running sores, so dreadful I thought I should lose them. Hood's Sarsaparilla cured them completely; and they have been healthy ever since. I do feel that Hood's Sarsaparilla saved my children to me." MRS. C. L. THOMPSON, West Warren, Mass.

Purify the Blood

Hood's Sarsaparilla is characterized by three peculiarities: 1st, the combination of remedial agents; 2d, the proportion; 3d, the process of securing the active medicinal qualities. The result is a medicine of unusual strength, effecting cures hitherto unknown. Send for book containing additional evidence.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla tones up my system, purifies my blood, sharpens my appetite, and seems to make me over." J. P. THOMPSON, Register of Deeds, Lowell, Mass.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla beats all others, and is worth its weight in gold." I. BARRINGTON, 130 Bank Street, New York City.

Catarrh, Catarrhal Deafness and Hay Fever.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby catarrh, catarrhal deafness and hay fever are permanently cured in from one to three simple applications made by the patient at home. A pamphlet explaining this new treatment is sent free on receipt of stamp, by A. H. Dixon & Son, 808 West King street, Toronto, Canada.

Crockett, "Lillian Stanford," Eugene Secor, Mrs. L. E. Thorpe, Geo. E. Hilton, Velma Cadwell Melville, Mrs. Cy Morton, "Louisa Hammond." The HOUSEKEEPER, published at Minneapolis, Minn., is in its 10th year; is a large, 16-page semi-monthly paper, with departments devoted to HOUSEHOLD MATTERS, FASHIONS, DYE-SMOKING, NEEDLE AND FANCY WORK, MOTHERS' CORNER, CORRESPONDENCE, HOME READING, STORIES, SKETCHES AND POETRY, Flowers, etc., and is designed to be practical in all that it teaches. The regular subscription price is $1.00 per year; but to new subscribers it will be sent 3 months for 10 cents, which barely covers postage expenses.

THE HOUSEKEEPER has met with great favor. Owing to the increasing interest manifested by the ladies throughout the land, the publishers have decided to make larger and grander offers than have ever before been made. With ample capital at command and looking to the future to yield them profits—in order to introduce THE HOUSEKEEPER into thousands of homes—where it will be gladly welcomed, we will furnish our paper

THREE MONTHS FOR ONLY TEN CENTS.

That THE HOUSEKEEPER is appreciated is shown by the rapidly increasing subscription list. There were received the enormous number of 992 subscriptions in a single day recently.

We are determined to obtain the largest circulation of any paper in America, and in order to accomplish this THE HOUSEKEEPER will give away its entire profits the coming year to New Subscribers. We have prepared a large and comprehensive premium list which comprises nearly everything in use in a well-ordered household, and for single and small lists of subscribers' premiums of Silverware, Jewelry, Watches, Optical Instruments, Knives, Forks, Household Conveniences, China Sets and Beautiful Ornaments, Dry Goods, Albums, Books and Musical Instruments are given away and can be obtained by just a little effort among your friends. Cash presents are also given to those sending the largest lists of subscribers. The high standard of merit THE HOUSEKEEPER has attained insures a hearty welcome wherever introduced. In order that every one may have an opportunity to see this popular paper we have decided to furnish it for the next 3 months for only 10 cents. All 3 months' subscribers can compete for the premiums, and with each subscription will be sent full particulars and the complete premium list free of charge. Mention this paper when you write, as the first answer will receive a year's subscription for only 10 cents, together with a Beautiful Present Free.

Love and Theology.

A Novel. By CELIA PARKER WOOLLEY. 1 vol., 12mo. $1.50.

A novel and brilliant story by a talented writer new in the field of fiction, but whose name has long been familiar to readers of UNITY. "It is not only entertaining as a story, but engrosses interest from the highest ethical standpoint. . . . It is most decidedly a book to own, and not merely to read for amusement only, and then throw aside."

An eminent critic writes: "It is not only entertaining, but interesting from the highest point of view. It goes on from chapter to chapter with ever-increasing force and power. No book of fiction that Ticknor & Co. have published has had, to my thinking, the depth and value of this; and nowhere has the present study and questioning of theological subjects been more clearly and satisfactorily presented."

THE EVOLUTION OF IMMORTALITY.

By C. T. Stockwell.

"It may be stated, with little fear of contradiction, that the two great questions ever uppermost are God and immortality." These are the opening lines of an essay by C. T. Stockwell on "The Evolution of Immortality," published by C. H. Kerr & Co., Chicago, which seems likely to attract not a little attention among thinking people. If one were to repeat the remark to one of those who are known as "practical men" in our day, he would probably reply that such questions no doubt affect the remote future—what is called "the hereafter"—but that the great question for this world is, "how to get a living." No doubt there is in this rather dreary view a substratum of truth; and yet the man who takes it would probably live very differently, if he thought he had fifty years to live, from what he would if he thought he had but fifty minutes. But whether this be true or not, Mr. Stockwell's essay is one which will commend itself to the thoughtful reader as full of pregnant suggestion.

The author admits that one is impressed with the feeling that everything that can possibly be said on the subject of personal, conscious immortality has already been said, but thinks that this impression is too sweeping, and that, though demonstration is impossible, much may be said by way of suggestion from a study of our antecedent life as far as we can know it.

The author accepts the doctrine of evolution, of course, as the settled belief of the age, and argues that the development of the future must be along the prolongation of the lines up which we have followed in the past, and with methods and processes governed by the same laws and necessities. Following back along the line of past progress, Mr. Stockwell finds that the life principle which is the I, myself, was born into this larger world from the embryological world, at which birth the body which it had developed for itself in that world died,—that, earlier, it was born into that world from a lower form, leaving behind it, as later on, an outgrown and, consequently, dead body, and behind that, again, still simpler forms of cell-life, and, further, that go as far back as we may, we find ourselves confronted at the limit with a yet earlier form or manifestation of life. Further, that as we go back, passing at intervals "successive births and deaths," each form of body we come to is of a lower order than the one which follows it, and, finally, that this orderly progress from lower to higher forms of life is made by the same life-principle or personality—continually expanding, indeed, but still the same. No atom of matter which goes to make up the body of the child is found in the body of the matured man—the child-body has "died," been transformed into other forms of matter, but nothing even of it is lost, and still less is the original, personal identity lost.

Now, argues the author, there is no reason to believe that natural laws—or God's laws—are mutable, operating uniformly up to a certain point, and then abruptly ceasing. On the contrary, there is every reason to believe that they are uniform in their operation, and that their continuity of operation will be co-equal with the continuity of that upon which they operate. So thinking, the author reaches the conclusion that "our present physical body stands in similar relation to the spiritual body to be, as does the placenta to the embryo, the graafian vesicle to the ovum, or the membranes of this cell to its nucleated content. . . . And so, when this physical body shall die, the spiritual body, its nucleated content, will go forth, freed from the limitations of its physical being, into a new sphere of greater possibilities and larger scope, carrying with it the same life principle which it has inherited from the great past, reinforced and ennobled by its legacy of human experience and acquired consciousness—the priceless result of this stage of our existence.” In other words, the life-principle of this individual man, beginning back of the simplest cell-life form of which we have any knowledge, evolves for itself successive bodily environments, suitable to the successive stages of its own expansion, to be laid aside when their functions are completed, which laying aside is what we call death—looking at it from one side—but is, looking at it from both sides, only a passage from a lower to a higher form—a death on one side and a birth on the other.

It should be explained that by “spiritual body” the author does not mean the common notion of spirit as opposed to matter. He believes in the “oneness,” as he chooses to term it, of God and matter, and that it is “impossible to conceive how mind can have any existence independent of matter, so called, in some form; how consciousness can be without organs of sense; how organs of sense are possible separated from an organism; how an organism can have any being, simple or complex, independent of something to organize.” He does not put it in terms; but he seems to entertain a thought, more than once expressed in these columns in treating of similar themes, that just as there are gases, cognizable by some of our senses, which are not so to sight or touch, but yet are as essentially matter as the coarsest block of granite, so there may be other substances, still as essentially matter, but utterly beyond the reach of any of our senses or of our conception. To us such matter would be as spirit if manifested through force, and so it is not inconceivable—more than the idea of infinity at all—that this shading and grading may go on and up into divinity itself, without the existence of any point where it may be said that matter ends and spirit begins.

The author's thought seems to be that self-consciousness is the acquisition of this state of existence, whose initial point is the coalescence of the two cells from which is evolved the human embryo; but, whether this be true or not, is of small consequence to the general argument. The effect of this is to fortify the belief in individual immortality from the side of the doctrine of evolution. This seems a work well worth the trouble of doing, since it has been so often said that that doctrine is destructive of all belief in immortality. So far is this from truth, that Mr. Stockwell has, in this little book of sixty-nine pages, constructed about the most convincing argument for immortality which has fallen under the observation of the writer of this notice, based wholly on the truth of this doctrine of evolution.

Mr. Stockwell says nothing of the school of philosophic thought which has been called materialism; but a careful reading of his little book will suggest a reflection that to this writer, at least, seems substantially new—which is, that this school has not had, even from its friends, the credit to which it is entitled. It has been so much the habit to separate, or try to separate, mind and matter, spirit and matter, and set them over against each other, that it has bred another habit of thinking of matter as essentially gross. Materialism has done human thought a service in dignifying matter,—in more or less taking away from it the association of grossness; and this author goes a step farther, and reverently identifies it in essence with the divine. Nor can it be fairly said that this is in any sense a degradation of the idea of divinity. On the contrary, rightly looked at, it is a process of leveling upward, not downward.

But this must suffice for the present. Mr. Stockwell's book is small, but it is packed with thought from first to last. There is not an idle or meaningless phrase in it, and whether one agree or not with its conclusions, no one will deny that it is compactly and cogently written, and in a very high degree stimulative of thought in the reader.—Chicago Times.

“The Evolution of Immortality” is a book of 69 pages, large 12mo, gilt top and rough edges, printed on heavy, laid paper, with wide margins, and handsomely bound in silk cloth. May be obtained through booksellers, or will be mailed to any address on receipt of $1.00 by the publishers, Charles H. Kerr & Co., 175 Dearborn Street, Chicago.

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XX.]

CHICAGO, JANUARY 21, 1888.

[NUMBER 21.]

EDITORIAL.

THE Unity Club Bureau has just issued, through the house of Charles H. Kerr & Co., Chicago, "A Lecture Circular," which will help societies and clubs working in this direction.

GEORGE W. COOKE, who has won fame as interpreter of Emerson and George Eliot, is giving three lectures on Robert Browning in the New England Women's Club Rooms, Boston.

Is the religion of love inefficient? Has it no power to constrain the evil-doer? A friend frankly admits that the religion of love and reason is very desirable among cultivated and rightminded people, that he himself finds food in none other; but this religion, he thinks, has but little power over the vicious and no terrors for the sinner, consequently he pays his money for the support of a church that still deals in hell-fire tortures for the benefit of the ignorant and the depraved. Is the position of our friend right? What have we to say in answer to such? We would like to hear,—postal card lengths,—from our UNITY readers on this subject. If the response to this request warrant, we would like to publish a short meter symposium upon the subject.

THE Universalists of the West Side have embarked in what is to them, we understand, a new line of religious work—revival meetings. Their pastor stated at the first week-day meeting, of Monday, January 9, when Prof. David Swing lent his presence, that they should hold these services in their own way, and that they hoped by their earnestness to do great good in the community, interesting those who had no church home. Mr. Stanford Mitchell, a Universalist brother from the East, a most expressive singer, with a rich sympathetic voice, leads the music, himself giving now and then a solo. While this Universalist mode of religious life may not be our mode, it has undoubtedly been entered upon with great earnestness of purpose, and we hope Universalism may reap from it the very best results. The number of attendants the services are drawing certainly offers encouragement.

THE Christian Union prints the following: Have we improved upon the Puritan Fathers? What did they have in their Sunday which we might still desire? "A Puritan Sabbath was thus described by Professor George Harris, D. D., of Andover, at a recent meeting of the Lowell Congregational Club: 'Let us spend a Puritan Sunday together. It is Sunday morning in a village of forty or fifty houses closely together. Saturday night had been religiously kept, and every one had got up a little earlier than usual, which was necessary, as every one went to church at nine o'clock. A drum or a fife is heard or a flag is raised as a signal that it is time for church. There were no bells because they could not afford it. The people issued from the houses in groups, variously clad. In times of danger the men attended church with their guns and dogs. The congregation was seated in accordance with their wealth and social standing, those of the most prominence occupying the front seats, the men on one side and the women on the other. The pastor, the teacher, and the ruling elder occupied the pulpit. The deacons occupied a lower platform. The function of the pastor was to expound and explain, that of the teacher to preach the doctrinal sermon. The ruling elder had the office of administration, and the deacons served the communion and saw to it that the pastor's salary was collected. An order of deaconesses looked after the poor of the town, and kept the children in order. A fifteen minutes' prayer was made, all standing and saying amen at the close. Then a hymn was sung, which was lined out by the ruling elder. The pastor then read two or three chapters, and commented on it at some length. The pastor then preached his sermon, the hourglass being set up in full sight, and he was expected to preach until the sand all ran out. If he preached a shorter time he had his salary shortened. Then the notices were given and the benediction pronounced. In the afternoon a similar service was held, with baptisms, if there were any, and a collection was taken up. The congregation came up to the altar, one by one, and it was pretty well known who gave and who didn't. The family were instructed in the catechism after supper. There were no religious services at the funerals, and weddings were solemnized by civic authorities."

THE Sixth Presbyterian church of this city, one of the largest and most prosperous churches on the south side, whose revenue last year aggregated nearly $10,000, has decided to abandon the pew renting system, for the next year. The trustees in their annual report carefully reviewed the subject, and have printed the reasons pro and con, which we are glad to reprint, hoping that it will convert some other society and lead them to abandon, what to our minds, is one of the most debilitating weights upon the modern church. It is a financial method which is convenient, but it is arbitrary, and causes a grievous tax upon those of limited means, and releases the wealthy from a large share of the burden which they ought to carry in the church of their conviction. If the young man pays $25 a year out of an income of $1000, how much ought the man to pay whose income is $50,000?

Here are the reasons for:

1. Other churches have tried this mode of raising the church revenue, and have found that the sum realized materially exceeded the amount raised by renting pews.
2. It is likely to secure the regular attendance of some who feel unable to rent a pew, but who would attend and pay something. It would leave others without excuse, to themselves even, for non-attendance.
3. It would remove a feeling of humiliation from our own church members who feel it a duty and a privilege to attend church, but who feel that they cannot afford to rent a pew, or even a sitting at the present price. It is certainly a duty to prevent this feeling of humiliation if it can be done. We should all be equals in God's house.
4. It is reasonable to believe that many, especially of our young people, who now pay nothing, would willingly pledge to pay, and would regularly pay something. Under the present system, where the head of the family rents a pew, the children, even when able, see no necessity for paying, and hence are losing a valuable part of their proper Christian training.
5. It would give ample opportunity, accompanied with urgent necessity, for those who are able to pay more than the rent of any pew to do so.
6. It would educate all of us into a very much higher idea of our privilege and duty. We are not likely to esteem this privilege as we ought, or to measure our duty correctly when we draw a check to pay a specified bill. Paying for a seat may be well enough in its place, but we all have ample opportunity to do that for a like privilege elsewhere.

And here are the difficulties and dangers:

1. The changing character of our population. We are quite unlike the population in older cities or in smaller towns. The first of May usually shows considerable change in our congregation and church membership. Newcomers might not be as prompt to seek an opportunity to make a pledge to contribute a stated sum as they are to inquire about, and even to rent, a pew. More time might be lost before a committee of the board of trustees would feel at liberty to ask a pledge than would be necessary for the same committee to offer to show a pew.
2. Temporary inconvenience about getting a regular seat, no doubt, would have to be endured. No one will underestimate the desirability of a regular place to sit, nor the importance of families being seated together. Experience, however, proves that this difficulty is more imaginary than real.

3. Unless the pledges obtained should exceed the estimated current expenses, there would be a certain loss to the sinking fund.

4. Some quite irregular in their attendance, who under the present system rent a pew, or a part of a pew, might altogether decline to pledge to pay at regular stated times. It would be unwise not to look for loss from this source.

5. Some now paying high pew rent might pledge a much smaller sum than is now paid for the pew occupied, and it might even prove that some, if left to their own decision, would pay nothing. It should be stated here that we know of no one who would do either of these.

THE following item from the Christian Union is a bright omen of the better day that is to come to our churches. There is more cause for congratulation over one minister who rebels against the low ethical standard of the churches, than in the resignation of ten ministers for doctrinal reasons; because religion finds its permanent foundations not in creed but in character. The dictates of reason are important, but those of conscience are indispensable. When the church will begin to elevate the business standards of trade, and to discourage the speculative and gambling instincts of commerce, by beginning at home and reforming its own methods and suppressing its own tendencies to inflation, then the church is to be heard from. "The Rev. H. B. Townsend, pastor of the First Presbyterian church, Philadelphia, has resigned. Recently, at a church festival, the ladies filled a bottle with beans and offered a prize to the person guessing nearest the number, the object being to raise money for the church. The pastor opposed the scheme on the ground that it was a species of gambling, and his course led to a difference between the pastor and his flock."

JOHN CHADWICK, of Brooklyn, speaking of the noble life of one of his parishioners, Richard Henry Manning, speaks for many a minister and tells the real source of many a sermon, when he says: "For me it was an inexpressibly wonderful and pathetic thing that this man, to whom I always looked up as an intellectual teacher and a moral guide, should come so steadily for three and twenty years and listen to my word, as if I had anything for him of help or inspiration. He had much for me, however little I might have for him. The knowledge that he would be here, many a time, I know, steadied my thought, guarded my hasty phrase, and sent me back upon my argument, to make it, if I could, more deep and firm. But he did for me much more than this. He helped me as no other man has ever helped me—not by his words but by his life—to that 'daring faith' which is the best possession that I have to share with you; which is not only faith that there can be morality of the highest order without dogmatic theological affirmation, but that without such affirmation there can be religiousness of a more lofty character than, for the most part, co-exists with the dogmatic confidence of the majority of Christian men. . . . For religiousness declares itself less by dogmatic assertion or by confident assurance than by the gravitation of the mind to fundamental mysteries of life and death."

The Ramabai Circle.

We commend to our readers the following appeal from the secretary of the Chicago Ramabai Circle, and would remind our readers that these circles any more than this work are not limited to women, neither are they restricted by theological or denominational lines. On the board of the American organization are representatives of the Methodist, Episcopalian, Congregational, Unitarian and doubtless other organizations, as will be seen by referring to the full list which we publish in our Notes from the Field columns.

"The central Ramabai Association has been formed in Boston and local Ramabai Circles may now go to work with the full assurance that the plan of the school for the education of child widows in India is in safe hands. The delay in forming the association came only from the fact that the principal movers in it waited for letters from native gentlemen in India, which should throw more light on the probable success of the proposed school. These letters proved eminently satisfactory, and now a general attempt should be made to raise the necessary funds at once. The board of trustees in Boston are to decide all questions of a financial and business nature, aided by an advisory board of responsible men in India. The Ramabai Circle formed under the auspices of the Woman's Unitarian Association of this city calls on all its members to do their utmost to interest others in this inspiring work. We have now nearly sixty members and we might easily have many times that number. No one who reads the story of the Pundita Ramabai or understands anything of the conditions which make this school desirable, can refuse sympathy to such a cause. The movement is absolutely unsectarian, as will be seen from the list of officers published in another place. This attempt marks a new departure in foreign missions. It claims the help not only of those who have worked long in missionary directions only to realize the insignificance and unsatisfactory character of the work accomplished, but it deserves the careful investigation of those who profess not to believe in foreign missions at all. We hope to receive the names of many new members not only from this city but from other towns where UNITY goes. To be a member means the payment of $1 each year for ten years, in which time it is confidently expected that the school will become self-supporting. If you do not know the story of the Pundita Ramabai and the details of the work she is trying to do, send to the secretary of the circle, who will be glad to answer letters or furnish information. A still better way is to order the book, 'The High Caste Hindu Woman.'

The Field-Ingersoll Letters.

We often hear it said that popular interest in theological questions has largely ceased,—that the average man is indifferent to these to-day. It is happily true that the emphasis in religion, for some time has been steadily shifting from its speculative creeds to its ethical import and requirements; and this tendency has every sign of continuance. But if one needs evidence that popular interest in theological discussion has by no means died out, he may find it in the space given to such discussion in the secular journals and reviews of the day. These periodicals have an eye to business, and do not publish what the public mind has no care for. The denominational "Confessions" in the Forum some months ago were an attractive feature of that attractive review, and have since been gathered into book form. A late number of the Boston Sunday Herald devoted a page and a half to the replies of representative clergymen to its question, "What are the strongest proofs and arguments in the support of the belief in a life hereafter?" The current number of the North American Review contains the fourth, and, apparently, closing letter in a series of four which have passed between Henry M. Field, D. D., editor of the New York Evangelist, and Colonel Ingersoll. It is of these we wish to speak. The first appeared in the form of "An Open Letter to Col. Robert G. Ingersoll," in the August number; the second was Colonel Ingersoll's reply, "The Agnostic Side," in the November number; the third, "A Last Word to Colonel Ingersoll," appeared in December, to which reply is this month made in "Another Letter to Doctor Field."

The first noticeable feature in this correspondence is the large measure of courtesy that pervades it. In their intellectual attitudes the men stand widely apart, but each recognizes things in common, and respects in the other the man within the opponent. Surely the religion of love and good will has made no small advance in the world, when two such different representatives can so amicably discuss subjects on which both alike feel strongly. This, of itself, is of good influence. There is a Christmas sermon between the lines. As to the matter of the letters, it has the merit and defect incident to this form of presenting one's views. The personal element gives piquancy and interest. The thought is live and warm. The same element also tempts at times to those "asides," so to speak, wherein the real principle or truth involved is dropped for a specious retort or a bit of irrelevant sparring. In this respect Colonel Ingersoll yields the more readily, as might be expected of his abounding humor and his well-known forensic art.

The extended discussion covers too many points for us to refer to them all. Touching the existence of God, if Doctor Field does not demonstrate it, he simply fails where wiser men have failed before him; and his opponent fails equally to establish the negative. In this matter what Mr. Emerson once said of his own belief in immortality holds true, we think—that we are all better believers than we can give reasons for. But, in our judgment, Doctor Field says nothing weaker on this point than such words as these, for example, from his opponent: "Why should infinite goodness leave the existence of God in doubt? . . . The sentence 'There is a God' could have been imprinted on every blade of grass, on every leaf, on every star." (!) It is this wholly outward way of dealing with the subject that characterizes Mr. Ingersoll's position, as if the deeper experiences of the individual soul were not also facts in the universe to be accounted for, and a life could have no assurance for itself of that which it may be unable to demonstrate to another. The same outwardness marks also his treatment of prayer. "When and where has the prayer of any man been answered?" he asks. "Did God hear the prayers of the slaves? Did he hear the prayers of imprisoned philosophers and patriots? Did he hear the prayers of martyrs?" Of course, the answer depends upon one's conception of prayer. We are inclined to believe that their souls' longing and cry had answer in some real help and strength, though we know of no prayer-gauge by which this can be proved to one who doubts it. We are reminded here of the fugitive slave who was speaking of his escape with great religious fervor, when one said to him (it might have been our friend, the Colonel), "I guess your feet helped you more than your knees;" to which the man answered, "But you see if it hadn't been for my knees first, I shouldn't have had any courage for my feet!"

The most interesting part in this discussion, and that in which, in our judgment, Colonel Ingersoll most clearly has the advantage of his opponent, is that concerning future retribution. Doctor Field pictures a mother beside the grave of her son, and he says: "What will you say to that mother? By that grave you cannot speak; for if you were to open your lips and tell that mother what you really believe, it would be that her son is blotted out of existence, and that she can never look upon his face again." If Doctor Field had read Colonel Ingersoll's words beside the brother's grave, or his words over that policeman's dead child in Washington, he would have qualified the foregoing sentences. Mr. Ingersoll justly answers: "Upon the question of immortality, you have done me, unintentionally, a great injustice. All I have said on this subject has been to express my hope and confess my lack of knowledge." And he adds: "You have had the goodness to invite me to a grave over which a mother bends and weeps for her only son. I accept your invitation. We will go together. Do not, I pray you, deal in splendid generalities. Be explicit. Remember that the son for whom the mother weeps was not a Christian, not a believer in the inspiration of the Bible, nor in the divinity of Jesus Christ. What must you say? Do not desert the Presbyterian creed. Will you read a portion of the Presbyterian Confession of Faith? Will you read this?" Here follow certain passages, too long to quote, but which the reader familiar with the Confession of Faith will recall. "What could I say? Let me tell you," continues Mr. Ingersoll; and in what follows, the honest agnostic seems to us to have a decided advantage, as a bearer of consolation, over the honest believer in the Westminster Confession.

In his second letter Doctor Field returns to this subject of future retribution; and here he seems to us to take a much stronger position. But it is a position which involves the open abandonment of his professed Confession of Faith. "I believe," he says, "that in the future world every man will be judged according to the deeds done in the body." As to this retribution [endless], "some whom no one will deny to be devout Christians, do not believe it at all" (!) and Arch-deacon Farrar is quoted with open allowance, if not with full sympathy, as holding that, "This life is not 'the be-all and end-all' of human probation; but that in the world to come there will be another opportunity," etc. Doctor Field proceeds to "rest the argument for it [future retribution] not on the Bible, but on principles which you yourself acknowledge. You say, 'There are no punishments, no rewards; there are consequences?' Very well, take the 'consequences,' and see where they lead you." He then proceeds to show that the consequences of our present life must follow us into the future; that no forgiveness obliterates these; that retribution follows even the forgiven man "within the heavenly gates; for if he does not suffer, still that bad life has so shrivelled up his moral nature as to diminish his power of enjoyment." "There are degrees of happiness;" and "he who begins wrong will find that it is not as well to sin and repent of it as not to sin at all. He enters the other world in a state of spiritual infancy, and will have to begin at the bottom, and climb slowly upward." All this sounds very rational and follows along the lines of what here we see and know. But it lies as far from the interpretation of future retribution set forth in the Doctor's accepted standard of doctrine, as reason from unreason, or as light from darkness. Mr. Ingersoll of course sees this, and aptly replies: "My dear Mr. Field, you have outgrown your creed."

Touching the interpretation of pain and suffering in the world, the discipline of life, there seems to us more of spiritual grasp and insight in the remarks of Doctor Field than in the rather light and off-hand utterances of Colonel Ingersoll. The problem perplexes us to-day as it has perplexed souls before us, as doubtless also it will continue to perplex those who shall come after us. But human observation and experience are not without some rays of light upon the mystery; and, taking the world we are placed in, all in all, though Colonel Ingersoll is reported to have said that in his own judgment he could have made a better one, we are rather glad it is given him only to modify it a little, and that it is not wholly committed into his hands for that larger experiment in which he appears to have such confidence.

We spoke at the beginning of the large measure of courtesy observed in this discussion. That courtesy would have been yet kinder by the omission of a few expressions into which Colonel Ingersoll has allowed his wit or sarcasm to lead him, and which do not add either to the dignity or the clearness of his vigorous style. One remark, not personal to his opponent, however, we cannot refrain from censuring. It is where he allows himself to speak of Agassiz's well-known hesitation to adopt Darwin's theory as prompted by his "preferring the good opinion of Harvard for a few days to the lasting applause of the intellectual world." To those who have known and listened to that noble, child-like soul (as we think Colonel Ingersoll cannot ever have done), the insinuation seems wantonly illiberal and unjust, and the story of the life is its ample refutation.

There are other points in this discussion which we should like to notice, but we pass them by. In conclusion, we are glad to count ourself of that larger church, wherein Colonel Ingersoll, and all of us, may be yet more and more consistent members,—in which consistent membership involves more of charity and insight than we have any of us yet attained to,—the church of which he says at the close of his last letter: "I belong to the great church that holds the world within its starlit aisles; that claims the great and good of every race and clime; that finds with joy the grain of gold in every creed, and floods with light and love the germs of good in every soul."

Do that which is assigned you, and you can not hope too much, or dare too much. There is at this moment for you an utterance brave and grand as that of the colossal chisel of Phidias, or trowel of the Egyptians, or the pen of Moses, or Dante, but different from all these.—Emerson.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

To a Maid of Eighteen.

Gather it up and fold it away
 With rosemary leaves and lavender spray,—
 Sweet Seventeen;
 Wrap it in memories of tenderest hue,
 Warm with the life that once thrilled them, and strew Fair hopes between.

Wondrous the alchemy of the Past!
 Fixed beyond changing it prisoneth fast
 Each winged day;—
 Moments of ecstasy, fleeting as fair,
 Rainbow-hued fantasies, painted on air,
 Loved now for aye.

Every sunset that fades into gray
 Paves but a pathway to meet a new day,
 Brimming with light.
 Look to the east, where the sky is aglow,— Challenge to joy and endeavor! Below
 Sleeps yesternight.

LILY A. LONG.

The Church and Social Problems.

The author of "The Decay of the Christian Church"* is an earnest believer in the church of the future, and as earnest a doubter of the church of the present. It is impossible to resist the conclusion that his views of the church as it now is, are colored by his own recent experiences. Perhaps the church, "rebuked by the scholarship of the world, taunted by the victories of science," ought to "sit in sackcloth and ashes, bemoaning . . . the loss of a power which she may never regain;" but the writer's assertion that she does so is a violent figure of speech, which nothing in recent Methodist or Episcopal conferences has borne out.

Nor is it true, in any general sense, that "humanity is given over to injustice and fraud, offering pawn upon life itself, and grinding down the poor for self-aggrandizement." These exaggerations are repulsive, and detract from the force of an earnest protest against the subserviency of the church to the present order of things, and its failure to insist on even newer and better modes of life.

Mr. Grumbine attributes the alleged decay in the church to "the difference of opinion about essentials—the worldliness of church members, and the timidity of ministers—and the secularity of the age, and the growing power of science." The first he considers due to evolution, and is confident that the final outcome will be, "that error must yield to truth, and wrong to righteousness," albeit he says of the efforts now put forth to broaden the creeds and make them practical, "this attempt at compromise is not destroying doubts, but creating them, and a more dissatisfied religious people never appeared upon the globe, than those who, claiming to be Christians, are in doubt as to whether they are honest even with themselves."

In speaking of the second cause, he instances attempts to attract people to church, and secure money for its expenses by making it a social center, with perilous amusements,—gambling at fairs and socials, taking money from men who "procure it at the card table," or by a "business policy which, but for the ethics of trade, would be considered . . . open robbery and fraud," and much of the same kind, which is well deserved in some instances, but yet is hardly a fair presentation of the case.

With regard to ministerial timidity, he is nearer the mark; and yet may not caution, lest they sanction error, more frequently than fear of their richer parishioners, be the reason that so few ministers preach "Land Reform" or the "Anti-

* "The Decay of the Christian Church: the Causes and Remedy." By J. C. F. Grumbine. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co. Paper, pp. 32, 15 cents.

Poverty Society's" doctrines? At any rate, it is true that the most popular preachers in the land are men like Thomas, Swing and Phillips Brooks, who preach the most earnestly and courageously.

The author gives some instances of oppression and distress, especially among sewing girls, that are only too true; the moral he enforces is that the church ought to take strong ground on social questions; that her ministers miss their opportunity when they are not leading their people abreast or in advance of the best efforts of the day in social reform. Meanwhile let us be fair to orthodoxy,—let us be more than fair, let us be generous and appreciative. It is true that the best hope for humanity, the solution of all our social problems, is in the coming of the day of universal brotherhood; but what is Christianity, if not the proclamation of that highest truth? And if ministers feel this, and believe that the religion in which they have been reared is the highest and truest Christianity, can we blame them because they think to win mankind to right by the process of bringing men to Christ? There is a great heart of right in the most orthodox creed. Parallel with the truth that creeds decay and systems fail, is the truth that religion survives, and ever finds new creeds to clothe herself withal.

The world moves, and with it the church; and the day is coming,—the very advance in secularity which our author deplors, is bringing it on,—when churches shall recognize that the affairs of this world are the chief concern of religion, that man is to be saved here and now, that heaven is to begin on earth.

Godspeed the new movement for a free, unsectarian platform, of which Mr. Grumbine tells us. Every man who leaves a church as he left his—because he could not remain and preach whatsoever he believed to be true and necessary—will help it. But the greatest gain after all will be made in the old churches, liberalized and secularized, by the public opinion which such movements create.

I. TRUTH.

HYMN.

Introductory Reading.

Thou must be true thyself,
 If thou the truth wouldst teach.

He that feeds men serveth few;
 He serves all who dares be true.

Think truly, and thy thought
 Shall the world's famine feed;
 Speak truly, and thy word
 Shall be a fruitful seed;
 Live truly, and thy life shall be
 A great and noble creed.

Responses.

Who shall ascend the hill of the Lord and stand in his holy place?

He that hath clean hands and a pure heart, who hath not inclined his soul to falsehood nor sworn deceitfully.

Let not thy tongue say what thy heart denies.

Let not truth forsake thee. Buy the truth and sell it not.

Great is truth and mighty above all things.

All the earth calleth upon the truth, and the heaven blesseth it: with it is no unrighteous thing.

She is the brightness of the everlasting light, the breath of the power of God, the image of his goodness.
She is more beautiful than the sun and above all the stars.

She is the strength and kingdom and majesty of all ages.
Truth endureth and is always strong: she liveth and conquereth forevermore.

With her there is no acceptance of persons or rewards.
Neither in her judgment is any unrighteousness.

She is glorious and never fadeth away.
She is seen of those who love her, and found of those who seek her.

And in all ages entering into holy souls she maketh them friends of God and prophets.
Wherefore speak every man truth with his neighbor.

For this cause are we born and sent into the world,
That we may bear witness to the truth.

Whatsoever things are true, honest, just, pure, lovely, of good repute, whatever virtue there is and whatever praise—let us think on these things.

Let us think on these things, and we shall know of the truth, and the truth shall make us free!

PRAYER.—(All Uniting.)

Father of light, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning, we thank thee for the truth and beauty thou dost spread before our minds. We thank thee that thou hast put some ray of thine own life in our souls, whereby we are taught of that which is true and divine. Let thy life appear in our lives! Let thy truth be spoken in our words! Let thy tenderness and holiness shine from our faces, and be manifested in all our ways! We would depart from evil and do good. We would love our brother men and deal with them in truth and gentleness and humility of spirit. When we see the right, we know thy strength will help us as we try to live in it. But if we are wrong, we know thy strength will hinder us, to teach the better way. And for the certain help and for the blessed hindering we thank thee. Amen.

(Here may be read an appropriate poem or Scripture passage, old or new.)

HYMN.

SERMON.

BENEDICTION.—(All Uniting.)

Now may the grace of a gentle, helpful, truthful spirit, even the grace of God abide with us! And may the love of God, and the communion of all high and holy thought, and endeavor be our inheritance forever! Amen.

II. RIGHTEOUSNESS.

HYMN.

Introductory Reading.

What shall I do to gain eternal life?
Discharge aright
The simple dues with which each day is rife;
Yea, with thy might.

Ere perfect scheme of action thou devise
Will life be fled;
While he who ever acts as conscience cries
Shall live, though dead.

Responses.

Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness:
For they shall be filled.

The righteous Lord loveth righteousness,
The upright shall behold his face.

Create within me a clean heart, O God,
And renew a right spirit within me.

Lead me, O Lord, in thy righteousness:
Let thy way be plain before my face.

For the kingdom of God is righteousness, and peace and joy in the holy spirit;
Righteousness is an everlasting foundation.

Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright;
The end of that man is peace.

For light is sown for the righteous,
And gladness for the upright in heart.

The path of the just is as the dawning light,
That shineth more and more unto the perfect day.

The stars in their courses uphold the righteous;
The stones of the field are in league with him.

Wherefore walk thou in the path of the good,
And keep the way of the righteous:

Then shalt thou lift up thy face without spot;
Yea, thou shalt be steadfast and without fear.

Thy life shall be clearer than the noonday;
Thou shalt shine as the morning light.

The work of righteousness is peace,
And the effect of righteousness, quietness and assurance forever.

PRAYER. (All Uniting.)

Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them that trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen.

(Here may be read an appropriate poem or Scripture passage, old or new.)

HYMN.

SERMON.

BENEDICTION. (All Uniting.)

Heavenly Father, lead us on
In the way of truth begun:
Let the light of love divine
All along our pathway shine.
Heavenly Father, lead us on
By the way of duty done:
Day by day and hour by hour,
Onward, upward, evermore.

AMEN.

THE UNITY CLUB.

FREQUENT requests come to this office for Shakespearean studies in Unity Clubs. As yet no leaflet has been published by the bureau, but a great many of our clubs have done from time to time excellent work in this direction. The following programme, arranged for the Shakespeare Club, at Natick, Mass., we print in full, names and all, to show how definitely and confidently the successful club takes hold of its work. The appearance of the names in the neatly printed programme is what carries the assurance of success and makes easy the management of each evening, and where there is faith and zeal on the part of a few, very rare are the small towns, either in the east or the west, but what will not afford material for some such a club as this at Natick.

THE STUDY TABLE.

Life Notes, or Fifty Years' Outlook. By William Hague, D.D. Boston: Lee & Shepard. Cloth, pp. 362.

This volume consists of personal reminiscences, extending over a period of fifty years. Like all books of reminiscence, it depends upon the personality of its author for its chief value. Those who wish to know how the principal events of fifty years looked through the eyes of Dr. Hague, will read this volume with interest. Its author was a scholar rather than a philosopher, and the book is remarkable for its variety and fullness of contents rather than for any profound estimate of the men and events of which it treats. Covering, as it does, a period of our national life, rich in material for history, it can not fail to borrow a certain value from the importance of its subject; and even when we do not agree with the author's estimate of persons or events, we read his impressions of them with interest.

Dr. Hague came early into somewhat intimate relations with Emerson, and speaks of him as "a unique, transparent personality; a free, self-reliant mind, uttering itself without restraint and without guile; not fluent, as that of a trained talker, watching the impression he is making, but with speech aptly winning, spontaneous as that of a little child impelled to find expression for the thought or feeling of the moment." He seems not to have understood Emerson's attitude toward the church, and to have improved every opportunity of private conversation to find out just how much of a heretic Mr. Emerson was, and what was the direction of the unbeaten path which he had marked out for himself. Dr. Hague thought Mr. Emerson's demand for "a religion by revelation to us" was an "appeal to the century against the primary claim of Christianity." The author's estimate of Emerson is well suggested in the following: "Can any higher style of character or any better moral issues be fairly looked for from any religion whatsoever, old or new, that can ignore a personal God, ignore the reality of sin as a positive force, and affirm as one of its dogmata that 'evil is only good in the making?' No, never!"

Legends from Story-Land. By James Vila Blake. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co. Boston: George H. Ellis. $1.00.

Both tender and strong are these shadowy little stories, gathered from the stores of that old-time fancy and mythology, which have come to us as an inheritance from the child races. They are told again in this volume with a quaint simplicity of diction which fits well with the subject. Happy the child who is thus led to the marvel stories of literature and taught to catch glimpses of the earlier thought in them, and to recognize not only their poetic beauty, but the insight into truth which is confined to no one age or race. Perhaps not many children will read these stories through with the intensity of interest a less valuable story book might awaken; but they are certainly most available for reading aloud, and thus the explanations may be no less interesting than the stories. Mothers ought to feel grateful for such an addition to their books. E. E. M.

THE HOME.

Which Loved Best?

"I love you, mother," said little John;
Then forgetting his work his cap went on,
And he was off to the garden swing,
And left her the water and wood to bring.

"I love you, mother," said rosy Nell;
"I love you better than tongue can tell."
Then she teased and pouted full half the day,
Till her mother rejoiced when she went to play.

"I love you, mother," said little Fan;
"To-day I'll help you all I can.
How glad I am school doesn't keep!"
So she rocked the baby till it fell asleep.

"I love you, mother," again they said—
'Three little children going to bed.
How do you think that mother guessed
Which of them really loved her best?
Joy Allison, in Kindergarten.

The Talk of the Horse Chestnuts.

"Good morning, sister; good morning!" said a fine chestnut tree to her neighbor one rather dull September morning. "Do you think the sun is going to shine much to-day?"

"I am sure I hope it is," answered the sister; "for my leaves have been drooping and feeling low-spirited, and say they cannot do their work well for want of more sunshine, and I know that my food has not been well prepared. I fancied the sap they sent down the stem rather tasted of oxygen, and that I object to, don't you? I wonder those queer creatures, those boys and girls who so often play under our branches, like oxygen so well; I have heard it said they cannot live without it. I am sure they are quite welcome to all our leaves set free for them. As I said before, sister, those boys and girls are queer creatures. I wonder, now, as they pass under our branches, if they ever think we are working as hard as they, though we don't make quite so much noise about it. Ah! if we were not now working very hard there would be no leaves on the trees next year, and then they would be surprised. 'Spring here, and no leaves! What is the matter?' Do they know that our nice little leaf-buds are already formed, and we are now busy trying to wrap up our wee, wee, baby buds, oh! so cosily, our precious treasures, for next year? Don't you think, dear sister, we had better cover them as usual, with the silky, downy quilt first; and then the winter leaves, overlapping all, just like the tiles on the roof of that cottage opposite, will make a nice little cradle, especially if we put a kind of sticky glue all round the cradle to keep out the rain and the snow. Yes! they will then be safe and warm; they will rock all through the winter until the sun shines warm again next April, and then—yes, and then—" "But I am talking instead of working; I must be quick to do my work, and I am growing so sleepy. I almost wish we lived with our cousins, the chestnuts, in Spain; we should not then need to wrap up our buds so much, they have so little cold to fear."

Now all you boys and girls who walk under the chestnut trees without noticing what they have to say, go listen to their chatter. Look for the chestnut tree—if you live in the country, in the lanes; if in the town, in some of the parks.

The horse chestnut may easily be known, even in the depth of winter, by its usually large buds, set on the extremities of the branches, and in the axils of the branches.

A German naturalist in the winter season gathered one of these buds, not much larger than a pea. The outer covering was composed of seventeen scales, winter leaves, cemented together by a gummy substance, protecting from moisture the silky down. Removing both scales and down, he discovered four leaves surrounding a spike of flowers, in which spike he could distinctly see sixty-eight little florets.

When next you take a walk, will you notice the horse chestnut? Take a little branch in your hand, and look below the little buds; you will see what looks like the footprints of a horse. These marks are left by the falling leaves, and the five or seven little dots, looking so much like nails, are caused by the broken mid-ribs of the leaflets. It is from this appearance that the tree receives its name of "horse chestnut."

WHEN General Andrew Jackson was President of the United States, a poor woman at Washington, who had a large board bill against a department clerk which she could not collect, sought in her despair an interview with the President and told him her trouble. The President told her to go to the clerk and get his promissory note, then come back. When she returned, the President took the note and wrote across the back Andrew Jackson. In due time the note was placed in a bank for collection and the clerk notified. He paid no attention, but when informed who had endorsed it, quickly got the money and paid the note. Next day he was notified that his services in the department were no longer wanted. . . . We read this little incident with as much pleasure as anything in the life of Andrew Jackson.—G. T. A.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

The Ramabai Association.—The following is the list of officers of the National Association recently organized in Boston for the purpose of advancing the interests of the child widows of India, of which we speak in our editorial columns. We print the names as a guarantee of the importance and reliability of the project.

President, Rev. Edward E. Hale, D.D.; Vice-presidents: Rev. Phillips Brooks, D.D., Rev. George A. Gordon, Miss Frances E. Willard, Mrs. Mary Hemenway, Dean Rachel L. Bodley, M.D. Board of Trustees: Hon. A. H. Rice, Mrs. Quincy A. Shaw, Mrs. Phebe G. Adam, Dr. Vincent Y. Bowditch, Mr. Augustus Hemenway, Mrs. Henry Whitman, Miss Ellen Mason, Prof. Charles C. Shackford, Mr. T. Jefferson Coolidge, Jr., Treasurer. Advisory Board in India: Dr. Ramakrishna G. Bhandarkar, Ran Bahadur M. Ranade, Ran Saheb Deshmukh. Executive Committee: Mrs. J. W. Andrews, Miss Phebe G. Adam, Mrs. A. Hamilton, Mrs. B. F. Calef, Mrs. J. S. Copley Greene, Miss Hannah A. Adam, Mrs. Bernard Whitman. Recording Secretary, Mrs. Elliott Russell. Corresponding Secretary, Miss A. P. Granger, Canandaigua, N. Y.

Chicago.—Mr. Utter discussed the 11th chapter of Luke at the noon meeting. Various readings of the Lord's Prayer were dwelt upon, but he recommended that the children be taught the common version found in the English Prayer Book for liturgical purposes. The value of the doctrine in the temptation clause was discussed. The localization of heaven was suggested as the probable import of the phrase. The personalizing of evil, according to the most approved rendering, showed that the respect for this prayer as a fetich must break down in order to save it as a gem in the literature of the spirit. The standard of morals in the parable of the importunate neighbor was recognized as very low. Jesus' refusal to wash his hands before dinner, it must be remembered, was defiance to a ceremonial law, rather than indifference to the requirements of cleanliness. Tombs were whitewashed not for hygienic nor artistic reasons, but for ceremonial reasons, so that their presence could be readily observed, and so the Jew the more readily could avoid the polluting contact.

—The four Unitarian churches of this city have just held their annual meetings. Each of them starts out on another year's work free from debt and in earnest spirit.

—We are glad to call attention to the work which Mr. Utter is about to undertake in the way of art lectures, notice of which is seen in our announcement columns.

Philadelphia.—Mr. Gilbert has delivered, both at Vineland and in Camden, his statement of one year's experience outside the orthodox ministry. His position in Vineland seems to satisfy both the people there and his own sense of spiritual congruity.

—Unity Journal for January contains, beside the editorial, news and reprint matter, a pretty full extract from the "Tower of Babel," as spoken here by Mr. Jones, in Mangasarian's hall in December, a column from one of Mr. Coit's addresses, and somewhat from the junior Jastrow's sermon on "The Old and The New," delivered both in the Spring Garden and the Germantown churches.

—The series of afternoon lectures by Ames and May, in West Philadelphia, have been opened. They are a repetition of institute papers.

—The American Unitarian Association gets $500 from the Germantown society this year.

—The next meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary is to be held in Camden.

—The Vineland people have a reading circle, which is to study Emerson.

—Rev. Mr. Clifford repeated his New Year's sermon on the Sunday of the 7th, and the Independent then printed it in full.

—Longfellow's sermon on "Ethics, Humanity, Piety," delivered at Germantown, has been printed in pamphlet form. Its special feature is in its elaborate expression of fellowship with those engaged in the ethical movement. He substantially occupies Unity's position in that respect.

—Mr. Ames, at the suggestion of others, is to give a series of domestic sermons in the course of the winter.

—The united reception to Dr. Furness and Rev. Mr. May, on the 12th—the celebration of the many years of one and the few of another—was eminently a matter of interest to liberals here. H. L. T.

Boston.—At the late public reception given by the Channing Club to the ministers of Boston, the club pledged itself to do the needed public work of the churches, and the ministers assured the members that their co-operation in winter courses of sermons and oversight of weak churches would add strength and courage to our church workers.

—On Sunday evening Rev. Brook Herford gave, to a large audience in Rev. M. J. Savage's church, the history of Unitarianism in England,—a sermon in our young people's course. On the same evening, Rev. Edward E. Hale preached at the Globe theater to a good audience, and Rev. E. A. Horton held his first vesper service of song and Scripture lessons.

—During January, in the afternoon lectures of the Sunday-school Society's course, Miss Lucy Wheelock will give her two fine illustrations of primary class work, and Rev. T. R. Slicer will begin his four "Talks" upon "Early Christian History."

—At the next meeting of the Unitarian Club Secretary Reynolds will tell the story of his recent California travels.

—Dr. E. E. Hale and Rev. R. R. Shippen, of Washington, exchanged pulpits last Sunday.

—Rev. Alexander McKenzie gave, on Sunday evening, the last theater sermon of the Harvard series. About eight hundred persons have uniformly attended these meetings, though two evenings have been stormy.

Rev. Chas. F. Dole gave to the Sunday-school Superintendents' and Teachers' Union a useful lecture on Old Testament study. It was old truth in a new and attractive dress.

—Rev. Brooke Herford's late address before the Unitarian Club, on "Business Enterprise in Church Management," was full of excellent suggestions. It encouraged business men to believe their services are very valuable to their minister, and it recommended ministers to absorb, in pulpit habits, and study habits, and in parish methods, the alert, emphatic mode of their successful business friends.

—The new treasurer of the American Unitarian Association, Thomas N. Hart, says that he should enjoy signaling his first year of office by reporting a larger subscription made early in the year—and by entering upon his cash book the gift of $50,000 to the church building loan fund.

—The new plan of opening the house free for "the people," lately adopted at the orthodox church on Berkeley street, is a pronounced success. Strong sermons, aided by good music, hold large weekly audiences; and the movement is financially well sustained by inside and outside help.

—Rev. George W. Cooke read an essay before the Monday club on "Increased Spirituality in the Churches." In all denominations spiritual life and insight and purity must come from warm, sympathetic hearts, and clear, intelligent heads. Mental activity and good educational methods, daily growth by daily observation and experience, wide interest in the world's progress, and some industrious labor for the ignorant and needy at our doors, are the tokens of sound, spiritual growth in any soul. The essay was an enthusiastic indorsement of the Chautauquan Circles for study, and of the Unitarian National Bureau of Unity Clubs.

St. Paul, Minn.—Rev. H. Price Collier began his month's work in St. Cloud, Minn., on Sunday, January 15. Mr. Collier preached in Unity church, St. Paul, in the morning, to those who were brave enough to come out in a temperature of 37° below zero, and left in the afternoon for St. Cloud for the evening services.

Lectures.—The Unity churches of Hinsdale, Ill., and Helena, Wis., are arranging for courses of lectures. Mr. Jones opened the course at Helena, Friday night, January 20, and the course at Hinsdale will be opened with his lecture on Browning, February 2.

Wichita, Kan.—An Unity Club has been organized at this place, with the Rev. Mr. Hoggeland as president, and it is in search of the ten great novels according to the local vote. The local paper shows that they have found out how to have a good time.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Combines, in a manner peculiar to itself, the best blood-purifying and strengthening remedies of the vegetable kingdom. You will find this wonderful remedy effective where other medicines have failed. Try it now. It will purify your blood, regulate the digestion, and give new life and vigor to the entire body.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla did me great good. I was tired out from overwork, and it toned me up." MRS. G. E. SIMMONS, Cohoes, N. Y.

"I suffered three years from blood poison. I took Hood's Sarsaparilla and think I am cured." MRS. M. J. DAVIS, Brockport, N. Y.

Purifies the Blood

Hood's Sarsaparilla is characterized by three peculiarities: 1st, the combination of remedial agents; 2d, the proportion; 3d, the process of securing the active medicinal qualities. The result is a medicine of unusual strength, effecting cures hitherto unknown. Send for book containing additional evidence.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla tones up my system, purifies my blood, sharpens my appetite, and seems to make me over." J. P. THOMPSON, Register of Deeds, Lowell, Mass.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla beats all others, and is worth its weight in gold." I. BARRINGTON, 130 Bank Street, New York City.

Per Year, 25c.

KANSAS CITY, MO., U. S. A.

Six Months, 15c.

The MISSOURI and KANSAS FARMER is the cheapest paper in the whole wide world. It has eight large, clean-printed pages, with six columns of matter on each page. Every number contains a large map, showing the best portions of Missouri, Kansas and Arkansas for settlers to locate in; showing the counties and giving the number of acres of Government Land remaining open to homestead, pre-emption, soldiers' claim and private entry in each county. Every number contains the Government Land Laws, telling all about how to enter Government Lands. Every number contains descriptions of the counties, towns and townships, telling all about the soil, water, minerals, climatic influences, etc., the prairie and timber lands, and their adaptation for farming, fruit growing and stock raising. Every number will be worth more to you than the price for a whole year. Send for it now—do not delay. It will be mailed to any address in the United States, Canada, Mexico or Mexico for the trifling sum of 25 cents per year. If more convenient for you, you can send the amount in 1-cent or 2-cent American postage stamps. Write your name plainly, and give your town, county and state. [Always tell what paper you got this advertisement from, when you write.] Address,

THE PROGRESSIVE PULPIT,

An Independent Religious Publication, containing Sermons by James H. West, Duluth, Minnesota. Sixteen two-column pages: bi-monthly, 30 cents a year.

The object of THE PROGRESSIVE PULPIT is the spread of earnest, reverent liberal religious thought, and the endeavor to "establish ethics and religion upon a scientific basis." The actual needs of humanity in the present day are so widely different, in many ways, from humanity's supposed needs in the past; the changed basis of modern knowledge, from the basis of older systems, is so complete; to those who are able to see there is so much more of beauty and helpfulness in the New and True than in the still-prevalent religious phantasies of the child-world, that the editor deems there will be place and room for it. It will contain altogether independent religious thought,—religious thought founded on nearer true scientific knowledge of the universe and the powers which animate it.

THE PULPIT will be published regularly six times a year, each number to contain one sermon by Mr. West, besides such other articles and comments of a progressive religious nature as the space of the magazine may permit. Subscriptions are solicited (see rates above); and contributions large or small to the publishing fund will be acceptable, for the distribution of free copies. Post Office Mission workers, many of whom have already cordially received, and circulated the first issue, will be supplied free, on application, with a limited number of copies.

Comments on the First Number.

"I like the look and tone of your little serial, and much admire its ability and spirit. I should hold it a very serious mischief if a policy could be forced which should ever seem to disown the share in the work borne by yourself, and such as are working on common lines with you."—Rev. J. H. Allen, Editor Unitarian Review.

"You ought to make it semi instead of bi-monthly, and get $1 per year. It is the best thing I have seen of its kind,—a word of freedom of spirit in religion."—Rev. E. C. Towne, Cambridge, Mass.

"I congratulate you on your intellectual advancement, and wish you abundant success."—B. F. Underwood, late Editor of the Open Court.

"The first number contains a thoughtful sermon on 'The Complete Life,' with some fitting notes and other matter well adapted to advertise the cause Mr. West has at heart. We wish this little paper might have wide circulation. There are never too many attempts to voice a kindly gospel and a peaceful religion."—Unity.

From the North-West.—"Every word in THE PULPIT is good, while 'The Complete Life' I think the best thing I have read for a long time, and we have had much good, and, to us, most comforting reading in the last year."

From New York State.—"A real feast. I do not know when I have read anything which I have enjoyed more thoroughly. I sent it directly, with a note, to—. He is a very bright, earnest thinker, thoroughly alive and ideal in spirit, and I knew he would appreciate and enjoy it. I must have another copy, please."

From a Unitarian Minister.—"I like it much as to type, style and contents. You can hardly fail to make it an arm of power in the wide territory you reach from the Duluth center."

From Chicago.—"The Complete Life' I find so inspiring that, though I do not have much money, I send you—. I wish I were in a way to help more in issuing such healthful discourses."

From Indiana.—"Please enter my name as a subscriber. I like the spirit of all Mr. West's works,—the good time coming, 'the immortal hope.'"

LOVE AND THEOLOGY.

A Novel. By CELIA PARKER WOOLLEY.
1 vol., 12mo. $1.50.

"It is not only entertaining, but interesting from the highest point of view. It goes on from chapter to chapter with ever-increasing force and power. No book of fiction that Ticknor & Co. have published has had, to my thinking, the depth and value of this, and nowhere have the present study and questioning of theological subjects been more clearly and satisfactorily presented; for, in all this presentation, there is not a hint of irreverence or flippancy of any kind. There is, instead, a very beautiful presentation of the very best interpretation of the liberal thoughts of to-day,—an interpretation that contains the highest spirituality. Herein is the book of great value; and that it will be reckoned among the books that will be of service to all intelligent inquirers I have no doubt. It is, I should say most decidedly, a book to own, and not to merely read for amusement only, and then to throw aside; and this for the characterization as well as the presentation of the newer interpretations of the Bible, etc. This characterization is exceedingly well done, showing no effort, but a natural gift of character-painting. The dialogue is something more than mere made-up talk, and the reflective portion contains philosophy of the most cultivated kind; and this, of course, includes the fact that this philosophy is free of narrow and vulgar self-assertion."—Nova Perry. Mailed, on receipt of price, by CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 175 Dearborn st., Chicago.

A NEW BOOK FREE.

THE EVOLUTION OF IMMORTALITY is a book of which we need say little in this advertisement. Last week's UNITY contained a review of the book copied from the Chicago Times. This issue contains an original review of it by J. V. B. The Inter Ocean says: "The line of argument is comparatively new, and so well presented as to be profoundly interesting." The Evening Journal says: "How he evolves his theory . . . is well worth reading and judging for one's self."

The price of this book is one dollar. We regard it as worth the money, and have no intention of making any reduction.

But we are anxious to add a thousand names to the subscription list of UNITY before March 1, the beginning of a new volume, and therefore we wish to offer our friends a sufficient inducement to help us bring this about.

It has been urged on us that a dollar offer is the most attractive to those who order by mail, on account of the convenience of slipping a dollar bill into a letter instead of taking the trouble to procure a bank draft or postal order. We shall be glad to test this theory, and therefore make the following offer:

Send us one dollar, with the name of a new subscriber to UNITY for eight months, and we will send a copy of "The Evolution of Immortality," free by mail. If you can induce a friend to subscribe, the book will cost you nothing. If not, you can get the book at the regular price, and make some one a present of UNITY without further outlay.

This advertisement will meet the eyes of some who are not subscribers. If any such will send one dollar with his own subscription for eight months, we will send the book as before described.

This offer holds good until March 1.

MASON & HAMLIN ORGANS.

The cabinet organ was introduced in its present form by Mason & Hamlin in 1861. Other makers followed in the manufacture of these instruments, but the Mason & Hamlin Organs have always maintained their supremacy as the best in the world.

Mason & Hamlin offer, as demonstration of the unequalled excellence of their organs, the fact that at all of the great World's Exhibitions, since that of Paris, 1867, in competition with best makers of all countries, they have invariably taken the highest honors. Illustrated catalogues free.

Mason & Hamlin's Piano Stringer was introduced by them in 1882, and has been pronounced by experts the "greatest improvement in pianos in half a century."

A circular, containing testimonials from three hundred purchasers, musicians, and tuners, sent, together with descriptive catalogue, to any applicant. Pianos and Organs sold for cash or easy payments; also rented.

AFTER DOGMATIC THEOLOGY, WHAT?

MATERIALISM OR A SPIRITUAL PHILOSOPHY AND NATURAL RELIGION, BY

GILES B. STEBBINS,

Editor and compiler of "Chapters from the Bible of the Ages," and "Poems of the Life Beyond and Within."

"God is the original life and force of all things."—Plato.

"Physiology reduces man to a jelly; Psychology lifts him to immortality."

"Sweet souls around us watch us still;
Press nearer to our side;
Into our thoughts, into our prayers,
With gentle helpings glide."
—Harriet Beecher Stowe.

One hundred and fifty pages: five chapters; Decay of Dogmatic Theology; What next?—Materialism—Negation—Inductive Science, external and dogmatic—A Supreme Indwelling Mind, the central idea of a Spiritual Philosophy—The Inner Life, Facts of Spirit-presence—Intuition—The soul discovering truth.

A FEW NOTICES.

"It aims to state materialism fairly, and to hold it as fragmentary and inconsequent; to give a wide range of ancient and modern proof of the higher aspects of the God-idea in history. The closing chapter, on Intuition, gives some remarkable facts."—Detroit Post and Tribune.

"This compact and handsome book bears marks of careful study and wide research. Its chapter of facts of spirit-presence is especially interesting to those who would look fairly at important questions."—Saginaw Herald.

"We look for the best there is on this subject in his writings."—Unity, Chicago, Ill.

"The author finds the full disproof of materialism in psycho-physiological science and in the facts of spirit-presence. Many inquirers will thank him."—Christian Register, Boston, Mass.

"He presents the loftiest inducements to a religion at once rational and inspiring, scientific and emotional, and shows that no true man need fear the obvious decay of dogmatic theology. I commend the book to all truth-seekers."—Epes Sargent, Boston, Mass.

A BIG OFFER!

A $3 WASHING MACHINE FREE!

Last year we placed upon the market the greatest labor-saving invention of the 19th century. It was a self-operating Washing Machine. It washes the clothing clean WITHOUT THE WASHBOARD OR ANY RUBBING WHATSOEVER. We advertised a few hundred free to introduce them, and through these free samples sold over 90,000. One lady in Chicago (Mrs. McDermott, 338 W. 15th St.) was so well pleased with her sample that she became an agent and sold over 1200 in four months. W. C. Hamill, Box 357, Toronto, Ont., ordered over 600 after testing his sample. We have scores of just such examples as this. It pays to cast your bread upon the waters. OUR GREAT OFFER. This year we intend to sell not less than ONE MILLION WASHERS, and to do this we will first start off by GIVING AWAY 1000 samples. All we ask of those who receive one is that they will give it a good trial, and if satisfactory recommend it to their friends. Agents are coming money. We have several who are making $10 per day and upwards. "First come, first served." So if you want one from the lot we are going to give away, send your name and address at once. Address, MONARCH LAUNDRY WORKS, 620 Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill. (Mention this paper).

READ THIS!

The New York "Christian at Work" says: "We have personally examined a great many letters received from all sections of the country from those who are using this wonderful Washing Machine, and all unite in commending it in the highest terms." We also have similar reference from the "Farm and Fireside," the "Home and Farm," and scores of other papers.

UNITY

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XX.]

CHICAGO, JANUARY 28, 1888.

[NUMBER 22.]

EDITORIAL.

THE whole of Emerson's works have recently been translated into French by Mme. Jules Favre.

THE Christian Union, judging from recent addresses, declares that Father McGlynn has become not only a Protestant, but a radical Protestant in his teaching.

WE agree with the Inquirer of London, when it says: "If we must have soldiers, let us confess there is little to be proud of about the system, and the terrible amount of evil which is interwoven with it is shameful and humiliating."

THE article on "How to Help the Poor," found elsewhere in our columns, and written by the Rev. Henry D. Stevens, of Moline, Ill., for a local paper, contains so much sense that we are glad to reprint it for the benefit of our readers, as of interest to all.

MR. COIT, for some time past associated with the Ethical Culture work of Professor Adler, of New York, is to go to London next spring to take charge of an Ethical Society that is to meet in the chapel formerly occupied by M. D. Conway's society.

THE unexpected discovery of natural gas, in small quantities, in several of the deep wells in and around Chicago, may not figure much in the financial affairs of our city, but it is provocative of thought; it is another hint of the inexhaustible and irrepressible universe, the resources of which are so varied, so present, so little understood, so poorly utilized.

THE Unitarian for January appears in a neat cover, enlarged in size and advanced in price. The name of Brooke Herford disappears as senior editor, and reappears in an enlarged list of contributors. In workmanship, in its news, and in its inclusive and pacific spirit, it is all commendable, and we congratulate Brother Sunderland on the improvement and bid the Unitarian "good speed" on its mission.

THE answer of Rev. Hugh O. Pentecost, of Newark, N. J., in reply to the request of his old parish as to what conditions would induce him to reconsider his resignation and return to his old charge, is a manly one. It bespeaks the clear vision which is sometimes sadly wanting in those who hold advanced positions in orthodox pulpits. He says, "Yours is an orthodox Congregational church. The minority, in this instance, represents just what your church stands for—orthodox Congregationalism. I could not become your pastor again except such changes were made in your manual as would be practically inconsistent with orthodox Congregationalism."

THE following letter from Frances Willard to a Brooklyn gentleman found its way to the columns of the Christian Union, which suggests that the purchase should be made and the home be converted into a rest resort or headquarters for the Massachusetts Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Why not that, or something like it?

WOMAN'S NATIONAL CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION, PRESIDENT'S OFFICE,

Evanston, Ill., Dec. 22, 1887.

KIND FRIEND:—The early home of John Greenleaf Whittier, America's and woman's laureate, a home celebrated in some of the most cherished verse yet penned, ought, like Mt. Vernon, to belong to America. When I visited it, near Haverhill, Mass., some years ago, it was in the hands of tenants whose habits of living were such as to make my pilgrimage a penance.

To purchase the old place and a few adjoining acres would be an easy matter. Were I rich, I would do this at once, and present the sacred old home hearth to the commonwealth of Massachusetts. But can not many women who are not rich combine to raise the money? If some great American newspaper would stand as leader of the movement, it would soon march to success.

If some eastern ladies will begin, we of the west will do our part.

Sincerely,

FRANCES WILLARD.

WE gather from Justitia, the following interesting facts concerning Chicago literary women identified with the Illinois Woman's Press Association. "Out of one hundred and one members, sixty-two are in active work; thirty-one fill editorial chairs; forty-two are editorial correspondents; twelve have published books during the past year; one is a musical composer, and ten are in the publishing business." This is an excellent record, and as woman becomes more intimately identified with the periodicals of the day, we may look for some of those beneficent results on public opinion which she could not heretofore produce directly.

Are We on the Brink of a Revolution?

WE sometimes wonder if the great fraternity of public school teachers is quite aware of the amount of discontent with the methods and results of public education? We are led to ask this question because so little is done by the school authorities, more especially in our large cities, to modify a system which has long since ceased to satisfy a very large constituency of intelligent tax-payers and citizens. The last twenty years, it is safe to say, has seen a very great abatement of enthusiasm over our free schools. There is, perhaps, no relinquishment of the idea that public education is fundamental to the maintenance of a republic; but that the existing methods are anything like what they ought to be is widely doubted.

Two things have served to suggest this subject; one is the recent election of a new Board of Directors for the St. Louis public schools; the other, the appearance of Prof. C. M. Woodward's treatise on "The Manual Training School." It has been apparent for some time that a crisis in the school system was coming. The dissatisfaction of patrons was unheeded. Principals made no attempt to conciliate those even who might be supposed intelligent enough not to make wholly unreasonable complaints. The system had grown inflexible. To please every class of the people, had not nearly every conceivable branch of useful or ornamental studies been introduced? What more would they have? But the complaints took the form of over-work, of superficial results, and of the utter failure of the standards of classification. Time was needlessly spent in the mere machinery of the school-room. Useless exercises consumed it and deadened the interest of the pupils. Private schools multiplied, and were even patronized by those who could ill afford it. Finally, with a constantly increasing pressure on the finances of the school board, and no prospect of an increased taxation, it fell behind in its accounts, when the demand for retrenchment rose so clamorously that a full expression of public opinion was given.

Very nearly a clean sweep of the old school board was made. The new men were pledged to retrenchment—cutting off, first, all German instruction below the high school. At the citizens' meeting it was with some difficulty that the platform was prevented from being saddled with resolutions to close up the high school and the kindergartens. It is undeniable that a large element in the community would favor this; and especially considering the fact that so numerous a class of scholars in our cities are non-attendants, and yet unprovided for in our primary and grammar grades. Indeed, there are thousands of children of school age in this city for whom there is absolutely no room in the schools.

And Professor Woodward says: "Whatever may be the reason, the fact is, that the education offered, beyond the rudiments and elementary studies, does not seem to be just what is wanted. It is not attractive to pupils or it is out of their reach; or parents and business men are of opinion, secret, perhaps, but firmly held, that a higher education oftener unfits than fits a man for earning his living." His plea is for less recitation and more doing, less theory and more practice. Superintendent Seaver, of Boston, finds drawing shorn of half its use unless embodied in construction, unless worked out in material designs. "Studying physics (says our author) without handling and using apparatus is like eating a meal of cook-books. It doesn't nourish; it sounds well, but there is no real knowledge in it. Add the manual elements, with their freshness and variety, their delightful shop exercises, their healthful, intellectual atmosphere, and the living reality of their work and the boys will stay in school." Abridge the hours given to books; cultivate manual dexterity as a true method of educating the brain, and so get rid of listlessness and monotony and torpor. "There is plenty of time if you will but use it aright. Throw into the fire those modern instruments of mental torture—the spelling and defining book. Banish English grammar, and confine to reasonable limits geography and word analysis. Take mathematics, literature, science and art in just proportions, and you will have time enough for drawing and the study of tools and mechanical methods."

The same conditions have risen in foreign lands. An educator of Sheffield, England, frequently quoted in this book, writes: "There is at present absolutely no sort of connection between the school-room and the workshop; between the present training and future employment of boys; work, workshops, tools, materials, or workshop problems are never mentioned in the school; they have no place there; all reference to these things is excluded as a sort of necessary evil, which it will be time enough for the children to deal with when they are obliged. But the grinding, aimless system of mere book learning and cram is not destined to live much longer in its present form."

One thing must be said at the outset in reference to this proposed reform of methods. Its advocates have a definite object in view, and they are terribly in earnest. Moreover, they already challenge attention to the results reached in the few years that manual training has been on trial. They claim that it is no longer an experiment. Even if it should cost more than the present system, it will give thoroughness, self-control, practical skill, and satisfaction, where now there is so large a per cent of complaint and failure.

But whoever wishes a full and clear presentation of this subject in all its bearings; its history, its wide-spreading interest, its advocates, its course of study, its results, its cost, its tools, its aims, its economical, intellectual and moral advantages, must read for himself, Professor Woodward's fully illustrated book. If any teacher, organizer or writer on this theme can be called an authority, it is he.

It seems clear to us that the province and limits of governmental education are yet to be satisfactorily defined. It may be within the legitimate powers of government to make all instruction, even to the highest work of the university or professional school, free to all. But no system which is not satisfactory to the people, though it aim to give only a rudimentary education, will continue to secure financial support. And it begins to be apparent in our large cities, that unless extensive modifications are permitted, and new hopes of the common-school system are excited, it will be difficult, in some cases impossible, to raise the rate of taxation another mill—and then embarrassment and deterioration will be the inevitable result.

Love and Theology.*

Since we first bade welcome to Mrs. Woolley's book in our columns, a few months ago, the critics have had their time with it, and we trust that most of our readers have had their pleasure in the reading of it. The book is good enough to abide its time for a more deliberate though tardy word in these columns. It is a significant book,—one which, we trust, will set many people thinking on the serious problems of the day. It is a brave work, inasmuch as it dares to deal frankly with the delicate questions which even in these times of boasted toleration are still largely tabooed from the social intercourse of men and women of differing creeds. This book is a reflection of the honest ferment of our times. We like it because it shows penetration, the insight which finds the material for poetry, romance and heroism in the life of to-day; because it shows that the problems of the times are inseparably connected with the culture of the times, and that the so-called "heretical tendencies of our day" spring out of the serious, not out of the flippant side of the life of to-day. The characters in this book are nineteenth century characters, and the perplexities of thought into which they are plunged bespeak growth, not degeneracy. We like this book because it recognizes that thought is an element in love, and that the head has its sacred rights, to ignore which is to desecrate the sanctities of the heart. We like this book because it so intelligently recognizes certain indispensable elements in "happy matches" and felicitous home-making, which are so much ignored in courtship days, so keenly felt in married days. We like this book so well that we wish it were better,—the courage that dared bring the living theological issues into the pages of a story might well have ventured to give us more of the bright discussion, the searching dialogue, the frank soul revelations of which our author gives us tantalizing bits. We find in the pages of this book some traces of the debilitating characteristic of the recent society novel which is afraid of searching seriousness and dodges a continuous strain upon the sympathies, the imagination or the intellect of the reader with external turns of incidents, and whenever the writers find themselves approaching the deep waters of life they retreat under cover of a joke, and parry the awful solemnities of living with repartee. The characters in this book are so well conceived that they might have been trusted to hold the interest of the reader without the help of some of the artificial and improbable turns in the plot. As it is, this is a story of incidents with thought in it, instead of being a story of thought with incidents in it, which it came very near being, and which the world hath more need of and, we believe in the long run, the world will like the better. We would have liked to have overheard the conversation between the inquiring student and his confirmed and confident orthodox pastor. We wish that the cigar smoke in that camp in the woods had not obscured and interfered with the serious conversation of the two young men in their vacation retreat. We also confess to a disappointment in the development of the heroine in the book. Rachel Armstrong had too much heart for so weak a head. Our author has shown us the beautiful development of Lucy Hunt, under the strong guidance of a thinking pastor. "He had taught her how to think, and it was impossible that at the same time she should not have learned how to feel." But the reverse truth is not so successfully illustrated in the case of Rachel Armstrong, inasmuch as he taught her how to feel, it was impossible that at the same time she should not have learned how to think. Indeed, love to-day disintegrates the harsh theologies of the past much more effectually than either logic or science. The power of the author is best revealed in the strength and delicacy of the minor characters and attendant plots.

The "Chapter in Social Science" is to our mind the finest and most artistic, because most searching chapter in the book, and the match between Virginia Fairfax and the Episcopal rector is one that pleases the reader, because it seems so natural and inevitable. But upon second thought it is one that sickens the heart, because it is a match so frequently realized in actual life,—matrimony dulling the ideality of both parties, a home built on a compromise which, though prompted by love, ends in these distressing "successes" that form so large a part of conventional society, conventional philanthropy and conventional religion. The present writer has many a time been a grateful guest at firesides like those of Judge Hunt's, and he has had his perplexities over more than one Tom Fletcher. We wonder if he and Lucy live up to their privileges since they have moved to Chicago?

If we see traces of the modern society novel in this book which we deplore, we are glad to testify that we see much more evidence of the influence of George Eliot, Herbert Spencer, Emerson, and other deep-hearted and great-minded writers of the age in this book. Witness the many pregnant sayings that enrich its chapters. "Poverty is becoming only to a few; I doubt if you could have lived up to it." "Suffering seemed to have promoted the growth of Arthur." "Do you want me to call it a dispensation of Providence, and insult God?" "She had the pride of conscious rectitude, that mars the character of many good women." "Indifference is often a harder thing to cure than the active forms of vice." "It is settle down in this world or settle up in the next." "There is no cure for a lawless will like absolute freedom to pursue its own way." Space forbids further citations. We commend this earnest book to our readers, and thank the author for this praiseworthy contribution to a literature that must grow. May it be rapidly.

Diversities of Gifts.

The stream that babbles on its rapid course
Toward the encircling and receptive sea:
"Lo! glen and mead immovable, my force
O'ercomes all barriers; I alone am free!"
Wears only on its shallow breast the leaf,
Or painted bubble, plaything of the sun,
And bears of summer's largess not one sheaf,
Content to sing with unimpeded run.
But the deep waters their majestic way
To the great sea in silence sweeping down,
Calm in their strength, resistless in their sway,
Bear the great ships that feed the crowded town.
Both reach the haven of their hopes and needs;
One fills the world with song and one with deeds.

The Evolution of Immortality.

This is the subject of a small but very interesting book just issued, whose full title we give below.* When the subject of immortality, or the future life, or "personal continuance," as John Weiss liked to call it, is taken up now by any writer, and especially by a new one, the result is sure to be very noble and enlivening or very worthless and depressing. When the writer is a physician, and when he treats his great subject from the view-point of the facts of his own special studies, and when he brings from these, novel thoughts and arguments based on Nature's continuity and uniformity of method and movement, many uncommon conditions seem united for an inspiring treatment of the great theme. Such is the author and such the nature of the little work before us, little in size, but large in this, that its worth either is beyond expression or is nothing, viewed as an argument; but either way, it has the dignity of challenging careful attention at the outset. The author believes firmly in personal or individual continuance after death, and leaves the reader in no haze or doubt on that point. Let us go at once to his novel argument. This is set forth at once and completely in the second and longest of the nine divisions of the work. This second division or chapter is entitled, "Of Embryological and Cell Life." All that follows, with the exception of a few remarks, in which other writers have preceded the author, is an enlargement, unfolding and illustration of the argument of this division. This argument is as follows, put in brief propositions, which for convenience we will number:

*The Evolution of Immortality; or, Suggestions of an Individual Immortality based upon Our Organic and Life History. By C. T. Stockwell. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co. Cloth, 12mo, gilt top, pp. 69. Price, $1.00.

1. Nature follows one method and movement throughout.

2. If, therefore, it proceed by contemporary and indivisible acts of birth and death as far back as we can trace life, it is conclusive that we may expect to go on from this present stage in the same way.

3. All cells, the maternal cell and the paternal cell included, have an inner and an outer structure, "an external membranous body and an internal nucleated body."

4. All cells, in process of development, dispense with the external body (death) when the internal body is ready to get along without it (birth).

5. In our own lives, traced back so far as we can follow on the maternal side, we find first the graafian follicle, or cell, with an inner nucleus and an outer membrane.

6. The membrane (outer body) is broken and put away, that is, dies, and the nucleus (inner body) sets forth independently, that is, is born, and then is called an ovum.

7. This ovum in turn has "an external and internal distinction or body."

8. The paternal cell has a history quite analogous or similar to the maternal.

9. When these meet, the external body of the ovum grows into the placenta, the internal into the human embryo.

10. When the time is accomplished and all is complete, the placenta (outer body) is dispensed with, that is, dies, and the embryo (inner body) comes forth independent, that is, is born, and emerges into this present conscious stage, on this earth.

11. If, therefore, Nature go on by this same method, this embryo thus born, that is, our present body, must have an inner body which is busy developing; and when it is ready, the present outer body, which, in the previous or placental stage, was the inner body, will be dispensed with, that is, die, in order that the present inner body may come forth independently into its own stage, that is, be born into the next life, or, more properly, the next stage of the one continuous life.

12. Either, therefore, we are to live on continuously beyond death, or Nature at this point suddenly deserts the line and method followed in the other changes and stages as far back as we can go.

That it may appear plainly that we have done the argument no injustice, we will give here the author's own summary of it: "All cells present an external and an internal body; an external membranous body and an internal nucleated body. The graafian follicle has a nucleus which, being evolved, and after it reaches a state independent of its follicular body, we call an ovum. This, in turn, is found to possess an external and internal distinction or body. Being vitalized, or quickened, by the paternal life, its membranous, or external body, develops along certain lines, indicating a temporal existence—placental,—while the germ center or nucleated body develops into a state or form denominated a human embryo. The placental body dying, it, the embryo, is born into this stage of our existence, still being—according to the latest histological researches—a vaster cell, or a vitally connected unity of cells. This being so, is it not reasonable to suppose that our present external bodies possess nucleated bodies that, in turn, shall also evolve into forms suitable for external bodies as we pass on one step more?" (P. 31.)

* * * * *

"Now the laws of organic evolution must cease to apply further, or else this external body of ours has an inner or nucleated body that is being, at this moment, developed, and will ultimately pass out of this external body, that we see and know so well, into an existence as independent of it as we today are independent of our former placental bodies. There would seem to be left us but one of two inevitable conclusions: Either we pass on to a higher stage of organic evolution, independent of the present state, or the uniformity and continuity of Nature's laws no longer have application and relation to us as individuals. Either we continue to live, or God's laws must seem to be mutable." (P. 32.)

We frankly confess that we have not the knowledge needful to take hold of this argument scientifically and critically. It is the argument of a specialist, and must be dealt with by specialists, at least as to the verity of the analogies claimed in it. But this we say, that it is exciting to the mind and stimulating to thought, and that it has a certain nobility about it moreover, and that it rests, if it have any place at all, on that oneness of form and method in Nature which is the most glorious of all thoughts and most entrancing of all sights.

If, after this general view, we enter on any criticisms, we should say that the author's use of the term "law," when he says, "The identity of law with God seems clear," is not careful, for law is simply continuity of form in the exercise of force. Again, when he says, with seeming entire confidence, in the preface, that "other forms of life below man do not possess viable spirit, and, consequently, do not have the quality or property of immortality common to man." We would like to be told how he knows that, and also why his argument is not just as good for the immortality of any mammal as for that of man. Here we are reminded of a remark of Francis E. Abbot, whose mind and spiritual insight we admire warmly, which seems to us far nobler than our author's, and filled with a very fine courage of thought. We were talking with him and said we had found no argument or even hint of the future life which applied not to the lower animals also, and he assented. "But," said we, "we find no stopping place anywhere." "And I want none," said Abbot. "But," we persisted, "we shall have to include the oyster." "Well," said Abbot cheerfully, with a warm, peaceful smile. "I like the oyster." Again, the author is not very satisfactory in the division entitled "Life and Matter," and on this subject throughout there is a lack of unity. For example, in one place he says (the italics ours): "The 'I Am' of any organism is something else than mere matter," but in another place he writes, "The dividing line between the physical and spiritual can no more be definitely drawn than can the exact division between the animal and vegetable kingdoms or the 'organic and inorganic worlds.'" In one place he says, "The union, or oneness, is so complete, that if we say matter is God's organic body, or the form inhabited by Him, through and by which he manifests Himself, we should very nearly state the truth;" but in another place, speaking of the human soul, he says, "Its real father is God; its real mother is Nature." Putting these two places together, it seems plain the language is unfortunate in one or the other. Again, the author is far from uniform in his treatment of the body as a factor in our moral and spiritual experience; in one place he says, "Great souls, however, feel that they can 'get on' without these physical bodies; that they hinder the full expression and activity of their essential selves;" but in another place he quotes with approbation Browning's

"All good things

"Are ours, nor soul helps flesh more, now, than flesh helps soul."

To leave these points of objection and turn to the author's virtues, we may repeat that his argument is novel and wholly dignified and earnest. We like the following remark: "If evolution, as some have claimed, relates simply to the perpetuation and gradual improvement of the race, ignoring the individual; if there is to be no spiritual consummation as the result of the infinite past that relates to the physical development of man, then 'nothing but the Infinite Pity is sufficient for the infinite pathos of human life.'" We say we like this in spite of our creed that life is a good in itself, even if this life were all. The author also asserts nobly the importance of the individual; in which not only we agree with him most earnestly, but we have thought for a long time that in very truth, this is the last outcome of the facts and philosophy of evolution. On another, but related point, the author says strongly: "Whatever may be said of the 'inexorable logic of Love,' in reference to an individual immortality, any human being that has arrived at that stage of his unfoldment denominated self-consciousness—'spirit birth'—and knows something of the depth of meaning that is involved in the term, may, upon the moral basis of the inexorable logic of justice, demand an immortality." This recalls Goethe's saying, "To me the eternal existence of my soul is proved from my idea of activity. If I work incessantly till my death, nature is bound to give me another form of existence when the present can no longer sustain my spirit."

Nothing need be said of the author's style, save that it is earnest, and has the glow of genuine feeling. The long quotation from Edwin Arnold, which ends the book, is noble. In fine, the whole work is dignified, high, thought-compelling.

J. V. B.

Glimpses Into a Post-Office Mission Parish.

The following extracts are like bits of mosaic, quite worthless in themselves, but when added to other Post-Office Mission details may fit in with those bits, and form a picture which has already been seen by all earnest Post-office Mission workers. If you see the outstretched hands and eager faces of our applicants as we do, you will feel their needs, and help us to give more freely still the spiritual truths they ask of us.

Most of our people live in isolated settlements or small towns, where libraries are unknown, and where the only preaching to be heard is of the least enlightened orthodox sort; few of them are able to afford magazines or weekly papers, yet nearly all are intelligent, earnest people, who hunger for the very food we can give.

A young medical student, to whom we first mailed literature at the request of his former teacher, is trying to make a systematic study of Unitarianism, borrowing books from Chicago, and buying what he cannot borrow, to fill out a course suggested by our minister. In an eight paged letter received from him after his recovery from a long and serious illness, he says: "My life has been spared for some good end, and I shall devote the remainder of it to accomplishing that good, whatever it may be. . . . I spent many pleasant hours with those sermons and papers you sent me, when I could read but little." This young man's letters show increasing interest in all he reads, and the fact that when he was too ill to write he had his brother send a note explaining the long silence, shows that he has a sense of loyalty to the Post-Office Mission.

A woman in the state writes, "I have never had anything come to me like the Unitarian belief. I have been anxiously looking for more light upon different points of different creeds, and found it not. Now, I feel the clear light of heaven has truly shone through the darkness, and given me a place where I may rest. . . . Your selection has been all that I could ask. I cannot tell you how much good they [the sermons] have done for me, or how anxiously I look for them." In a later letter she says: "I have been very much interested in the 'Bible for Learners;' it has not only been a great pleasure, but a great comfort to me, for it has explained so many passages that seemed almost incredible, and has given me new and beautiful ideas of the old Bible which I never could have had without reading it, . . . There is so much I would dearly love to say to you, but I am one of the million of toiling women, with my share of care, and not very strong. I will have to wait until my life has a little more leisure in it, which I hope will come, and for all women; at least, enough to give them time to read. . . . I am always anxious for whatever you send. . . . I have enjoyed all so much I can scarcely make a choice, but have been interested in Channing, Brook, Hall, Peabody, Sunderland, Ware, Chadwick, Parker, Savage, and last but not least, J. F. Clarke."

A young man writes, after receiving sermons several weeks: "I would like anything that I can get information from. I have found some of the sermons quite interesting. I have never had any very serious thoughts on religion; have tried to live an upright, moral life."

Early last summer, a teacher in an Iowa town, wrote: "I am a member of the Congregational church—orthodox in the main, but somewhat liberally inclined. My purpose in requesting sermons is to brush away my ignorance in regard to Unitarianism. . . . I have for a long time greatly admired E. E. Hale. . . . I will gladly read Unitarian sermons, especially of a doctrinal character, by the prominent men of the faith." After receiving sermons all summer, in September this correspondent wrote: "Please accept thanks for all sent."

I read all with much interest,—particularly the leaflet on Worship" [by Howland, Blake and Gannett]—and gave a new address, requesting to continue mailing to him till further notice. He is still on our list, and now thoroughly interested in Savage's sermons. One of our devoted parishioners says: "I always read the tracts, put them away—read again, and then pass on to some one, thus passing along the good and grand thoughts." He speaks of himself as a land-poor farmer, and regrets that he can do little for us, yet he sends us postage stamps occasionally, distributes tracts freely, and has sent us a number of valuable correspondents. Speaking of the people about him, he says: "They are not Unitarians; just liberal, most of them, though, composed of the kind of material that Unitarians are made of; all they need is the right kind of education. They need only to be properly informed, to be liberal Christians." As to his preference for our sermon, writers, he says: "The sermons you send are like the Yankee's apples—all best. . . . 'The Religion of Jesus,' by Simmons, is like a barbed wire fence—points from one end to the other. . . . I arrived at my present standpoint—Liberal Hill, I call it—via Catholicism, Methodism, Universalism, Materialism. Have read a little of everything that has ever been said on the subject of religion—ancient, modern and present time. . . . Still, I read all you send with much pleasure. . . . No doubt thousands will receive Unitarian literature through the Post-Office Mission that would never have seen it, or, for that matter, never have heard of it, and yet be Unitarian all the time, as I was myself. Will do all in my power to help the Post-Office Mission."

One of my most earnest inquirers is a mechanic and inventor, a foreigner by birth, and a man who has had a peculiar history spiritually. "The years of my childhood," he writes, "were one continued prayer for light, and for sufferings of all kinds that would be necessary to prepare me to aid others." After a rather neglected boyhood he joined a strict Baptist sect, and was "expelled from it in Chicago for denying the fearful theory of eternal torment." He then joined the Seventh-day Adventists, and was sent to another state to "advocate their faith" among people of his own tongue. This work gave him time to reflect that he was still in the dark, and he turned to modern Spiritualism for light, but although he learned some valuable truths of Spiritualists, he did not feel at home with them, and seems to have drifted about, much to his dissatisfaction, until he began reading our sermons. Of these he says: "I like the spirit of the pamphlets sent me very much—have been spiritually benefited by them. . . . The silent influence following your mission work is daily at work prompting me to investigate my private life." He makes some confessions about his lack of spiritual energy, and pleads: "Do not cast me off as a lazy vagabond. My moral standard is high, and I can never be happy until I can raise my head to look at it, without feeling ashamed. . . . I have forgotten how to pray; besides, I do not like beggars; I cannot see any other way for me than to work; to gain strength by self-exactions." This man has bought eight or ten of our books, and is studying all he receives from us. He once wrote: "I am not a Bible-believer; take very little interest in that book, but am nevertheless an earnest believer in God, and a future life for all mankind." I lent him the "Bible for Learners" and very soon received word that, 'The Bible for Learners' you and Miss Graves so kindly sent me will aid in removing the prejudice against the religion of old, and make me look at it in a truer light. I love to read it, and think I shall purchase a copy, so that I can take more time to study its pages."

III. LOVE.

HYMN.

INTRODUCTORY READING.

She doeth little kindnesses
Which most leave undone or despise;
For nought which sets one heart at ease,
And giveth happiness or peace,
Is low-esteemed in her eyes.

So to the calmly gathered thought,
The innermost of life is taught:
The mystery, dimly understood,
That love of God is love of good;
That to be saved is only this,— Salvation from our selfishness.

RESPONSES.

Beloved, let us love one another; for love is the fruit of the spirit; and every one that loveth is born of God.
And this is the message we have heard from the beginning, that we should love one another.
Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not love,
I am become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal.
And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries and all knowledge,
And though I have all faith so as to remove mountains, and have not love, I am nothing.
And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned,
And have not love, it profiteth me nothing.
Love suffereth long and is kind;
Love envieth not;
Love vaunteth not itself;
Doth not behave itself unseemly,
Seeketh not her own, thinketh no evil;
Rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth.
Love never faileth,
Love beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things.
Now abideth faith, hope and love, these three;
But the greatest of these is love.
If thou bring thy prayer to the altar, and there remember that thy brother hath aught against thee, go thy way!
First be reconciled to thy brother—then come and offer thy prayer unto God.
He that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?

PRAYER. (All uniting.)

Thou Divine Love, whose providence is like the sky that containeth all, thy peace be with us and with all men. Daily thy hand leads us, daily thy bounty feeds us, daily thy light, liberty and law shine within us. Help us daily to rejoice in thy goodness with thanksgiving, and to follow thy law faithfully. Help us to love our brother men and to walk in gentleness and humility of spirit. May we think only clean, kindly and noble thoughts. Thou hast made our lives brighter every day with love. We would make other lives gladder with our love. To-day may we heed thy voice without us and within us, and be drawn unto thee in love and obedience now and evermore. Amen.

IV. GOD.

HYMN.

INTRODUCTORY READING.

O God within! So close to me
That every thought is plain,
Be Judge, be Friend, be Father still,
And in thy heaven reign.
Thy heaven is mine,—my very soul!
Thy words are sweet and strong;
They fill my inward silences
With music and with song.

They send me challenges to right,
And loud rebuke my ill;
They ring my bells of victory,
They breathe my "Peace, be still!"
They ever seem to say, "My child,
Why seek me so all day?
Now journey inward to thyself,
And listen by the way!"

RESPONSES. (From R. W. Emerson.)

Men speak of revelation as something long ago given and done, as if God were dead,
But ineffable is the union of man and God in every act of the soul.

Forever and ever the influx of this better and universal self is new and unsearchable.

It inspires awe and astonishment.

How dear, how soothing to man arises the thought of God, peopling the lonely place, effacing the scars of our mistakes and disappointments!

It inspires in man an infallible trust. He is sure that his welfare is dear to the heart of being.

There can no evil befall a good man, whether he be alive or dead.

There can no evil befall a good man.

When a man says "I ought;" when love warms him; when he chooses, warned from on high, the good and great deed,

Then deep melodies wander through his soul from Supreme Wisdom.

For the dawn of the sentiment of virtue on the heart gives assurance that law is sovereign over all natures; and the worlds, time, space, eternity, do seem to break out into joy.

When a man says "Virtue, I am thine; thee will I serve, day and night, in great and in small;" then is the end of the creation answered and God is well pleased.

O my brothers, God exists! There is a soul at the center of nature and over the will of every man, so that none of us can wrong the universe.

We need only obey. There is guidance for each of us, and by lowly listening we shall hear the right word.

But if one would know what the great God speaketh, he must go into his closet and shut the door, as Jesus said; he must greatly listen to himself.

And God shall be to him a sweet enveloping thought; he shall learn the revelation of all nature, and all thought to his heart—this, namely, that the highest dwells with him.

We desire of the Infinite Wisdom and Goodness to be led into the truth. So may it be by our lowliness and seeking!

This we ask of the Infinite Wisdom and Goodness.

PRAYER. (All Uniting.)

Infinite Life, Power and Beauty! Eternal Voice speaking in our souls! Thine is the wisdom of the saint and seer. thine the light shining on the eyes of holy prophets, and thine the love that answereth and filleth every prayerful spirit. We bless thee for all the holy souls that reveal thee, for all unknown and lowly people whose daily lives are offerings heroic, sweet and beautiful to thee, and for thy voice that speaketh within us. May we heed thee and be called into the liberty and joy of thy faithful children. Amen.

If I would pray,

But this, that God may be God still;

How to Help the Poor.

In a great and humane sense there are no unworthy poor; none but are worthy of some aid or encouragement, in need of some form of help which is always due from the stronger to the weaker. We are bound together, rich and poor, the strong and weak, the fortunate and unfortunate, for our own good or evil. What is an injury or neglect to one, is a harm and a detriment to all; what is good for one is a blessing for all the others. Whether we accept it or not, it is true we are, each of us, the "keeper" or helper of our brother. On us is laid the duty to keep him out of wrong-doing, out of ignorance, from self-injury, and to help him regain his feet again and his independent position in society. Of our strength and wisdom we must give liberally, lovingly, withholding not. It must be a personal giving of our best gifts, or we can not be of much help in the elevation of these unfortunate neighbors of ours. We must give of our time, our work, our money, our sympathy and our practical wisdom. Of the harmful ways of doing, thinking we are "helping" poor people, these are the most common:

1. Giving to every one who asks aid on the street, in the office, or at the back door. As a rule, this is blind, and therefore harmful charity. Only in rare cases should it be done.

2. The giving of money. See personally that the one greatest need is supplied in the wisest way.

3. Encouraging families in which there are able-bodied adults to expect relief of any kind.

4. Giving at arm's length. Make it as much a private matter as possible.

5. Thinking the poor and unfortunate want money, food or clothing as much as advice, help to get work, friendship and encouragement.

6. Thinking there is Christian charity and another kind of charity. He is always kindest who is wisest. The head and the heart should work together when they enter the homes of the poor.

Among the wisest ways to aid the poor the following have been found the most practical.

1. Putting yourself in their place.

2. Aiding to find work, and seeing that they do not become discouraged.

3. Helping freely in times of sickness and trouble, and whenever help is most needed.

4. Stopping promptly in the relief when the family can become self-supporting.

5. Doing those things which will cure the poverty by removing its causes; working for the permanent good of the poor.

6. Strengthening their self-respect and regard for cleanliness and decency. Let them feel sure of your respect, and of your real friendship.

7. Visiting often as a friend, even when not in need of aid, and keeping fresh the cause of a common humanity.

8. Remembering that whatever may be some one else's duty toward the poor, and sick, and neglected, does not relieve you of your duty.

9. By keeping open at all hours a central office, or better yet, a friend's house or church, where all, in distress of any kind, should feel free by invitation to present their needs.—Henry D. Stevens.

THE STUDY TABLE.

What and Where is God? By H. B. Philbrook, editor "Problems of Nature," and author of "Work of Electricity in Nature," etc. Chicago: Philbrook & Dean.

This book is said to be "A discussion of the cause, character and operations of the Creator." A discussion of the "cause" of the Creator is something unusual; and, after a somewhat careful study of the table of contents of these chapters, it is found that this part of the subject is not made very clear, nor indeed given much space in this book. Almost every one will find life too short to read the book. The author has spent many hours in preparing it, without doubt, and with as little doubt loves his own thought and theories very sincerely; but the world is too old to give much attention to an author who is pleased to clothe his thought in a terminology so peculiarly his own as is here followed. His theory is, simply, that God consists of the great forces of nature, the electrical and other currents that produce nature's phenomena. This theory might once have been very heretical and caused the author some trouble. He now thinks he has made a great discovery; but he will be sadly disappointed, for the world will receive these thoughts with absolute indifference.

The New Catholic Church; with Thoughts on Theism, and Suggestions towards a Public Religious Service in Harmony with Modern Science and Philosophy. London: Trübner & Co. Cloth, pp. 171.

This little book discusses, in a rather discursive manner, various questions of theology. It is suggestive rather than exhaustive, exciting thought by presenting problems rather than satisfying it by solving them. The book is liberal in spirit, and truly catholic in aim. It is enriched with numerous quotations from leading thinkers of modern times; and to many the quotations will prove the most valuable part of the book, representing as they do the attitude of the foremost minds toward the fundamental ideas of religion.

THE HOME.

Grown-Up Land.

"Good-morrow, fair maid, with lashes brown,
Can you tell me the way to Womanhood Town?"

"Oh, this way and that way,—never a stop.
'Tis picking up stitches grandma will drop,
'Tis kissing the baby's troubles away,
'Tis learning that cross words never will pay,
'Tis helping mother, 'tis sewing up rents,
'Tis reading and playing, 'tis saving the cents,
'Tis loving and smiling, forgetting to frown,— Oh, that is the way to Womanhood Town!"

"Just wait, my brave lad, one moment, I pray.
Manhood Town lies where? Can you tell the way?"

"Oh, by toiling and trying we reach that land,—
A bit with the head, a bit with the hand.
'Tis by climbing up the steep hill, Work,
'Tis by keeping out of the wide street, Shirk,
'Tis by always taking the weak one's part,
'Tis by giving the mother a happy heart,
'Tis by keeping bad thoughts and actions down,—
Oh, that is the way to Manhood Town!"

And the lad and the maid ran hand in hand
To their fair estates in Grown-up Land.

Her Conscience Lately Aroused.

"I have a genuine trouble," said one Roxbury girl, in a low tone, to another in the horse-car the other day.

"How lovely! What is it?" asked her friend, sympathetically.

"Everybody stares at my hat."

"I should think they would," replied the other, whose own prim little felt turban was adorned with nothing but a big ribbon bow. "How any Christian girl can go around with five birds on her hat is beyond my comprehension."

"Yes, but you know very well I have them left over from last year, and it would be more wicked and wasteful to throw them away than it is to wear them. I might give them to one of the girls in my mission class, but what a dreadful example that would be for me to set! I hadn't thought anything about its being wicked to wear birds a year ago, but now since so much has been said about it it rends my heart every time I put my hat on to see all those poor darling little birds that you know I paid so much for. And people stare at me awfully, just as if I were a cruel creature and had skinned the birds alive myself. If I wear a veil over my hat I look foolish; and if I let the birds show, I not only appear hard-hearted, but out of style too."

"Oh, I suppose they aren't altogether out of style. Grace—'s mother has just brought her home the loveliest little bonnet from Paris, with three humming birds on it," said the girl in the plain turban.

"Now that's downright wicked," cried the girl with the birds on her hat. "If one has a pretty old hat, with birds on it, and it's becoming, I should think one might be forgiven for wearing it; but to buy a new bonnet with humming birds, of all birds, on it, is simply inhuman."

"But it's Parisian," argued her friend.

"I don't care. It may not look very consistent for me to preach with five birds on my hat, but a girl who will get a new hat this year with humming birds on it is unpatriotic and unprogressive and unchristian and inartistic."

"I told Grace she'd be sinning in the light to wear her new bonnet, but she said she thought it would be wrong to throw it away, just as you think about your old one."

"Well, that's so; it's a dreadful problem," and the girl with the five birds on her head sighed heavily.—Boston Record.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Chicago.—Messrs. Utter and Jones exchanged pulpits last Sunday, and so did Mr. Milsted, of Unity Church, and Mr. Conklin, of the Church of the Redeemer (Universalist), on the West Side. Thus is the cause of good fellowship enhanced.

—At the Monday noon teachers' meeting, the 10th and 11th chapters of Luke were taken up by way of a review lesson. Mr. Blake was leader, and he said, first, that these two chapters seemed more permeated with the spirit of the aftertime than almost any other passage of equal length in the Gospel. The instruction given the apostles, sent out two and two, was cited as an example of the way the doings and words of Jesus changed in the telling by the environment and the mind of the writer. "Behold, I send you forth as sheep among wolves;" "Shake off the dust of your feet," as a testimony against the city that would not receive them,—such expressions could only arise from the facts and experiences of the apostle's preaching after Jesus had left them. In regard to the Mary and Martha story, Mr. Blake laid down the principle that, if Martha was doing necessary things, Mary was supremely selfish; but if she was doing unnecessary things, then Mary was right. On the question of the extension or enlargement of Christianity beyond the Jewish conceptions, it was said that the Gospels are two-faced in this matter. On one side they are all temporal, Jewish, and monarchical in their idea of the kingdom and of Jesus's place and mission; but in another set of passages their tone on the subject is wholly spiritual. Which view came from Jesus? Probably the spiritual wholly. The external view came from the Jewish prejudices of the disciples. Only in Paul did these prejudices seem overcome so far as to widen into a humane enthusiasm which made Christianity a world-wide influence.

Philadelphia.—The second of the Union meetings was held in the First church, on the evening of the 15th, Revs. Mr. Haskell, Mr. May, Mr. Ames, Mr. Clifford and Mr. Mangasarian participating. It was an interesting occasion, which brought together a large audience of a diverse character. After the prayer by Mr. Haskell, Mr. May briefly stated the evening's subject, which referred to Parker's phrase asking what "religion may do for a man." Revs. Mr. Clifford, Mr. Ames and Mr. Mangasarian then followed in order, treating of religion as applied to the universals, to society and to the individual. Mr. May at one point entered into a consideration of the features in Channing and Parker which gave them to-day their representative position in Unitarian thought. Mr. Clifford described the broader views made necessary by scientific research, and the naturally higher functions of religion in estimating the more significant relationship of things. Mr. Mangasarian put into two or three paragraphs the larger conclusions of the times, in respect to the idea of God. What is prayer? Where is God if not within? No more should we ask an external power to help us than solicit the sun to shine. The divine is in each man's own bosom. Mr. May closed the exercises.

—On the morning of the 22d Mr. May and Mr. Haskell exchanged, and the latter, at his evening service in Camden, spoke of "Anarchism."

—George Willis Cooke is to lecture in Camden February 3, and to speak at Unity church on the Sunday following.

—The last meeting of the Contemporary Club was given to a discussion of International copyright, in which George Haven Putnam, R. Pearsall Smith, Henry Carey Baird and Doctor Wayland, of the National Baptist, participated.

H. L. T.

Hinsdale, Ill.—The Unity Club lecture course consists of a series of four lectures, to be given fortnightly on Thursday evenings during February and March. It embraces the following subjects: "Robert Browning," "Courage," "The Education of Froebel," and "Christ in Art," the last to be illustrated. Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, William M. Salter, Francis W. Parker, principal of the Cook County Normal School, and Rev. David Utter are the contributors to this treat, the lectures beginning on February 2.

Princeton, Ill.—Dr. Thomas, of Chicago, lectured here under the auspices of the Sunday Circle, to a large and interested audience. Says a correspondent: "He had eight hundred people to hear him and the attention was perfect, and such a buzz as it has made! . . . Two of the village pastors are to reply. . . . Nothing for years has stirred us theologically as this has." The Doctor is doing valiant service in the cause of liberal Christianity. Let him be heard as widely as possible.

Warren, Ill.—The Western secretary was called to Warren last week to attend the funeral of Mrs. A. Clark, mother of S. A. Clark, a woman of sterling character, and much beloved by a wide circle of friends. Mr. Effinger remained over Sunday, preaching to a full hall. The Unitarian friends continue their services from month to month and feel much encouraged. Methodists, Baptists and Presbyterians are frequently seen in our congregations.

Boston.—The numerous friends of Rev. James Freeman Clarke are happy to learn that their apprehensions of some unfortunate result from his run away accident last Sunday, while returning home from church, are not at all realized. He feels sure that rest for a few days will quite restore his nerves to usual strength.

Buda, Ill.—W. A. Coffin, late of Meadville, has been called to succeed Rev. Chester Covell in the Buda pulpit. We hear the best things of Brother Coffin's work at Buda, and shall expect the best of his ministry there. He is fortunate to follow in the footsteps of Chester Covell.

Tacoma, W. T., boasts of a Home-Church just dedicated to the Unitarian cause, by the Revs. G. H. Greer, S. A. Eliot and T. L. Eliot. The building has an auditorium that will seat 225 persons, and is said to be perfect in its acoustic qualities. We congratulate these far-off workers.

St. Louis.—Rev. George Batchelor has been visiting the brethren of this city, preaching in the pulpits of Messrs. Snyder and Learned, and visiting between times the American Unitarian Association Mission at Shelbyville.

St. Cloud, Minn.—Rev. H. Price Collier, of Hingham, Mass., is preaching for a month at this place.

DYSPEPSIA

Causes its victims to be miserable, hopeless, confused, and depressed in mind, very irritable, languid, and drowsy. It is a disease which does not get well on itself. It requires careful, persistent attention, and a remedy to throw off the causes and tone up the digestive organs till they perform their duties willingly. Hood's Sarsaparilla has proven just the required remedy in hundreds of cases.

"I have taken Hood's Sarsaparilla for dyspepsia, from which I have suffered two years. I tried many other medicines, but none proved so satisfactory as Hood's Sarsaparilla." THOMAS COOK, Brush Electric Light Co., New York City.

Sick Headache

"For the past two years I have been afflicted with severe headaches and dyspepsia. I was induced to try Hood's Sarsaparilla, and have found great relief. I cheerfully recommend it to all." MRS. E. F. ANNABLE, New Haven, Conn.

Mrs. Mary C. Smith, Cambridgeport, Mass., was a sufferer from dyspepsia and sick headache. She took Hood's Sarsaparilla and found it the best remedy she ever used.

A NEW EDITION OF Bluffton.

By MINOT J. SAVAGE.

This book, the author's only work of fiction, has for some time been out of print. It is now republished in response to a popular demand. The New York correspondent of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat quotes the superintendent of a prominent Sunday-school as saying: "The author is Rev. Minot J. Savage, the prominent and eloquent Boston Unitarian clergyman. The book is a remarkable one, and even made me feel uncomfortable, as hide-bound in Calvinism as I supposed I was. Investigation showed that a score of our older scholars and several of the teachers had been very much impressed by the story, and had been talking the subject over. The book is all the more effective because it is a faithful portrayal, so I understand, of Mr. Savage's personal experience." Cloth, 12mo. $1.50.

Catarrh, Catarrhal Deafness and Hay Fever.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby catarrh, catarrhal deafness and hay fever are permanently cured in from one to three simple applications made by the patient at home. A pamphlet explaining this new treatment is sent free on receipt of stamp, by A. H. Dixon & Son, 308 West King street, Toronto, Canada.

LOVE AND THEOLOGY.

A Novel. By CELIA PARKER WOOLLEY.
1 vol., 12mo. $1.50.

"It is not only entertaining, but interesting from the highest point of view. It goes on from chapter to chapter with ever-increasing force and power. No book of fiction that Ticknor & Co. have published has had, to my thinking, the depth and value of this, and nowhere have the present study and questioning of theological subjects been more clearly and satisfactorily presented; for, in all this presentation, there is not a hint of irreverence or flippancy of any kind. There is, instead, a very beautiful presentation of the very best interpretation of the liberal thoughts of to-day,—an interpretation that contains the highest spirituality. Herein is the book of great value; and that it will be reckoned among the books that will be of service to all intelligent inquirers I have no doubt. It is, I should say most decidedly, a book to own, and not to merely read for amusement only, and then to throw aside; and this for the characterization as well as the presentation of the newer interpretations of the Bible, etc. This characterization is exceedingly well done, showing no effort, but a natural gift of character-painting. The dialogue is something more than mere made-up talk, and the reflective portion contains philosophy of the most cultivated kind; and this, of course, includes the fact that this philosophy is free of narrow and vulgar self-assertion."—Nora Perry. Mailed, on receipt of price, by CHARLES H. A NEW BOOK FREE.

THE EVOLUTION OF IMMORTALITY is a book of which we need say little in this advertisement. UNITY of Jan. 21 contained a review of the book copied from the Chicago Times. Last week's issue contained an original review of it by J. V. B. The Inter Ocean says: "The line of argument is comparatively new, and so well presented as to be profoundly interesting." The Evening Journal says: "How he evolves his theory . . . is well worth reading and judging for one's self."

The price of this book is one dollar. We regard it as worth the money, and have no intention of making any reduction.

But we are anxious to add a thousand names to the subscription list of UNITY before March 1, the beginning of a new volume, and therefore we wish to offer our friends a sufficient inducement to help us bring this about.

It has been urged on us that a dollar offer is the most attractive to those who order by mail, on account of the convenience of slipping a dollar bill into a letter instead of taking the trouble to procure a bank draft or postal order. We shall be glad to test this theory, and therefore make the following offer:

Send us one dollar, with the name of a new subscriber to UNITY for eight months, and we will send a copy of "The Evolution of Immortality," free by mail. If you can induce a friend to subscribe, the book will cost you nothing. If not, you can get the book at the regular price, and make some one a present of UNITY without further outlay.

This advertisement will meet the eyes of some who are not subscribers. If any such will send one dollar with his own subscription for eight months, we will send the book as before described.

The foregoing offer applies only to new subscriptions, not to renewals. But if any subscriber not in arrears will send us his renewal for a year with $1.50, and 50 cents additional, or $2.00 in all, we will send a copy of the book.

These offers hold good until March 1.

FREEDOM, FELLOWSHIP AND CHARACTER IN RELIGION.

VOLUME XX.]

CHICAGO, FEBRUARY 4, 1888.

[NUMBER 23.]

EDITORIAL.

A GENTLEMAN in Kent, England, has started an "Industrial Inebriate Farm," to be a refuge for the drink-smitten who desire to reform.

THROUGH the hand to the brain is beginning to be the cry of the educationalist. Probably through the hand to the conscience is soon to be the word of the reformer.

THE theologian in some quarters continues to say, "Doubt miracles, particularly the miracles of Jesus, and the whole scheme of salvation falls to the ground;" to which the scientific student replies, "Establish miracles, in your theological sense, and the whole fabric of human knowledge falls; for there is no dependence on testimony, and no trusting the uniformity of Nature."

THE lightning rod really protects, not by catching the forked lightning in its flight, but by quietly conducting the accumulating fluid from the atmosphere, before it is overcharged, into the receptive earth. This illustrates the highest spiritual service of the church. It should be a quiet, persistent force, controlling discordant elements, checking wayward impulses, and restoring equilibrium to distracted lives.

MR. JOHN MORLEY is undertaking to get a law through the English Parliament which may well engage the attention of our American legislators. It is for the regulation of the children of the street. "Under the age of eight no child is to be allowed to sell at all; and under the age of fourteen, not after 10 P. M. in summer, and 9 P. M. in winter. Children arrested will be detained, but not in a prison. The bill is intended to apply to all towns of 30,000 and upward of inhabitants."

AT the request of Archdeacon Farrar, the poet Whittier has written the inscription for the memorial window to Milton, to be placed in St. Margaret's church, London, the gift of Mr. George W. Childs, of Philadelphia. The inscription is as follows:

"The New World honors him whose lofty plea
For England's freedom made her own more sure;
Whose song, immortal as its theme, shall be
Their common freehold while both worlds endure."

IN these days of controversy, discussion is inevitable; aye, destruction of many old ideas is also inevitable; but let him who enters this arena remember Emerson's words: "No good man vaunts disbelief, but only aims to put a real motive and law in the place of the false ones removed." And let him work in such a way as in some measure to merit the words which Oliver Wendell Holmes applied to Emerson: "An iconoclast without a hammer, who took down our idols from their pedestals so tenderly that it seemed like an act of worship."

AN English exchange reports a discussion on board an Indian Ocean steamer between four gentlemen—a German, a Swede, a Dane and an Englishman—concerning the future national leadership of the world. They had been passing ten or more years in the far east. They unanimously agreed that England holds that ascendancy now, but they also agreed that in the future China was to assume such an ascendancy. A corroborative hint was found in the fact that there were thirty-four government students aboard that ship on their way to study navigation, mining and military engineering in England and France. Good St. Agatha, in George Eliot's poem, said it was grand to go on pilgrimages, but sometimes it takes the conceit out of one. If one wants to preserve the faith that he and his are the best and biggest things in the world, he must needs stay very close at home.

MR. BARROWS in last week's issue of his paper, the Christian Register, gives an interesting account of a visit to the Elmira Reformatory, which we wish might be read by every voter in the country. To secure it we wish every reader of UNITY would subscribe for the Christian Register, because he is to continue the study in a subsequent issue. In this article he says: "The more rational idea of prison management is good light, good food, but no luxury; for luxuries enervate. But in this institution the visitor cannot help feeling that there is a power of mind and conscience at work."

WE learn that an International Council of Women, called by the National Woman Suffrage Association, is to be held in Washington, D. C., opening March 25, and closing April 1, 1888, and that it "will be by far the most important and influential gathering of women that the world has ever seen." Aside from the direct good accomplished by such organizations as this and the Association for the Advancement of Women, there is certainly a vast indirect helpfulness in the noble spirit of unity which it encourages, as well as in the mental and spiritual development induced by intellectual friction.

WE quote the following pathetic recital from a little article by Frances Willard on "Our Bondage." "During sixteen blessed years," she says, "I had feet uncramped, limbs unfettered, trunk unbandaged, hair untwisted, and, largely as a consequence, spirit blithe as a singing skylark. Living in the country, and in much isolation, my dear mother permitted to her daughters the almost unexampled bliss of freedom in both body and mind. There was no hill too high to climb, and no tree, for that matter; no valley too deep to explore, no brook too wet to wade. Out-door air, simple food, eight hours' sleep in every twenty-four—all these beatitudes were ours. But there came a day—alas! the dark day of my youth—on which I was as literally caught out of the fields and pastures as was ever a young colt; confronted by a long dress that had been made for me, corsets and high-heeled shoes that had been bought, hair-pins and ribbons for my straying locks, and I was told that it simply 'wouldn't answer' to 'run wild' another day. Company from the city was expected; I must be made presentable; I 'had got' to look like other folks.' That was a long time ago, but I have never known a single physically reasonable day since that sweet May morning, when I cried in vain for longer lease of liberty. Those 'adornments'—the inquisition of fashion—changed my outlook on the world. A caged bird became my fitting emblem. Of a shy, sensitive nature, I yielded at once to the inevitable. But my high heels threw me out of poise, and I wouldn't try to walk more than was necessary in the clinging folds of that long, tight-fitting gown. Hence I ceased to be a denizen of God's beautiful out-doors; was a rambler and climber no more, but gave myself to books, and have remained in my cage—the house—right on through the years." She concludes as follows: "Instead of the walk I would like to take, had I the old-time conditions—the modest, simple, short dress, loose jacket, and broad-rimmed hat of auld lang-syne—I pen this jeremiade, and bid God-speed to the earnest-hearted woman who, in roaring Gotham, plans for us women a costume that hints at better days." To such a feeling appeal from the woman of sense the woman of fashion cannot certainly turn a deaf ear, while all students of the practical science of fitting clothes for women will doubtless be spurred to more suitable invention, to which the delicate tribute paid to Annie Jenness Miller must urge them on.

ACCORDING to recent reports there appears a new phase in the opposition to Professor Woodrow, of Columbia, S. C., and his qualified acceptance of evolution. It will be remembered that Professor Woodrow was dismissed from his chair in the Theological Seminary on this account some time ago. Since then, however, he has continued his work as a professor in the university of South Carolina. It seems now that some of the theological students desire private instruction of the professor, which he declined to give, lest he should appear to be pushing his views into the circle from which he had been dismissed. These students then matriculated in the university, in order to hear his lectures. Says a New York Tribune dispatch: "When the seminary faculty ascertained this, a boycott was determined upon. The students were visited, and told that attendance upon Woodrow's lectures was injuring the seminary; that outside friends would withhold contributions; that the support of those who persisted in attending would be cut off; and that the attendance upon the lectures of Doctor Woodrow was in direct opposition to the will of the church. The boycott was for a time complete, but some of the seminary students have informed the faculty that they purpose to continue attending the Woodrow lectures. No other action has been taken by the faculty." This warning about the loss of "contributions" does not reach a very prophetic plane when the issue is one between what is true and what is not true. It is not confined, however, to Southern Presbyterian theological schools, and persons of very short memories can recall something of the same warning in the discussions of more liberal households of faith. We appreciate the value of money in all moral and religious work; but in the long run it is much less than the power of just principles and ideas. These comes out ahead at last, whether rich men endow them or not. That was a homely saying of Lincoln, and wise as homely: "You can fool all the people sometimes, and you can fool some people all the time, but you can't fool all the people all the time!"

THERE is cold weather in the city, but there is winter only in the country. One night recently the senior editor went to sleep in the city with the thermometer dipping towards zero, and woke up next morning a hundred and forty miles away, to find himself in the heart of winter, splendid winter; whiteness, everywhere—snow, drifting, piling, deep, cumulative snow on everything. The thermometer had got down eighteen or twenty below, but this was splendid winter, and about six in the morning he found himself standing on the platform of the railway station of Spring Green, Wis., wondering what had become of the twenty-seven years that intervened between that morning and the time when he was a busy member of the village school. The air seemed just as electric now as then, and there was more of an appetite for a sleigh ride. Three miles across the snow, over the new Wisconsin river bridge, and he saw for the first time the Hillside Home School, finished, equipped and running, with its five teachers, fourteen family pupils, and fifteen or twenty day pupils from the neighboring farm houses. To the writer the gratification was keen over this flowering of the old homestead; but one day was all he had to give to this his country parish, his oldest charge. Croup, lung-fever and others of their ominous ilk had been around, so some of the children could not be out in the evening, and the Millet pictures had to be shown for their benefit at one of the farm houses in the afternoon. In the evening, the lecture and the pictures were given in the chapel to a good audience, some of whom had ridden three or four miles through the cold. The showman had to hurriedly pack up after the lecture, and skim along that three miles of snow to head off the ten o'clock train, which came leisurely and laboriously along at one o'clock next morning, and the city pastor was five hours late the next day, disappointing his confirmation class. The city class could little understand that their pastor had been metamorphosed meanwhile, and for twenty-four hours he had been the farmer boy, the Wisconsin missionary, and a country parson all in one. He had been home, and still was back home again.

THE January Unitarian Review, among many other good things, contains an interesting sketch from the pen of the Hon. George W. Julian, of anti-slavery fame, entitled "A Search after Truth." After speaking of his Quaker associates, of his early readings and of his indebtedness to such minds as Parker, Lucretia Mott and others, he says: "I accepted the necessity of the case as well as I could, still holding on to my conservative Unitarianism as the best thing I could do, but as a sort of provisional faith, the real foundations of which I hoped in some way to ascertain at some future time. I went about my daily business, but with an unappeased interest in theological problems; and it was more than a dozen years later before I found myself logically compelled, as a finality, to surrender every form and quality of supernaturalism, and to take my stand with the radical wing of the Unitarian body, and such independent thinkers as agreed with it, in demanding absolute freedom of thought. I had been most anxious to reach a different conclusion. I had earnestly sought the blessing of mental repose in a divinely authenticated faith; but I could not purchase that blessing at the cost of my understanding. I became convinced of the natural origin of Christianity, because I found it impossible to believe in the supernatural. I reached this final theological landing after much mental anxiety, a good deal of reading, and by a train of thought which yielded me no intellectual peace till I allowed it to have its way. My reason compelled me to agree with Mrs. Child, that 'the idea that Christianity is a special revelation, made up all at once, and entirely by itself, is as irrational as to suppose that the world was made in six days. Christianity was a growth. The past flowed into the present, and left much of its deposit; and even so will the present pass into the future. There is a perpetual process of evolution in things of the mind, as well as in the forms of matter.' My Unitarian experience during the years I was struggling to be satisfied with my semi-orthodox faith in some respects strikingly resembled that of Harriet Martineau, as detailed in her charming Autobiography; but I did not follow her into Positivism, and the disbelief in a future life. I did not abjure religion altogether, because one of its accepted foundations gave way; while, in bravely facing the great duties and trials of life, I gradually found strength and tranquillity of mind. During the long years of the anti-slavery conflict I found that, just in proportion as I gave my heart unselfishly to the work, the doctrinal doubts and anxieties that had so troubled me faded away, and seemed unworthy of a man who loved his neighbor and believed in the brotherhood of his race. My whole moral nature was lifted up by sincere consecration to my grand task; and I realized at last that 'with the heart man believeth unto righteousness,' that 'the tree of knowledge is not that of life,' and that the only safe 'plan of salvation' is that of personal duty and endeavor."

As regards my early devotion to Unitarianism as a sect, a wider acquaintance with books, and forty odd years of active life and practical contact with men of all opinions, have somewhat modified my views and tempered my zeal; but, as a powerful and heroic protest against false dogmas, and a great stride towards the inevitable goal of free thought, I honor it, and thank it more than words can express. Nor am I left without religious faith and hope. For reasons which satisfy my understanding without any support from supernaturalism, I am a theist. I believe in personal immortality on the strength of the human affections, and because I can not believe that the unappeasable hunger of the soul for so priceless a blessing was implanted to be ungratified and mocked. I believe in the simple humanity of Jesus, and the renovating and ever-unfolding power of his life and teachings in lifting humanity to higher and yet higher conditions. While I accept these ideas as rational and satisfying, I am not a scoffer at any form of faith, because I believe all forms are the product of causes from which they have inevitably been evolved, and that this continuing process of evolution will at last give the world a perfect religion, as the outcome and counterpart of a perfected humanity. I do not, therefore, believe in the gospel of human despair, and that the work of creation is an abortion, but that 'all we have willed or hoped or dreamed of good shall exist,—not its semblance, but itself.'"

THE Christian Union, in an editorial note (Jan. 19), thinks that "in such a time as this, when all faiths are undergoing re-examination, and many minds are in a state of more or less doubt respecting what have been regarded as fundamental doctrines of orthodox theology, a large catholicity is demanded, and a large latitude for difference, not only in methods of statement, but of theological opinion respecting even the more central doctrine." In the same note it says frankly: "We do not insist upon the dogma of the Trinity, which is a philosophical deduction from, and not an expressed declaration of, Scripture. But it stands as a representative for loving reverence for the Father manifest in nature, the Son revealed in Jesus, and the Holy Ghost indwelling in the human consciousness, and it is truly entitled to be treated of with respect by all who have respect for the deepest experience of humanity." It is safe to say that some element of truth has hidden in every great and widely prevalent belief, however inadequate its expression; not only safe, but wiser to think this and to discern that element of truth than to lose sight of it in easy ridicule of the imperfect expression. We disparage that essential nature in which we all have interest and share, when we admit that any large portion of humanity ever found help and comfort in unmingled falsehood and error.

The War Prospect.

Isaiah predicted the time when swords should be beaten into plow-shares; Cicero taught the "universal brotherhood of mankind;" Lucian said the human race would yet "cast aside its weapons, and all nations learn to love;" and Jesus made peace and love the foundation of his religion. But war has still held its own. Christians soon reversed Jesus' principles; for centuries waged religious wars for him who gave his chief blessing to peace-makers, and sacked cities in the name of him who said, "Love your enemies." Nor do they yet condemn war so much as they do the doubt whether Noah built the ark.

But more and more the evidence grows that Jesus and Cicero were right, and that the prophecy of Isaiah and Lucian will yet come true. Wars are themselves the most powerful argument for peace,—an argument which is beginning to tell on the public mind. They are quite too costly a custom;—and the New York Nation once said the cost of that little one in Afghanistan alone would have bought out the Irish landlords, and honestly and forever settled the Irish question. War is too criminal a custom; and men are beginning to ask why we should hang a highwayman for killing one man, and honor Napoleon for killing two millions? Is the moral law altered by epaulets?

And after all the cost and crime, wars accomplish so little! Usually they have only, as Lowell says, "shifted the boundaries on the map, and put one ugly head instead of another on the coins which the people paid to the tax-gatherer." Froude, though friendly to the British government, said the Zulu war had left the troubles there worse than it found them, and had brought England only a debt for murdering 12,000 defenders of their native land. The industrial classes are learning that wars are only a wicked waste, paid out of their own pocket, and giving nothing but grief in return. The waste is, besides, ever growing greater and more barbarous with progress in the invention and use of explosives.

But this very increase of the evil is bringing a new hope of its end. Its mere cost is threatening to bankrupt nations; and very significant was that memorial for international arbitration recently sent to Washington from military England, and signed by over 200 members of the House of Commons. Sir Lyon Playfair, in introducing it, said that the "whole world is startled at the new aspect of war," which the progress of science is bringing,—and that the cost of European armaments had increased twenty-five per cent in the last ten years. At that rate the world will soon have to pay so much for its fighting that there will be nothing left for food. The increasing fatality of war works to the same end. A morning paper, commenting on a new dynamite gun, which promised to be able to annihilate all our present forts and navies,—called it a "peace-maker." Possibly we shall yet reach the "Vril" which Bulwer fancied,—and which by its very deadliness ended war, and forced nations to be peaceable.

ONE of the Stuart kings of England asked the release of a number of Huguenots, who were languishing in the Bastille for no offense but their religion. "What would your master say," retorted the French king, "if I were to ask the release of the criminals he keeps under lock and key in Newgate?" "He would let you have every man of them if you claimed them as brethren," was the clever retort of the English ambassador.—Exchange.

A Winter Sunset.

The brown earth shivers
As the night wind blows,
Cold it blows from the dark'ning North,
O'er prairies bare and sluggish rivers
Straight from the land of frost and snows.
The sunset has lighted
Its fires in the west;
The bare boughs reach toward the welcome glow;
The buds 'neath their blankets quiver excited,
A vision of June disturbing their rest.

The Saving Power of the Religion of Love.

In response to our note in the issue of January 21, we have received various answers to the question, "Is the religion of love inefficient?" from which we print the following, and hope our readers will re-read the paragraph which called them forth, in order that they may be better able to understand the statements of our correspondents, and that they may consider and reconsider for themselves. We forbear comment, but hope that our readers will give these topics serious consideration.

The teaching of fear may have a more immediate effect, but it is an effect which is lost when the pressure is removed. Depravity is ignorance, and love is the greatest educator. Fear gives the soul it oppresses a weapon to turn against itself,—defiance; love, by disarming them, puts them at its mercy.

L. A. L.

If love has proved inefficient for the cure of any evil, it is because no leverage has been found for the efficient application of its mighty power. Steam needs an engine, or its force will be dissipated in cloudy and profitless vapor. Do not say that love is anything less than omnipotent until its virtue has been fairly tried. Recall the fable of the sun, the wind, and the traveler's cloak.

c.

All true religion, doubtless, is embraced in the grand summary of love to God and man—the religion most prominently taught and inculcated by Jesus Christ and the Apostles, and pre-eminently and emphatically the religion best calculated to restrain the vicious and depraved.

BEVERLY SHELLEY.

In UNITY of Jan. 21, you ask, "Is the religion of love inefficient? Has it no power to constrain the evil-doer?" Desire answers, Yes, love has such power, and is the only power of restraint. The evil-doer must be taught that he suffers in consequence of wrong-doing, and that love cannot and would not prevent this result. There are persons who are not deterred by natural consequences, but who fear arbitrary punishment. Ought preachers to threaten these with God's wrath? No; because such deterrent makes them no better in character. I know a number of men who are honest, they say, because they fear the fire, but they are characterless. If the fear of after-death punishment were destroyed, they would yet be honest, notwithstanding their denial. The fear of the law and of public opinion, of dishonoring family, etc., is sufficient to deter; when these fail the state proceeds to restrain the evil-doer. So the state takes the place of future retribution. The pulpit has no right—because there is no need—to preach that men will be arbitrarily punished; further, because such a theory is not true, and an untruth cannot make men better.

J. W. CALDWELL.

I have always had an impression that "right minded" meant accountableness, duty, allegiance; but I did not dream that it could be twisted into dead letter, evasion and repudiation. The fire-worshiper who argues Hades for the redemption of ignorance illuminates the world on the principle of a magic lantern; you know that is a machine by which small objects painted on glass are reproduced and magnified to any size desired.

M. B. D.

Is it proper for us to aid with our money a church which makes use of the fear of hell, when we believe that the love of goodness is the highest and best means? Yes, for two reasons. 1st. There is no church in the civilized world which does not make quite as much use of the constraint of love as the restraint of fear. 2d. It is a general rule, though by no means absolute, that men do not embrace a form of religion which their judgments (such as they are) do not approve, and in which they do not find comfort and betterment. I am fully persuaded that at this time, as at all past times, religious beliefs and forms tend to harmonize with their surroundings. In all such questions, I think a logic based upon narrow premises is harmful to the growth of enlightenment.

The above reply is given from the stand point of one who views Christian theology as mere mythology, but at the same time sees great beauty and comfort in what men have been pleased to name the Christian spirit.

G. M. ALVES.

"Is the religion of love inefficient? Has it no power to constrain the evil-doer?" It is through the religion of love that mankind must be humanized; none other will ever "make the whole world kin."

I am surprised that the professed followers of Christ lose sight of the great fundamental principles of his teachings. How mild his reproofs! How kindly his "Neither do I condemn thee, go thou and sin no more." When man loves his brother man, as the divine Father loves all of his children, he will have no desire to wrong him in any way—then all his promptings will be to do him good. It is to the religion of love that we look to break down false barriers; to do away with all forms of class distinction as well as the idea that only those who believe in certain formulated creeds and dogmas are Christians.

The little experience gained in our penal institutions, in dealing with the vicious classes with the law of love, points unerringly to the fact that that doctrine will obtain where threats and force will utterly fail.

Whatever tends to broaden man's faith in humanity also quickens his sympathies and stimulates him to a better life—helps to hasten the millennium when the gospel of love shall reign; when all the world will be a common brotherhood and every man will be a law unto himself.

VIE H. CAMPBELL.

Will you allow an orthodox answer to the question, "Is the religion of love inefficient?" As to the religion of fear for the ignorant and depraved, I believe that they lie in many ways more open to the touch of love than some who count themselves cultured and of the heights of fashion. If fear must frown, it is more in place frowning upon the hardened brother in the high places of life whose heart's juices are dried up in grinding the face of his poorer brother, minting gold and seeking the power of self-gratifying pleasures. But of all those things which appeal to the baser in man, the ignorant and depraved classes have enough, and within are quite hungry for love when it comes down to them across a really loving heart, over really sympathetic, hopeful lips. I go to-night into a revival meeting in my own church, and my brother of another denomination will speak, and of nothing but the love of God, and under his preaching hearts will be touched, lives ennobled. The other night a young man, ignorant, and, as he himself said, seeking eagerly the ways and delights of sin, listened to nothing but the fullest setting forth of the pure love of God,—a love that would never cease to love, with the thought, of course, that sin shadows and wounds and debases the life; and this young man after the meeting most heartily thanked the preacher for, as he put it, "the good talking to you gave me." The educated, from the UNITY stand point, among my people are few, many of them indeed being unable to read; and I find that the fear idea moves them so far, when they relapse, but the love idea steadies and deepens their religious lives.

A leading Baptist minister in a certain state read a paper on his reminiscences of fifty years in the ministry. He said when young he thought no one could be saved but a Baptist, but thanked God he had learned better, and now believed that many even of the Catholics would be saved. He told of a revival of religion which had occurred in two churches situated in neighboring towns. In the one the dominating element was fear. The converts were many, the church membership largely increased, but the permanent fruits in strength to the church and fidelity of Christian character were little. In the other the motive was love, and there was a like large increase in the church's membership. And the permanent fruits in character and the strength of the church were great and abiding. Let sin be shown as a degrading power here and hereafter, bearing its punishment in its own bosom, and then over that shadow of shame let shine the love of the Father, the infinite mercy of the Saviour. This is the method of Jesus, and nowhere to the ignorant and depraved is any other word than the word of love spoken by him; nowhere the hearts of publicans and sinners scorched with an awful hate or withered with a horrible fear. Toward the self-righteous, the polite, selfish, loving not their brother, there were flashes of words far otherwise, and he moved men as none other, his story being a story of love.

The Greatest Cause of Crime.

EDITOR OF UNITY:—Your issue of January 14 contains an editorial article, quoted largely from one by Ethelbert Stewart contained in the Journal of Industrial Education, in which the writer formulates the opinion, as drawn from numerous statistics given, that one, if not the great cause for crime, is a lack of proper industrial training for the young, and that if the trades were more generally learned crime would be materially diminished. Admitting the writer to be more than right in his reasoning, I hold that there are other causes, and more prevalent ones. In our large cities, and it is from these the great majority of criminals are sent, the young men make up the large proportion of the wage-earning population, and perhaps more particularly in the large cities of the west. This class are almost totally non-resident. They have left homes in the towns of the east, and have come to these places to find fortune. Without friends, and in most cases with little money they meet a stranger's welcome. And that, without that magic "sesame," money, is very apt to be a cold one. For a while they struggle on, battling against the many odds they find in their way, some surmounting the difficulties and pushing ahead, while others drop to where every temptation awaits them,—victims, as I believe, of the selfish, unsympathetic natures of their fellows. Here they fall. Some, when found not too late, may rally and be brought back into the highway again; but such cases are not numerous enough to make it a rule.

While the trades open a fairly sure avenue for work at all times, I cannot believe that it is the lack of a more general knowledge of them that makes crime so prevalent. There is in our present form of life an over-abundance of selfishness. Money has become the ruling passion. The weak, if he can not battle for himself, must fall, for no helping hand is there. Had we the hardihood of the stoics, there might be fewer failures. Could our young men be taught that well-enough is almost always best, if let alone a remedy would be found that might banish a part at least of the cause. They should be satisfied with the home, at least, until they have strength to fight against all odds. Human sympathy is a far more needful instrumentality in the lessening of crime than any form of education. The human heart naturally yearns for brotherhood, for kindly recognition from its fellows.

"Blessed are the ties that bind
Our hearts in human love."

And how blessed they would be if we could but see them exemplified in the daily walks of life! But human sympathy has limited itself to kindred, and sometimes hardly that. Industrial education is good, and should be advanced, but true human sympathy, if rightly practiced, will be the bearer of the more perfect fruit.

Sunday Circles.

By JOHN R. EFFINGER.

WHAT IS THE SUNDAY CIRCLE?

It is a company of people who have outgrown the methods and beliefs of the churches in their neighborhood, but are conscious of religious needs and aspirations. They are too few in number to build a church, or even hire a hall and call a minister; yet they feel that something may be accomplished by meeting together to consider those great themes which belong to the moral and spiritual nature of man, and to seek for themselves personally, inspiration and guidance in the way of life.

The idea of the Sunday Circle is slowly shaping itself. The Iowa Unitarian Conference, in November, 1886, took the lead in this direction by organizing a "Society of Lay-Leaders," and the following resolutions were adopted in June, 1887, at the meeting of the Illinois Unitarian Conference held in Buda:

Resolved, That the Illinois Conference believes that the next missionary step forward should be the development of the Unity Sunday Circle,—the little church cradled in a home parlor before even the hall is reached; believes that this, the next missionary agency to be organized, may become a worthy second to the Post-Office Mission.

Resolved, Therefore, that the Conference requests the Western Unitarian Conference and the Woman's Western Unitarian Conference to take the matter into their special consideration as a thing to push this year; and that a committee to consist of Mr. Covell and two others whom he may select be appointed by the Illinois Conference to carry out the above suggestion as far as possible.

At the October meeting of the Conference in Hinsdale, this word was reaffirmed and a committee appointed "to carry out as far as possible the above suggestions in the state of Illinois.

It is believed that there are throughout the country many places where such circles might be formed, where a few people are heartily ready to come together for the purposes above indicated. They are waiting for the suggestion. Here it is:

HOW TO GET IT.

Let some one who feels the need, go to others whom he believes to be in sympathy with him, and invite them to meet him at his own house, or at some other convenient place. Let him not be discouraged by doubt or distrust in other faces. The determining factor is the one brave soul who goes ahead. He says, "Come and let us consider whether the themes which belong to the higher life are of sufficient importance to us and our children to bring us together regularly." If two or three are agreed, they will join hands and trust to time and the warmth they may be able to generate, to attract others. It will not be necessary for them to spend time and energy in constructing a doctrinal basis of fellowship. The laws of spiritual affinity will silently determine the metes and bounds of the circle. It will need hymn and service books and printed sermons,—all of which can be furnished at moderate cost. (See list on page 4.) So, for a trifling expenditure of money, the Sunday Circle can be supplied with songs, services and sermons. It can exist without a minister.

HOW TO CONDUCT IT.

This will depend largely on the taste and spiritual attitude of those composing the circle. "Given a simple service and songs in which all join, given a friend at the melodeon or piano, given a noble sermon printed, given a good reader, now one and now another, and given that in the reader which makes the listeners feel it natural he should read noble things aloud,—given this, and all this regularly, and the habit of coming together for this clad in one's best mood and coat and with the children,—given this, and we have, without a pastor, a large part of a good pastor."

"The best parlor for the purpose is the one where the welcome is the heartiest, and everybody is most apt to feel at home; or if no parlor is convenient, the school-house comes free. There is some one in the company able, and only too glad to be able, to be at the parlor organ every Sunday, rain or shine. There are others who agree together that they will open their mouths and sing, and they prepare themselves accordingly—and the result is that pretty nearly all join in. There are others willing to take turns at the reading, and they prepare themselves for that part so as to do it at their best."

Gradually the circle will grow until it develops into the liberal church that is destined to become a power for good in the community.

THE HOME.

Some Real Fairies.

"I don't like to read fairy stories; it makes me wish so much that there really were fairies."

"Wouldn't it be nice if there only were!"

"Oh! Then we could have everything we wanted! Dresses, and candy, and gold rings, and books, and houses, and —"

"Beautiful dolls with elegant clothes," added Amy, rapturously, whose soul delighted in fine fabrics, but found its chief expression for that delight through the latent spark of motherhood which dwelt in the heart of the little woman. Many an older mother has nourished her own fondness in like manner, when the object of her devotion was not stuffed with sawdust, but with much more pervertible material.

"But Cousin Addie says there isn't any such thing as fairies living up in the clouds or in flowers, talking to children and giving them things," said Marion, conclusively, "and Cousin Addie ought to know, for she went to Europe with her father and mother, and so has seen a great deal of the world." Cousin Addie was twelve years old. The reflection consequent upon the last remark drew a deep sigh from the speaker, as a picture of how much more Cousin Addie had to make her happy than she herself had, came into her mind.

That was her way of looking at it. The things we have not are just the ones we are sure will make us happy.

I was sitting by the sunny south window sewing; the children were in the next room, but now came to their table near me.

"What is it about fairies and Cousin Addie?" I asked, as I recalled the listless face of the little cousin who had visited us a few weeks ago.

"Nothing, Aunty,—much, only she says there isn't any."

"No fairies?"

"None, really; all these nice stories are just made up to please little children, who are silly enough to believe them. I don't believe them, I'm sure!" Marion declared with a sage air. Amy could not quite give it up yet, and, not being afraid of my thinking her silly, said:

"But why should there be such nice stories about them, if there isn't anything at all like them, Auntie?"

"Now you are coming to the question, little Amy. What is your idea of a fairy?"

"Oh, they are very, very little,—at least the stories make us think so," Marion hastily replied, getting interested. "Yes, and good and kind and beautiful," added Amy slowly, picking up a blossom which had dropped from a pot of nasturtiums in the window, and petting it gently. "They love us, and like to make us happy."

"But there are bad fairies, too,—in the books; they are not all good and loving," put in Marion, quickly guarding herself against the unconscious assumption of their existence, which had slipped into Amy's share of the description.

"I don't remember any bad ones," murmured Amy, smiling to her flower, while she rolled the petals over to look like a bonnet, as if she were forgetting to care whether there were fairies or not.

"Neither of you has said how you imagine fairies look,—what sort of forms they take."

"I always used to think they were little atoms of creatures, just like ourselves." Marion generally answered a question while Amy was thinking about it.

"I thought so, too," said Amy, "but I like to play the flowers are fairies. When I was sick, and had begun to get better, you used to put a fresh flower on my pillow every morning, and I played at first that a fairy lived in it; so I talked to it and loved it. Then pretty soon I began to forget about the fairy, and talk to my flower itself. The pansies had such funny faces, it was easy to talk to them; when you gave me an arbutus I could ring the bell for school, or for church, or for a fire, and play all sorts of things were happening."

"You turned the flowers themselves into fairies by fastening your love upon them, and then letting them play freely with your imagination. Probably that's the way all the fairy stories started. We can have plenty of fairies that way, in all the beautiful things Nature gives us to do this with. I like to trace figures in the clouds. You can outline whole cities there sometimes,—perhaps that's the safest kind of 'castles in the air'."

"Papa says he likes to find pictures in a grate full of glowing coals, like this." And Marion threw herself on the rug to try and get acquainted with a new set of fairies; for, with the present light on the subject, she almost began to believe she could even manufacture her own fairies, and it was decidedly pleasant to feel her faith in them being restored to her.

"These are a kind of fairies that take visible shapes to your eyes, although they are not little beings like ourselves. You can see the figures in the clouds, in the bright coals; you can hold the flower in your hand,—can touch, handle it, and smell its fragrance. Then these shapes reflect back into your inner life, to awaken and minister to you through your thought or imagination. I believe the flower on Amy's pillow did more to help her get well than the doctor's medicine." Marion's fairies in the bright coals not appearing as promptly as she had counted on, she rose to the question anew.

"But that's so different from the book-fairies! They sit in the flowers and drink dew, and when anybody picks the flower they tell them some secret, and then fly away."

"Does it seem any less fairy-like or mysterious because it was only a familiar flower that helped quicken Amy into new life, instead of a wee bit of a creature with a silver crown and wand, a filmy dress and starry eyes? I think it is more wonderful and beautiful. At first she played there was a fairy in the flower; but as soon as she got the secret and found that after all it was the blessed blossom she was talking to, the fairy flew away, and she loved the flower for itself. The fairy-thought had brought her nearer to the flower, it is true; for all the myths and fairy-lore do bring us closer to the heart of the source from which they spring,—from which they 'drink their dew'—and if when they have whispered their secret they fly away, we are dullards, indeed, if we persist in bemoaning the fairy when she has left us the flower! We had much better bestir ourselves to understand the secret she whispered, and work it out for ourselves. If we are not willing to do this, but push too greedily for another flower, expecting to find another fairy and be told the secret over again without trying to understand it for ourselves, we miss the blessing. If the fairy does not fly away, the real 'comforter will not come.'" Both the girls looked up with a sudden new light in their faces and came close to me, eyeing me earnestly as they recognized the quotation from their lesson of last Sunday, while their hearts felt out the connecting link.

"This is where we grown folks get our fairy gifts,—from all the beautiful things that God has given in the world around us, and in the new life that these things awaken within us, if we use their secrets wisely, working them out, as much as we can, for ourselves. There is our bit of a canary bird trying to put in his opinion on the subject."

"Then you think everything that is beautiful and teaches us to love God better is like a fairy to us?" queried Marion.

"That is what my fairies are, and I ought not to let you think it is only the beautiful things that help us; for the unlovely, the painful, and most bitterly distasteful things have often opened the most wonderful and beautiful secrets to me. I believe everything is a messenger from God if we will but take the secret from the fairy and use it, instead of fearing when the painful things come, that they are from—never mind who,—and so try to shrink them."

"Why, then the world is just full of fairies!" cried Marion, clapping her hands, "instead of there being none!"

"Fairyland really here," thought Amy, half aloud and half to herself, as if she were not wholly sure that she found any more happiness out of it than she had before, the ratio of things having in truth not changed much for her.

Marion felt as if a part of her real self had been restored to her, and the energy of her spirits must have a vent. She flew to the closet where hung the jackets and hoods, and, jumping into her overshoes in a jiffy, stirred up the quiet soul of her sister with a rousing,

"Put on your duds, little one, and come out for a snow-balling!"

It was like a war-whoop in an Indian camp, for just at the same moment three neighboring playmates knocked at the back door, and immediately there burst in upon us such a chattering and laughing and bouncing about, that fairyland was transformed into Babel until the merry hearts and lively bodies were fairly gone. And then it was only transferred from the fireside within to the snow-drifts without, while I at my window must needs drop my sewing sometimes for a good laugh with the snow-ballers, when, at some special feat, they claimed the applause of their audience of one. NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Princeton, Ill.—Dr. Thomas has been raising a tempest in this town. He spoke some weeks ago under the auspices of the Sunday Circle, in the largest hall in town. He spoke on the religious issues of the day, and greatly roused the opposition of the existing churches, and they have been holding union meetings, answering the Doctor over their pulpits and through the press. The Bureau County Tribune thus contrasts and characterizes the two disputants and their arguments: "The one was calm, placid and persuasive. The other was eager, determined and authoritative. The one unfolded a faith which, as he voiced it, came to waiting ears like the music of sweet bells rung afar off; came to waiting hearts like gentle showers to tilled fields; came as the balmy breath of spring to the thinly clad; came as the gentle warmth of the rising May sun, which floods the brown earth with glorious light, kisses her into radiant smiles and quickens her dormant energies into such vigorous life that in the wealth of her joy and gratitude she arrays herself like a bride for the nuptials, clothes herself with brightest verdure and adorns her bosom with perfumed blossoms whose sweet odor is even like unto the sanctity of the Most High; while Nature's children, the sweet songsters of the wood, warble the glad songs God Himself taught them; and beauteous Nature, with laughing brook and swelling buds, and the voices of her myriad creatures tuned to joy, proclaims the loving reign of a benign, unchanging and unchangeable God, whose surpassing power, majesty and glory all the writers of Scripture and the fathers of the church knew not of, nor conceived of, more than could he, who imprisoned from childhood, could conceive of earth from the bare hillside which he daily gazed at through one small window. The other defended a faith. He represented not only Protestant orthodoxy, but particularly in his own person a peculiar faith. And there was something in the manner, something in the method, something about it all—possibly a heat begot of zeal—which carried to many a suggestion of a nearly spent wave from that hot place which they of the faith would not have cooled,—a faith which, to unfold to millions of sensitive human hearts and yearning human souls, is like casting a yet darker shadow upon the blackness of a starless night. It comes with no smile of greeting, has no song of joy, no caressing hand for the aching brow, no soothing word for the bleeding heart, no tidings of cheer for the despairing soul—but it opens the door from your dungeon to the gibbet." Let the good Doctor's missionary work go on!

Chicago.—Rev. Francis Tiffany, author of "Bird-Bolts," and known among many as "a friend of those who would live in the spirit," enlivened UNITY office with his welcome presence on Friday last. He was en route to the east from Minneapolis, where he has been lecturing on art, tobogganing and defying the thermometer at 42° below zero. UNITY will always give Mr. Tiffany hearty welcome to the west.

—At the Union Teachers' Meeting, Monday noon, Mr. Jones was leader. He said that a tabular statement, like a table of contents, made of the last chapters of Luke treated in our lessons, or of any chapters, will show how the gospels came to be—the matter is so fine, but the connection so loose. As a mere biography, the book could hardly be worse done, the arrangement more disorderly or disjointed. But if we regard it as a final deposit of floating material sifted through tradition of forty years, and colored all the time by the local conditions, then we should expect it to be just what it is. All the matter is pertinent. For example, the miracles seem no longer either credibilities or intrusions, but legitimate portions of the narrative, to be expected from the time and manner of the formation of the book. Then we begin to understand their meaning and value. This is the way in which we should bring them before the children. In this lesson, chapter xii, Jesus acknowledges, and faces squarely the issue between him and the clannish (Pharisaic) Judaism, and warns his friends that it means trouble, opposition, perhaps loss and suffering. As to the sin against the Holy Ghost, Mr. Jones explained it as meaning an unfaithfulness to our own higher thoughts; but Mr. Utter said it was a thought that grew, after Jesus' time, out of the anxiety of the disciples to have the miracles credited, and so they denounced it as blasphemy when any one ascribed the wonders to any evil power and denied them as works of divine goodness.

—The Chicago Women's Unitarian Association met on Thursday, January 26, at the Church of the Messiah, the president, Mrs. E. W. Conger, in the chair. After the minutes of the last meeting had been read and approved, Mrs. J. L. Jones gave her usual racy report of current religious events for the month. Mrs. Marean, secretary of the Ramabai Circle, reported the completion of the National Ramabai Association, in Boston, Rev. E. E. Hale, of Boston, president. The co-operation of several native Hindoo gentlemen in India has been secured, and the prospect for the Ramabai school for high caste Hindoo widows seems most encouraging. Mrs. Caroline Brown spoke for The Woman's Protective Agency, and asked for the help and co-operation of all good women in the work of caring for the unprotected and helping the helpless. Mrs. G. F. Shears then read an ab'e paper on "The Wages of Sin," as seen from the physician's point of view. A spirited discussion followed, in which Mrs. George F. Bartlett, Mrs. Ware, Mrs. E. T. Leonard, Mrs. W. C. Gannett, Mrs. C. P. Woolley, Mrs. E. W. Galvin and others took part. The association adjourned to meet on the last Thursday of February at the Third church.

L. E.

The Liberal Revival.—On Wednesday evening last, Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones filled the pulpit in the church of the Redeemer (West Side Universalist) at the request of the pastor, and delivered an earnest and telling message, of which we should speak fully, but that we fear our word might be suppressed by UNITY's senior editor. The audience was attentive, and we could not but wonder if the speaker realized how splendid the opportunity for dissemination of liberal thought. For these revival audiences, strangely enough, have had a strong orthodox constituency, and we feel sure that Mr. Jones' forcible illustrations have, as it were, nailed some of those liberal views, so that they will not out of the mental tissue. G.

Geneva, Ill.—Revs. J. L. Jones and John R. Effinger were present on Wednesday evening, February 1, at the ordination service of Rev. Thomas P. Byrnes.

Boston, Mass.—Miss Lucy Wheelock last week gave, at Channing Hall, her last lesson on primary class Sunday-school instruction. Several stranger children, from the childrens' mission, made her illustrative class. Her mode of explaining the parable of the sower by object teaching was original. Six boys and girls stood holding each a flower pot. Pupil No. 1 filled his pot with good loam, but neglected to plant any good seed. No. 2 had good loam, and planted a pebble. No. 3 filled his pot with stones, and planted good seed. No. 4 had hard earth, and placed seeds upon the surface. No. 5 covered his earth and its planted seed with a thick grass sod. No. 6 had good soil and good seed. The audience was fair in numbers, and appreciated Miss Wheelock's suggestion to make Sunday-school lessons, first distinct, second emphatic.

—Warren Street Chapel.—Rev. Chas. I. Barnard's model Sunday-school and church will hold its fifty-second annual meeting next Sunday.

Japan.—Rev. A. M. Knapp, the missionary of the American Unitarian Association, has arrived at his destination. In a letter to the Register he describes his voyage thither, in which he speaks of twenty other "sky pilots," missionaries like himself, going hither to preach their gospel. He says: "It has been reserved for your representative, at this relatively late date in his life, after travel in many lands and after varied intercourse with human kind, to meet here, for the first time, with ministers of the gospel who really believe in the message of despair, who actually preach the power of death as the mightiest in the universe, and who in their blind veneration for the letter of the Scripture refuse to put their trust in either God or man."

Denver, Col.—Unity church has published an annual containing an interesting historical sketch of the church, a description of the new church, its present activities, and a list of the officers and members of the parish. It is one of the handy tools of the modern church. It contains a portrait of the pastor, and a picture of the new building. With characteristic American shrewdness the annual is turned into financial profit, doubtless, by interleaving it with local advertisements; but we hope that few churches will be induced to follow this example. Not but that this is a good way of doing it, but the other seems to us a better way.

Beware of Scrofula

Scrofula is probably more general than any other disease. It is insidious in character, and manifests itself in running sores, pustular eruptions, boils, swellings, enlarged joints, abscesses, sore eyes, etc. Hood's Sarsaparilla expels all trace of scrofula from the blood, leaving it pure, enriched, and healthy.

"I was severely afflicted with scrofula, and over a year had two running sores on my neck. Took five bottles Hood's Sarsaparilla, and am cured." C. E. LOVEJOY, Lowell, Mass.

C. A. Arnold, Arnold, Me., had scrofulous sores for seven years, spring and fall. Hood's Sarsaparilla cured him.

Salt Rheum

Is one of the most disagreeable diseases caused by impure blood. It is readily cured by Hood's Sarsaparilla, the great blood purifier.

William Spies, Elyria, O., suffered greatly from erysipelas and salt rheum, caused by handling tobacco. At times his hands would crack open and bleed. He tried various preparations without aid; finally took Hood's Sarsaparilla, and now says: "I am entirely well."

"My son had salt rheum on his hands and on the calves of his legs. He took Hood's Sarsaparilla and is entirely cured." J. B. Stanton, Mt. Vernon, Ohio.

UNION TEACHERS' MEETING at the Channing Club room, 175 Dearborn street, Monday, Feb. 6, at noon. Rev. Mr. Utter will lead.

There is more experience, time and brain work represented in the preparation of Hood's Sarsaparilla than in any other medicine. It is this which makes Hood's Sarsaparilla peculiar.

Hood's Household Calendar for 1888 is received, and, as usual, it leads in beauty and style. The most taking feature about it, because it is unique in Calendars, is that it is cut-out, as if by hand, and the bright, healthy face of a handsome young girl, with a wealth of brown hair, contrasts beautifully with her blue bonnet and strings. Every home should have Hood's Calendar for '88; for it is so handsome an ornament that it makes a room seem more cheerful, while for convenient arrangement of condensed information it is not surpassed. Copies may be had at the druggists, or by sending six cents in stamps to C. I. Hood & Co., Lowell, Mass.

An Extended Popularity.—Brown's BRONCHIAL TROCHES have been before the public many years. For relieving Coughs, Colds, and Throat Diseases they have been proved reliable. Sold only in boxes.

THE DECAY OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, by Rev J. C. F. Grumbine, of Syracuse, is characterized by the New York World as a powerful sermon. It criticises the failure of the church to grapple with social problems, and offers some practical suggestions. Price, by mail to any address, 15 cents. Charles H. Kerr & Co., publishers, Chicago.

For Rickets, Marasmus, and all Wasting Disorders of Children.

Scott's Emulsion of Pure Cod Liver Oil, with Hypophosphites, is unequalled. The rapidity with which children gain flesh and strength upon it is very wonderful. "I have used Scott's Emulsion in cases of Rickets and Marasmus of long standing. In every case the improvement was marked."—J. M. MAIN, M. D., New York.

$10 REAL VALUE FREE!

Our new stamping outfit is free to every reader of this publication; it contains 100 perforated stamping patterns and includes a great variety of all sizes that are wanted. This outfit is a real work of art; no stamping outfit has ever been offered heretofore, on which anything like so much artistic ability was brought to bear. With each outfit is a BOX OF BEST STAMPING POWDER, PAD, AND BOOK OF INSTRUCTIONS, giving full directions for stamping, tells how to make the powder and stamping paint, contains instructions for Lettering, Kensington and Hand painting, tells colors to use in painting—red, white, blue, yellow, pink and other colors; also contains hints and instructions on other matters, too numerous to mention. Bought singly, or a few patterns at a time, at usual prices, the equal of the above would cost $11.00. Although it is free, yet this is the Regal Queen of Stamping Outfits and on every hand is acknowledged to be superior, yes, very much superior, and very much more desirable than those which have been selling for $2.10 each and upwards. By having 2000,000 of these outfits made for us, during the dull season, we get them at first cost; the manufacturer was glad to take the order, at cost, that his help might be kept at work. All may depend that it is the very best, most artistic and in every way desirable outfit ever put before the public. For a paper (monthly), 16 large pages, 64 long columns, 64 long columns (monthly), 16 large pages, 64 long columns, regular price 75 cents a year) is the best general agricultural, housekeeping and family journal in America; it is entertaining and of greatest interest, as well as useful; its contributors embrace the widest range of brilliant talent. We have lately become managing owners of that grand monthly, Sunshine, for youth and all those of all ages whose hearts are not withered; 16 large pages, 64 long columns, regular price 75 cents a year. Sunshine is known favorably as the best youth's monthly in America. The best writers for youth, in the world, are regular contributors; it is now quoted all over the world as standard for the best. Both papers are splendidly illustrated by the best artists. We will take 200,000 trial year subscribers at a price which gives us but a moderate portion of the cost.

FREE! 100 pattern Stamping Outfit. Trial year subscriptions will be received for either of the papers as follows: 1 subscription and 1 outfit, 25 cents; 2 subscriptions and 1 outfit, if sent at one time, $1.00; 3 subscriptions and 1 outfit, if sent at one time, $1.10. For $1 sent a dollar bill, but for less, send 1-cent postage stamps. Better at once get three friends to join you, at 25 cents each; you can do it in a few minutes and they will thank you; papers will be mailed regularly to their respective addresses. While trial year subscribers are so served for much less than cost, it is the rule that a very large proportion of all who read either paper for a year, want it thereafter, and are willing to pay the regular price of 75 cents a year; through this, as time rolls on, we reap a profit that satisfies us. The trial year subscriptions are almost free, and this is the Regal Queen of Stamping Outfits—the best ever known—is entirely free.

It is the greatest and best offer ever made to the public. Large sizes of patterns—every size that can be desired is included; 100 other outfits surpassed, by this, the best, the most artistic, the Regal Queen. Below we give a list of a few of the patterns; space is too valuable to admit of naming all: 1 Popples for Scarf, 7 1-2 inch; 2 Tidy design, 7 1-2 inch; 3 Splendid Tinsel design, 8 inch; 4 Golden Rod, 4 inch; 5 Pond Lilies, 6 Fan-leaf; 7 Moss Rose Buds; 8 Tube Rose; 9 Wheel; 10 Oak Leaves; 11 Maiden Hair Ferns; 12 Boy; 13 Girl's Head; 14 Bird; 15 Strawberries; 16 Owl; 17 Dog; 18 Butterfly; 19 Apple Blossoms; 20 Calla Lily; 21 Anchor; 22 Morning Glories; 23 Japanese Lilies; 24 Rabbit; 25 Bunch Forget-me-nots; 26 Fuchsia; 27 Bell Drops; 28 Fan; 29 Clown's Head; 30 Cat's Head. 709 other splendid patterns are included in this Regal Queen of Stamping Outfits—all 100 patterns. Safe delivery guaranteed. Possessing this outfit any lady can, without expense, make home beautiful in many ways, can embroider children and ladies' clothing in the most charming manner, and make money by doing so. Lettering, Kensington and Hand painting for others. A good stamping outfit is indispensable to every woman who cares to make home beautiful. This outfit contains patterns for each and every branch of needle work, flower painting, etc., and the Book of Instructions makes all clear and really easy. This outfit will do more for HOME and LADIES than many times the amount of a trial year subscription spent otherwise; no home should be without it. The beautiful designs of this REGAL QUEEN OF OUTFITS ARE ALL THE RAGE wherever seen; when ever one or two reach a locality their fame spreads, and many TRIAL YEAR subscriptions usually follow. Many who have paid from $1 to $25 for outfits and were satisfied until they saw our designs, have secured our outfit and laid aside forever the others. Those who subscribe will find the papers well worth the trifling cost of a trial year subscription, and the majority will make up to us the loss, that year we incur, through such a low price, by continuing subscribers, year after year, at the regular price, which all will be willing to admit is low enough. The money will gladly be refunded to any one who is not fully satisfied.

LOVE AND THEOLOGY.

A Novel. By CELIA PARKER WOOLLEY.

1 vol., 12mo. $1.50.

"It is not only entertaining, but interesting from the highest point of view. It goes on from chapter to chapter with ever-increasing force and power. No book of fiction that Ticknor & Co. have published has had, to my thinking, the depth and value of this, and nowhere have the present study and questioning of theological subjects been more clearly and satisfactorily presented; for, in all this presentation, there is not a hint of irreverence or flippancy of any kind. There is, instead, a very beautiful presentation of the very best interpretation of the liberal thoughts of to-day,—an interpretation that contains the highest spirituality. Herein is the book of great value; and that it will be reckoned among the books that will be of service to all intelligent inquirers I have no doubt. It is, I should say most decidedly, a book to own, and not to merely read for amusement only, and then to throw aside; and thus for the characterization as well as the presentation of the new interpretations of the Bible, etc. This characterization is exceedingly well done, showing no effort, but a natural gift of character-painting. The dialogue is something more than mere made-up talk, and the reflective portion contains philosophy of the most cultivated kind; and this, of course, includes the fact that this philosophy is free of narrow and vulgar self-assertion."—Nova Perry. Mailed, on receipt of price, by CHARLES H. THE EVOLUTION OF IMMORTALITY.

The reception of this book among both writers and buyers continues to be most favorable. We give this week by permission an extract from a letter to the author of the book, Dr. C. T. Stockwell, by Mr. George S. Merriam: "I am sincerely glad you have written and published the book. It seems to me a remarkably lucid exposition of a very rich and various line of thought. I found the perusal to be very invigorating to the mind, very fertile in suggestion, and carrying in its whole impression, a strong appeal to one's best sense of reality. The thoughts are very clearly expressed; the style is direct, and fit to the subject; the temper is reverent and religious, and the arguments very suggestive. You have not claimed for them a high demonstrative force—nor do I believe the idea of immortality admits of such—but in the line of analogy, possibility, suggestion, your views seem to me to carry much weight. It is a striking manifestation of a new approach to the old problems; and I think it is in an unusual degree helpful and stimulating. One of the features I like most is the insistence on the immortal quality—not a mere continuance, but a noble stage, to be entered upon even here."

The price of this book is one dollar. We regard it as worth the money, and have no intention of making any reduction.

But we are anxious to add a thousand names to the subscription list of UNITY before March 1, the beginning of a new volume, and therefore we wish to offer our friends a sufficient inducement to help us bring this about.

It has been urged on us that a dollar offer is the most attractive to those who order by mail, on account of the convenience of slipping a dollar bill into a letter instead of taking the trouble to procure a bank draft or postal order. We shall be glad to test this theory, and therefore make the following offer:

Send us one dollar, with the name of a new subscriber to UNITY for eight months, and we will send a copy of "The Evolution of Immortality," free by mail. If you can induce a friend to subscribe, the book will cost you nothing. If not, you can get the book at the regular price, and make some one a present of UNITY without further outlay.

This advertisement will meet the eyes of some who are not subscribers. If any such will send one dollar with his own subscription for eight months, we will send the book as before described.

The foregoing offer applies only to new subscriptions, not to renewals. But if any subscriber not in arrears will send us his renewal for a year with $1.50, and 50 cents additional, or $2.00 in all, we will send a copy of the book.

These offers hold good until March 1.

EDITORIAL.

HE is a poor advocate of Christianity who seeks to advance its interest by obliterating moral distinctions and ignoring or apologizing for unscrupulous standards.

A CORRESPONDENT asks us to explain our meaning of the word "supernaturalism." Far removed from our thought is that which seeks to resolve all the phenomena of life to the terms of matter. We believe in the sovereignty of law in spirit as in physics, and find no room for miracle in the sense of interference with the methods of God, the uniformity of law.

"Out of the heart of Nature rolled
The burdens of the Bible old."

It tells the secret of a life, this "sentence" which shall follow, and we pass it on to spring up like seed in other "expense-books" and albums and Bibles and memories and lives, and perhaps in some society somewhere that will adopt it as their motto and call themselves the "Postponers." But it must be a secret society. The letter that brought it said, "This sentence was written in dear Aunt Hannah's expense-book, and her sister sends it to you with her love :

To postpone my own pleasure to others' convenience,
My own convenience to others' comfort,
My own comfort to others' want,
And my own want to others' extreme need.

A VENERABLE subscriber of UNITY kindly writes us this week that he must drop UNITY in order to avoid "mental disturbance." "Not because," he says, "I find fault with its theology based on its broad Christian foundation—I am a Unitarian in its most liberal sense—but because it coquettes with the isms of the day,—questions of socialism, woman's suffrage, taxation and so forth." We are very sorry to part company with any kindly, old-time reader, but we are ready to plead guilty, not of coquetting, but of directly, honestly courting such an acquaintance with the isms of the day as will enable us in some poor fashion to contribute our mite towards solving the problems of the day. We have no social panacea to offer and no hobby to ride, but we do believe profoundly that there are wrongs yet to right, and that this last quarter of the 19th century is "about the Father's business" when it is wrestling with these wrongs and groping for these rights. In social and political matters, as in theological and religious matters, we believe the open position, the forward look, the unbarred gate to be the true one.

Two new tracts are ready in the UNITY SHORT TRACT series. No. 18 is the "Ministry of Sorrow," by Rev. Joseph May, of Philadelphia,—a sermon printed in the Unitarian a few months ago. In that form it attracted the attention of one of the earnest Post-Office Mission workers at the east, and by her request and help it enters our band of pamphlet messengers. She wrote, "Before moving in the matter, I tested the worth of the sermon by sending it to two friends. I was sure it would go to the hearts of those who have accepted sorrow, but it is those who rebel for whom I have the most solicitude, those who have never dreamed that sorrow has a 'ministry.' One of the two to whom I sent it wrote, 'It is truly the best I have ever seen, and should be kept near, and read often to help to keep one aright.'" The other new tract, No. 19, is the sermon lately printed in UNITY by John C. Learned, on "Religion not Theology." It is really a word concerning revivals, and will be useful in neighborhoods that in "getting religion" are forgetting reason and charity and moral discernment. The price of each tract is one cent ; 60 cents per hundred copies.

MR. SALTER spoke last Sunday at the Grand Opera House, in this city, on the evils of child labor. Of this iniquity across the seas, in European coal mines, or even in New England cotton mills, there is some vague general intelligence ; but when he brings it home to Chicago, and speaks of things right here among well known business houses, it makes us gasp and makes us ashamed of ourselves. There is no class of business men in this city who are probably making more rapid strides to wealth and the respectable position which wealth brings, than the retail dry goods men ; and still, of these men and their business, Mr. Salter makes the following terrible arraignment : "Do you know the system of fines in the retail shops? In one of them there are sixty floor-walkers, whose business is not so much to detect shop-lifters as to maintain the system of espionage upon the employees. A child is fined from 5 to 20 cents for talking, or laughing, or yielding a moment to the weariness and languor that are forever weighing the young spirit down ; and it has even been stated that the floor-walkers are expected to impose fines sufficient to make up the amount of their weekly salaries, so as to cost their employers nothing. A girl was fined for accidentally creaking a door, another was fined 50 cents for breaking a mirror that sold for 35 cents. These facts are mere illustrations of a system. Women and children are the victims of this espionage. You will not find that fines are imposed upon men. Why not? Why are strong men exempt from this persecution? Because they will not stand it. The system is really a mere money-making device to wring a few pennies from those who are too weak to resist."

A CORRESPONDENT of the Register is much alarmed lest the Unity Clubs, devoted as they are to sincere study and to the finding of fellowship on the high grounds of human thought and feeling, as expressed in the noblest outcome of the human soul, as found in literature, art, science, history and religion, should kill Unitarian churches. Over every church thus deceased let it be written, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord." They are better in their graves than above ground. Alas, for the spiritual life that is afraid of the product of the spirit ! This correspondent instances in proof of this suicidal theory the case of "a young man of high ability and of noble consecration who has been repelled from our ministry and led to accept a settlement in the orthodox body, largely because one of our ministers told him in all seriousness that skill in the management of reading clubs was essential to the work of our ministry." [The italics are ours.] We suspect that young man has gone to the right place. We have known a great many ministers who have concluded to remain in orthodox harness upon being told that, other things being equal, the salary of a Unitarian minister was less and the opportunity of work more precarious. Only those who find a sublime necessity laid upon their souls to present the problems of life, death and eternity, the thought of God, man and duty to their fellow-beings in a way and from a stand-point that no honest soul can in an orthodox pulpit, will find a congenial place among Unitarian workers. The difference between the Unitarian position and that of the orthodox is not a difference concerning bands and buttons, but a difference fundamental and soul-searching,—a difference that makes a difference of methods a joyous necessity, a splendid life-forming and heart-warming privilege.

WE never saw a portrait of Jesus which embodied what we conceive him to be, as the Gospels portray him. In the great painting of Muncacksy, which Mr. Wanamaker purchased for $125,000, the face of Christ is that of a fanatic. But look at the image the Gospels give us of him. He was not as John, an ascetic, but came eating and drinking, was often at the feast, and took part in the social festivities. He was, moreover, capable of a great anger, taking a whip of cords, and driving the money-changers out of the temple. His "I say unto you" shows a strong, positive nature, yet Christ is painted with attenuated form, womanly face, with ethereal, unearthly look. But as he is seen in all the Gospels, there is something strong, rugged, even brusque about him. We would paint him broad of brow, broad of breast, large of hand,—a granite pillar covered with roses. To us in his personality he seems born to command, strong of intellect, large in moral genius—a being of kingly power, but who used all that power for mothering and serving. Born to rule, he walked this earth with kingly tread, yet never crushed a "flower or a poor human heart." So we look upon him who is called the gentle Nazarene as large natured, of wondrous enthusiasm, a magnificent physique, and a voice like the music of the sea.

J. G. T.

The Study of Art.

Prof. W. T. Harris, who interested so large a constituency at the Dante School, held in this city during holiday week, has been engaged to give a course of five lectures or interpretations of art on consecutive Monday evenings, beginning February 20. Among the pictures to be interpreted are the Madonnas of Holbein, Raphael's Transfiguration, Angelo's Last Judgment, Da Vinci's Last Supper, as well as the masterpieces of sculpture by Angelo and others. Simultaneously with the course here, he is to give the same lectures at Indianapolis, Terre Haute and St. Louis. This is a tempting and much-neglected field for the missionary of culture. Art as an accomplishment, a decoration to wealth and leisurely lives, sooner or later ends in mental debility and affectation, the legitimate fruit of which is the enervating bric-a-brac craze and the Oscar Wildeish languor. Art is intimately related with the highest intellectual life of the race, and cannot be understood except by those touched by intellectual and moral seriousness. Hunt, the artist of whom America is justly proud, said that Michael Angelo was so great that the subsequent generation have furnished no man large enough to interpret him. To understand any great work of art requires far more scientific acquaintance with the antecedents and the environment that produced it than is necessary to the understanding of a great battle; and the picture in turn is a much profounder interpretation of the age that produced it than is the military campaign. The genius of might belongs to the coarser and cruder side of human nature; but the genius of beauty is related to the most subtle and lofty elements of the soul. When our schools will make our children as conversant with the names of great artists and their masterpieces, in all ages, as they now are with the names of generals and their great battles, they will make more intelligent students of history of them, and wiser citizens. To study art in this way implies a stalwart love of truth much more than some nimble finger dexterity which is supposed to reveal the embryonic artist. Indeed, only to the seeker after truth is beauty in its highest combinations disclosed. The great artists had great minds, and they stood solidly upon the earth. The students of these artists must needs bring along all the brains they have, and they must keep their feet upon the ground. We know that there is great temptation under certain philosophic predilections for the interpreter of art as the interpreter of literature to read all creation, including John Smith's brindle cow, into every masterpiece. To yield to this temptation is unscientific and debilitating.

What we want is not rhapsody, but rational appreciation; but this indulgence is not so much to be dreaded as the debilitating removal of art and artists into the realm of luxuries—things to be enjoyed, like silks and satins, if one can afford them.

We trust Mr. Harris's lectures will have large hearings. They ought to be heard not only in the lecture room of the Art Institute, but in the Labor Union halls of Chicago, and by all the upper grammar grades and high school children of our city; and Mr. Harris, and not some lesser mind, is the one needed to carry art to those who must needs walk the labor paths of life. Thus would he enable those who may fail to realize the ideal still to idealize the real.

Is Woman a Unit or a Fraction?

Social evolution has been a steady growth from the simple application of physical force to the subtle recognition of spiritual freedom. The word of the primitive man was "might," the word of the coming man must be "right." The time was, and perhaps still remains when brawn carried or carries regal authority; the hour cometh, perhaps now is, when brain wears or will wear the emblems of royalty. The reign of muscle is gradually developing into the reign of nerve. Thought is now the strongest force in society, and feeling is a better defense of the state than armies. Under the old regime he who could deal the heaviest blow became chief of the clan? Saul was made king because he towered head and shoulders above the others in the camp. Then the most warlike clan became the center of the nation, and the conquered became slaves to the conquerors. Then man wooed woman with a bludgeon. The husband captured his wife as he would a deer, and led her home as he would a horse. Once there her unquestioned duty was to submit. Both law and religion merged what little individuality she may have had as a maiden into that of her husband. She was lost, and became a part of the possessions of her liege and master. All earlier religions thus recognize the dependence of woman upon man. The Mormon faith of to-day, which shuts the gates of Paradise against all women who are not led hither by a man is but a religious anachronism, a curious revival of primitive thought. Our courts and customs are full of such reminiscences; our standing army is a relic of the dreaded king whose prowess was a terror to the neighbors, whose strength was a tyranny to the citizens. Slowly but surely society finds the finer rhythm of the spirit, it grows more plastic to the rights of a soul. In this larger adjustment woman has steadily come forward as an individual character, a separate entity, a self-centered unit in the spiritual commonwealth. The growth of a state may be measured by the scope it grants to woman. Not because woman has any special charm of sanctity, but because it is a recognition by the state of the intangible, the immaterial forces that pertain to spirit rather than to the physical and brutal forces that pertain to matter. History proves what the law of justice would predict, that the most perfect home, the truest state and the most spiritual church are found where man and woman find their equal counterpoise in an individuality equally sacred; a personality equally defined, each possessing spiritual natures committed to the same law, bound by the same standard, judged by the same code. A woman can neither be a slave nor an angel in the domestic relations without marring them. She must be a woman, standing alongside of man, shoulder to shoulder with him. The old ages of chivalry, around which romance and minstrelsy have thrown a false glamour of sentimental light, were ages of coarseness and injustice, because men regarded woman as an elegant attachment, an angelic luxury. Such an estimate generally ended in treating woman after marriage as a slave and chattel. We discard the angel theory of woman, and for the same reason discard the devil theory of man. One is not essentially white, neither is the other essentially black. Women's hands have been capable of all the crimes that masculine cupidity has perpetrated, and on the other hand masculine feet have climbed all the heights of saintliness that woman's spirit has ever graced. Men and women are compounded of the same clay, beset with the same limitations and endowed with the same possibilities, and the highest domestic felicity is found in a frank recognition of these facts.

What is true of the home is true of the state. The state that rests upon the bayonet is either dead or dying; the state resting upon the brain and conscience of the individual has come or is coming in its stead. The state that existed for the governing is well-nigh gone out of the world. Monarchy is but a trinket of state-craft; the realm no longer belongs to the king or the queen, but the king or the queen belong to the realm. Government exists for the governed now. "No taxation without representation" carries with it a far-reaching logic. Wherever there is intelligence, wherever there is conscience, wherever there is the power to direct labor or to conserve the results of labor, there exists, in justice, a factor of government. And these qualities nowhere run parallel to sex lines. Man has achieved fame in no department of life which woman has not by this time penetrated. Even the battle-field has its Boadicea, its Joan of Arc, and its Mother Bickerdyke. John Howard is balanced with Dorothea Dix and Clara Barton. Herschel, the great astronomer, found that his sister Caroline could sweep the skies with a telescope as she would the floor with a broom, and pick up as many new stars in an evening as he could. In the field of political economy, Harriet Martineau taught as men could not, and Harriet Beecher Stowe and Frances Willard have pierced public sins and aroused public conscience, developed the consciousness of state obligations in a way that no man's name outshines them. We make no special claim for woman's sagacity,—no, not even her ethical sense. We do not think in the large estimate it will be found to be much superior to that of man. As Mrs. Poyser says, I think "God Almighty has made the women mostly fools to match the men." But in the name of justice, in the interest of that poise of sex, the rhythm of life, in the name of religion that has endowed men and women with living souls, loaded each with equal responsibilities, we demand the right of citizenship to Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, such as the law already vouchsafes to Jack, the drunken fisherman, of whom she has written so pathetically. We demand, in the name of all fairness, that the municipal privileges and responsibilities which the city of Boston gives to her coachman be granted to Mrs. Mary Hemmaway, one of the most intelligent and munificent philanthropists residing in Boston to-day,—she who spends thousands upon thousands of dollars each year in educating the boys and girls of Boston in the traditions of their country through the Old South historical work; in the economies of the fireside mill, through her cooking school; for the practical exigencies of life through her kitchen garden, industrial and manual school patronages. In the name of our state, and for the love of our beautiful country, we demand that Mary A. Livermore and Frances Willard be called in to help, even as we have called in the help of Fritz, Hans, Pat and Sambo. Our country needs the help of these exalted citizens, and it will not refuse the uplifting right to these humble novitiates from foreign shores.

That country alone can resist the disintegrating forces of time that combines the cohesiveness, that makes a unity of the whole to resist all the invading forces of death and disintegration; and also that elasticity that recognizes the sanctity of the unit, that secures freest play to the complex forces, and greatest encouragement to the new ideas and diverging tendencies. The course of social evolution has been up through the tribal—the confederation—to the national life, that culminates in the individuation of every particular unit in the commonwealth. There is no poise for the state until man grants to woman the privileges vouchsafed by brain that have been denied by brawn, and until woman is willing to accept her share of the serious responsibilities which now too exclusively rest upon the shoulders of man.

But it is urged that the "home and not the individual is the unit of society." This is a sentimental fiction denied by history and unwarranted by science. The home itself is obliterated the moment you ignore the sacred fact that it is made up of units whose rights are inalienable and unquestionable. That the home is the unit of the state, and that man represents that unit, and that woman must be content to shine through him as a candle through a lantern, is a doctrine that belongs to the age of the wigwam, the traveling herd, the harem and the belated Mormon. The doctrine of modern science, as well as the code of the modern state, to say nothing of the demands of spiritual religion, is that the unborn babe has rights which no head of the family can encroach upon with impunity. The daughter has a mind and soul which are as sacred in the presence of the father as they are in the presence of God. The woman, married or unmarried, is, or should be, the arbiter of her own conscience, the administrator of her own property, and the possessor of her own person, and every court in the land will defend her in these rights. In practice, the most conservative woman is ready to claim this right; they that are so willing that their husbands should hold their proxy upon election day do not hesitate upon a Sunday to insist upon the right of attending a church which the husband disapproves of, and they feel aggrieved if he will not accompany them to listen to doctrines he does not believe in. We yield to no one in our regard for the sanctity of the home; but the home is made up of man and woman, neither one of which finds his or her complement until the indestructible, globular quality of soul is recognized. After such recognition the special functions of each will be more nobly fulfilled. There is no need of building fences to keep the chickens out of the water. Nature will take care of her own distinctions, if human nature will demolish the arbitrary ones. From this high ground of equality the mother realizes that the safety of her cradle is dependent upon the purity of the executive mansion; and the father sees that the nation is served by every pair of baby shoes he buys, and that international justice is closely linked with the sweetness of his own fireside.

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

To The Century Plant.

Abide with me !
 Let, now, the years evolve in thee
 A mighty wish to be
 Sweet influence, uplifting good,
 Left with the human brotherhood Eternally.

Thou shalt, thus fraught,
 Climb heavenward like a speeding thought,
 Thine every fiber taught
 To yield itself a sacrifice
 Most joyful, when for human eyes
 A flower is wrought.

Is this the best
 Of all the human race has guessed ?
 What stirs within my breast ?
 What whispers of a life to be,
 A future task laid by for me
 At God's behest ?

A life I miss
 Till in the perfect flower of this
 It takes its root ; to kiss
 Self-sacrifice as pure as thine,
 And find another portion mine
 From time's abyss.

Is't joy or pain?
 The pangs attending growth remain;
 A human soul which fain
 Would bear the woe that God conceives
 For noble ends, on Him believes,
 I must maintain,

And seeks a joy
 God meant should lead it, and employ
 Its natural love; alloy
 Of low desire God may despise,
 Hold to this high self-sacrifice,
 Yet not destroy.

For things there be Harder to bear, sweeter to see
 Than this thou teachest me,
 Else would no dream have reached us here
 Of that which bound our narrow sphere, Infinity.

MINNIE STEBBINS SAVAGE.

The Religion in It.

Dr. McGlynn, in his anti-poverty speeches, never tires of expressing his joy on account of the religion that is in the movement. In this he has the sympathy of thousands, among them many who had been atheists, and who have had a father in heaven revealed to them first through "Georgeism." Where would one naturally have looked for the most practical exposition of the doctrine of "the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man?" As I read the glowing words of an excommunicated Catholic priest in explanation and application of the Lord's prayer, the Sermon on the Mount, and the Declaration of Independence, while professed liberal Christians turn a deaf ear to his theme, this text comes to mind: "He came to his own, and his own received him not." But they will. Some of them are only looking too high on the mountain tops for the sunrise.

Those of us who must believe in a good God or in none at all, would long ago have become atheists had not our trust in God's goodness far exceeded our actual knowledge. How glad we are to find a farther justification of this "larger hope" in the new land doctrine! To be able to see that God is really wiser, and better than the condition of human affairs has made him appear to be; to know that "on earth as in heaven" his will may be done and his kingdom may come so that every child born into this earthly life may at the very gate of birth find conditions that make possible to it, in a full, glad sense, "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

I know of no more clear teaching of the doctrine of the equal "right of all to the use of the earth" than is found in the ninth chapter of Herbert Spencer's "Social Statics." That in itself is not Georgeism, though it is the foundation principle—that the ownership of the earth by individuals is wrong, since all have an equal right to its use. This is admitted by many who can see no way out of the present conditions. Evidently it would never do to parcel out the land among any set of "present inhabitants," thus defrauding other generations. And then some situations are much more desirable, and so more valuable than others. All do not want land, even to build on, to say nothing of cultivating it. Yet there is a way of equalizing the land privilege, of giving each one his or her share of the common estate—our earth. It is no patent remedy for a disease that Mr. George offers. He has discovered a great wrong, a deep injustice at the foundation of our human relations, and he simply says, "Cease to do evil, and learn to do well." That is the religion that is in it. In other words, "What doth the Lord require of thee but to deal justly, love mercy and walk humbly?"

What gives money value to land? Take any city lot which has never been improved—is it not the growth and enterprise of the whole population that causes its rise in value?

Does it make any difference in the increase whether the owner is lazy or industrious, whether he is intemperate or not? To the public which created that rise in value, the "unearned increment" belongs. The man who "owns" it may have invested his last dollar in its purchase, like the "poor widow" who, a generation ago, was supposed to have her little all invested in a few slaves. The proclamation of emancipation took away the widow's slaves, giving her no recompense. The George theory takes no man's land from him, nor even requires of him restitution for the land values he has already drawn as rent or as increase in value from our common estate. It only puts an end to the taking of the state's natural revenue by private individuals. Let the man (every man and woman) keep his land if he wishes to,—keep it and use it and pay the public for the privilege. He cannot afford to keep it unless he does use it in some way, so as to get back the price of the ground rent, or land value tax which he will be required to put into the public treasury. Those who have the best situations—business lots, water fronts, fine views, mines or valuable wells—must pay for their extra privileges. Thus it will happen that the land value tax on a single city business lot will often exceed the tax on a large and valuable farm. The national W. C. T. U., under competent advice, does not hesitate to promise a yearly rent of $35,000 for the piece of land upon which it proposes to build a temperance temple. Suppose that all these rentals went into the public treasury instead of into private pockets. It might cause many to work for a living who now live in idleness upon the labor of others; but what might not that treasury do for them as a part of the public, and for us all? Could not the necessary expenses of government be met by the tax on land value alone? Think what a lessening of government expenses that change would make!

In the natural rise of land values wherever population increases and improves, we see now, with reverent delight, a most beautiful provision for the increasing needs of a growing population. This is the natural revenue of the state, a simple tax on the value of land without reference to its improvements; or ground rent from those who use the land which is our common inheritance.

That is all there is of the famous land doctrine—that every one may use the land, but no one may own it; that all who do use it shall pay for the privilege, if the land they use has acquired a money value because of the scarcity of that particular kind of situation or privilege; and the revenue from this source is supposed to be so ample and so sure and safe that all taxes on products and improvements can be dropped; the state need no longer "confiscate" private property to make good its loss from the stealings of individuals. Land may no longer be considered private property; only that which is produced by labor of hand or brain is private property, and the public has no right to take that by taxation (often ruining some business or discouraging improvements by the tax on industry and enterprise), unless in some emergency it may need more than its natural revenue from land values, and so vote further contributions from us, the people.

This change in the method of taxation is not all that Mr. George advocates in the way of reform; but it is the first step, the one without which no other reform can avail much, but which, once accomplished, makes every other step far more easy and effectual than without it.

The change of taxation may cause temporary hardship to a minority, while greatly lightening the "doom of the majority" in this world. But all must profit by the great improvement in the general welfare. Speculators will drop great quantities of land now held "for a rise," and much land easy of access, now lying idle, can be taken for homes and shops and for tillage, giving work to the unemployed, and causing a natural rise of wages as the crowd of those who must work for almost nothing or starve grows less. With taxes removed from products and improvements, food, and clothing and utensils will grow cheaper. The terrible strain upon the nerves of those who are in the race for wealth, or clinging to the ragged edge of poverty, liable at any time to get "out of work" and slip into the abyss where an increasing number suffer in hopeless wretchedness—this strain will be greatly relieved, and rich and poor alike will have less craving for stimulants, more of that wholesome rest of body and mind which health requires.

No one knows what the public fund from land values will give us,—perhaps light and heat in all our houses, free galleries and libraries and gymnasiums and baths and free transportation. Eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive, the beautiful co-operation that may result, when we have realized the fact that Our Father has given our planet for the use and blessing of our whole human brotherhood, that here on earth his will may be done as it is in heaven.

THE UNITY CLUB.

The Trial and Death of Socrates.

OUTLINE STUDIES FOR FOUR EVENINGS.

The "Apology," the "Crito," and the "Phædo" are the three dialogues of Plato to be studied. The first purports to be Socrates' defense, when tried for his life on the charges of impiety and corrupting the youth; the second is an account of his refusal to escape from prison after sentence of death had been pronounced; the third is a conversation concerning immortality, said to have been held with his friends in the prison on the last day of his life.

Each member of the class is supposed to read each dialogue at home before the evening spent together on it. Miss Mason's "Socrates," an admirable translation of the three dialogues (the less important parts of the "Phædo" being omitted), with introductions and notes, is the best and cheapest textbook for the class. (Charles Scribner's Sons: New York. Price, 50 cents.) The introductions should be carefully read, if no other aids are used. F. J. Church's "Trial and Death of Socrates" contains the same three dialogues, with the "Euthyphron" (concerning "Piety") added, and a good introductory essay. (Macmillan & Co.: New York. $1.25.) Professor Jowett's is the standard English translation of Plato; its first volume contains the dialogues we need, each with its introduction and analysis. (Four volumes, $8.00. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.)

But to come face to face with Socrates, two other portraits from his own time must be studied, namely, Xenophon's "Memorabilia," a more authentic picture of the master than Plato's (read, at least, Book I., and the closing chapter of Book IV., for these concern the trial); and the "Clouds" of Aristophanes, the burlesque played in the theater of Athens, 423 B. C. The latter is a very humorous caricature, which uses Socrates's well-known figure as type of all the derided philosophers and sophists of his day. Read, also, Miss Mason's second book, "A Day with Socrates in Athens," containing parts of the "Protagoras" and "Republic," to get "one of the most vivid pictures which have come down to us of the age in which Socrates and Plato lived and taught."

Any good history of Greece will give the time-and-place frame; and any general history of philosophy, like Überweg's or Lewes's will have its tribute to, and criticism of, the method and the influence of Socrates. Among the most careful is Zeller's "Socrates and the Socratic Schools."

Helpful essays:—Grote's "History of Greece," volume VIII., chapter 67, defending the "Sophists;" and chapter 68, on Socrates. The latter chapter is by all means to be read. See also Grote's large work on Plato; Blackie's "Four Phases of Morals," chapter 1; Church's introductory essay, already mentioned; Stanley's "History of the Jewish Church," volume III., chapter 46,—picturesque and suggestive. Socrates and Jesus are compared in this chapter by Stanley, in the North American Review for January, 1885; and in the Unitarian Review, volume II., 1874.

The programmes that follow will be found to crowd a two-hours' meeting, unless the "papers" be each but ten to twenty minutes long; the "discussions" do little more than open subjects, grow interesting, and pass resolutely onwards, and the whole conduct of the meetings be crisp and brisk. A leader who will keep talk to the point, keep it moving, and keep it general, is almost essential; but it is no bad plan in Unity Club work to train leaders to do all this by throwing the responsibility of doing it successfully on different members in turn. Where longer papers and more thorough discussions are preferred, it would be better to omit part of the programmes, or make each one serve for two evenings. But this, if done, should be done by deliberate plan beforehand, not driftingly.

FIRST EVENING—THE "APOLOGY" OF SOCRATES.

"Athenians, I love and cherish you, but I shall obey the God rather than you."

"A life without cross-examination is not life at all."

"There can no evil befall a good man, whether he be alive or dead."

(1) Great Words. A round-the-class exercise; each one give from memory the noblest sentence that he finds in the "Apology."

(2) Paper. "Athens in the Day of Socrates."

The place-and-time frame.—The wonderful city in the wonderful century. The war of uplift. The age of Pericles,—democracy, drama, art. The war of ruin. Describe the city. Show pictures, if possible.

(3) Notes and Queries. Short oral explanations of

(a) Allusions to the Athenian Democracy; for instance, the citizens as distinguished from the other residents and the slaves: the Assembly; the Senate; the General Court; the Eleven; the Prytaneum, etc.

(b) The Greek Oracles.

(4) Paper. "Greek Philosophy before Socrates, and the Sophists of his Day."

The thought-frame.—(a) Decay of the myths. Rise of philosophy with its problem of the One in the Many. How the Physicists, the Pythagoreans, the Ontologists, the Atomists, severally answered that problem. What Socrates, the "philosopher of the market place," said to it. (b) Early Greek idea of education. Effect of democracy upon it. The new Rhetoric and Dialectics. Rise of the Sophists. What were they? Is their bad repute deserved? Socrates's relations to them: was he one of them, or one against them?

(5) Discussion.

(a) Socrates's character, as shown by the "Apology:" suppose nothing were known of him but this defense, what qualities would we sum up as "Socrates?" Was Socrates a "Christian?"

(In reading the three dialogues at home, note down passages akin to Bible passages, for use on the fourth evening.)

(b) Socrates's "dæmon:" what was it,—guardian spirit, Quaker light, or what? Anything like it in your experience.

(c) Socrates's religious belief: was it a belief in the "gods," or in God, or in both? Was his teaching dangerous to the popular faith? (Plato's would-be banishment of the poets as myth-makers: see his "Republic," Books II, III, X.) In our day, is there any similar distinction between the faith of the people and that of the "philosophers?" In such cases is the one faith "true," and the other faith "false?"

(d) Socrates's test of wisdom, and his method of applying the test: would he find to-day the same "conceit of knowledge without the reality" among the same classes? How would it be among our theologians? And how would such a "gad-fly sent of God" to-day fare at our hands? What class of men would give him the best welcome?

SECOND EVENING—"CRITO."

"It is not mere living which should be valued above everything else, but living a good life."

(1.) Great Words. The noblest sentence in the "Crito," around-the-class from memory exercise.

(2.) Paper. "A Day in Athens with Socrates."

A sketch of his life, looks and ways. Follow him round among the streets and shops. (See the "Memorabilia," and Miss Mason's second volume named above.)

After-talk.—Would you know him if you met him? And would he nettle you or charm you? Each one imagine his neighbor's pet ideas cross-questioned by the Great Examiner.

(3.) Paper. "The Three Socrates,—Aristophanes's, Xenophon's and Plato's."

The two described. Which is the real Socrates,—Xenophon's or Plato's? Compare the Jesus of the first three Gospels and the Jesus of John's Gospel. How account for such differences? The ancient custom of pseudonymy; and its ethics.

After-talk.—What is an "historic" character? A Master's three-fold personality,—the actual man, the disciples' man, the man of later reverence or obloquy.

(4.) Paper. "The Apology of Xanthippe."

"As curst and shrewd as Socrates's Xanthippe,"—says Shakespeare; but give her side of the matter: Imagine Socrates at home.

(5.) Discussion. Some one introduce it with a word about the Greek Citizen's relation to his State. Then—

(a) What does "Higher Law" mean? Its relation to the State's Law? If they conflict, which should the individual obey? Is the State right in enforcing its law? How, usually, are bad laws made better?

(b) Was Socrates right, in the "Apology," in refusing to obey the Athenian people? Was he right, in the "Crito" question, in refusing to disobey the laws? Were the two refusals consistent with each other? Was the verdict of the Court just or unjust? How would you have voted?

Compare American fugitive-slave laws; English marriage laws; laws against freedom of speech, press, religion; anti-anarchist laws. W. C. G.

THE STUDY TABLE.

A NEW window has just been erected in St. Margaret's, Westminster, in honor of the Queen's jubilee, for which Browning wrote the following verse:

"Fifty years' flight!" Wherein should he rejoice
Who hailed their birth, who as they die decays?
This—England echoes his attesting voice:—
Wondrous and well—Thanks, Ancient Thou of days."

This suggests certain other lines of this poet, not included in the otherwise excellent and beautiful American edition of Robert Browning's poems recently published by the Houghton Mifflin House, of Boston. We print below the omitted lines with the suggestion that those possessing the above named "complete edition," should make it still more complete by pasting in it these omitted lines. Perhaps some of our Browning students may miss others; we will be glad to know of them.

"Thus I wrote in London, musing on my betters Poets dead and gone, and lo, the critics cried:
'Out on such a boast!' as if I dreamed that fetters
Binding Dante, bind up me! as if true pride—
Were not also humble!
So I smiled and sighed—
As I ope'd your book on Venice, this bright morning,
Sweet new friend of mine! and felt the clay or sand—
Whatsoe'er my soil be—break, for praise or scorning
Out in grateful fancies—weeds, but weeds expand
Almost into flowers, held by such a kindly hand."

This is an additional stanza to the lines, "Touch Him - Ne'er So Lightly," written in Miss Edith Longfellow's album, first published in Scribner's Magazine. The following is "The Names:"

"Shakespeare! to such name's sounding, what succeeds, Fittly as silence? Falter forth the spell,—
Act follows word, the speaker knows full well,
Nor tampers with its magic more than needs.
Two names there are: That which the Hebrew reads
With his soul only; if from lips it fell,
Echo, back thundered by earth, heaven and hell,
Would own! 'Thou did'st create us.' Naught impedes.
We voice the other name, man's most of might,
Awesomely, lovingly: let awe and love
Mutely await their working, leave to sight
All of the issue as—below—above—
Shakespeare's creation rises: one remove,
Though dread, this finite from that infinite."

This foregoing was published in 1884, in the Shakespearean Show Book:

"Only the prism's obstruction shows aright
The secret of a sunbeam, breaks its light
Into the jewelled bow from blankest white;
So may a glory from defect arise:
Only by deafness may the vexed love wreak
Its insuppressible sense on brow and cheek,
Only by dumbness adequately speak
As favored mouth could never, through the eyes."

The above was written in 1862 to a statuary group of the deaf and dumb children of Sir Thomas Fairbairn.

Encyclopedia of Living Divines and Christian Workers of all Denominations, in Europe and America. Being a supplement to Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge. Edited by Rev. Philip Schaff, D.D., LL.D., and Rev. Samuel Macauley Jackson, M.A. New York: Funk & Wagnalls. Cloth, pp. 271. Price, $3.00.

This book is so well described in its title that but little further notice is needed. The large, double-column pages are printed in clear type. The names are printed in a full-faced letter, which makes reference an easy task. The biographical notices are generally brief, but full of facts. The scope of the book is comprehensive. A glance through the C's shows the names of George L. Cary, John W. Chadwick, William Henry Channing, James Freeman Clarke, Robert Laird Collier, Robert Collyer, M. D. Conway; and in other letters, the columns are well sprinkled with names of workers for the liberal faith. The denominational connection of every person noticed is given, and generally the doctrinal preferences are shown by brief phrases, such as, for instance, "liberal," "radical Unitarian," "Channing Unitarian," etc. The work will prove very useful to all interested in religion and religious workers.

Bible Studies from the Old and New Testaments, covering the International Sunday-school Lessons for 1888. By Geo. F. Pentecost, D.D. A. S. Barnes & Co.: New York and Chicago.

The International Sunday-school Lessons for the first half of the year are upon the New Testament, the second half upon the Old Testament. Fifty-three lessons in all, and a commentary, amounting upon an average to four pages of closely printed matter by Mr. Pentecost upon each lesson is herein set forth. Mr. Pentecost's comments are, in the main, made up of the easy sort of moralizing of which the modern preacher can do so very much with so very little trouble. And yet no doubt this book will be very useful for the purpose for which it is intended; it will, for the time being, make every Sunday-school teacher who uses it as good a preacher as Mr. Pentecost. The whole trouble in the matter is, that all the real questions of all kinds are ignored rather than discussed, and the time and space are used for simple preaching.

Fortunes of the Faradays. By Amanda Douglas. Boston: Lee & Shepard; Chicago. A. C. McClurg & Co. Cloth, pp. 407. Price, $1.50.

This is rather a fairy-like recital, showing how a refined and intelligent family were by a series of fortunate happenings raised from comparative poverty to a position of wealth, enjoying its attendant refinements and luxuries. The family were thus afforded an opportunity to develop and cultivate native talents, and were profited in various ways. The story ends in the good old fashioned way, happily for all, and is told in a cheerful manner.

UNITY CHURCH-DOOR PULPIT.

Justice.

A SERMON PREACHED BY REV. J. LL. JONES, AT CHICAGO,
JANUARY 8, 1888.

(Published by the Congregation.)

He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?—MICAH VI: 8.

I.

"TO DO JUSTLY."

What is religion? I hope you have given this question so much thought as to render you dissatisfied with any stiff, concise or sectarian definition of the same. I trust that you have outgrown all dogmatic definitions or doctrinal tests of religion. I hope that no one article, no thirty-nine articles, clipped from the proceedings of any ecclesiastical convention, can offer adequate answer to this besetting question of all minds. The word religion covers an experience so broad that no one race can monopolize it, nor can any one age exemplify it. Religion overhangs humanity as the cloud drapery of the sky overhangs the earth,—now black and portentous, now lighted up into surpassing beauty; now the central sun pierces its folds with warmth and light, and anon it is melted into a glory too dazzling for the earth-trained eye to look upon. Let me change the figure. Religion, as interpreted by the sympathies and conceptions of the noblest, looms up before us like one of the great mountains of the world. Its base is buried in grassy slopes familiar to human feet, its sides slope upwards through the blue haze; its peak pierces the cloud that seems to rest upon its brow; its summit is clothed with the solemnity of perpetual whiteness. Our feet seldom reach the upper heights; our vision is too limited to discern its accurate outlines, our instruments are too imperfect to measure its dimensions,—but there the mountain stands, nevertheless, a solid, lasting sublime verity. Taking either figure or dispensing with both, I think religion everywhere and always presents to us certain universal elements, among which are the following: It besets the finite mind with a sense of infinitude; it ever confronts the human soul with a pressing mystery of life, it haunts the created with a sense of the Creator, with the questions—Whence? and Whither? Equally universal, I think, with these elements is the sense of inharmony between the finite and the infinite. Religion reveals a gulf between the actual and the ideal. First it is a chasm of terror,—the finite dreads the infinite power,—but later it becomes a sweet attraction. The soul yearns for wings, it asks for the powers of flight that will carry it towards the divine. It longs to bridge the chasm between the transient and the permanent. There is a hunger for the eternal.

Again, there is a cohesive power in religion that unites heart to heart, and in some very forcible fashion all to God. These universal forces in religion come in as correctives into human life; they enable men and women to achieve the highest that is possible to them within a given time. The testimony of history and of experience proves, I believe, that religion deals with substance, not shadows; realities, not forms. There is that to be symbolized back of all symbols. This morning I would try to push this search for the universal in religion a little farther, and see if we may not discover one abiding quality at least,—find something permanent amid the changes and wrecks of form. Rites and rituals, creeds and names change with the generations. What is it that ever remains? Micah from the prophetic hill-tops of Judea struck some of the enduring chords in this "harp of a thousand strings" when he sang "He hath shewed me, O man, what is good. And what doth the Eternal require of thee but to do justice, to love mercy and to walk humbly with thy God." On the placid plains of China, beneath the scorching suns of Persia, in the shade of Indian palm trees or mid the busy streets of London or Chicago this text holds because it represents the indispensable, universal elements of religion,—justice, love and humility. To-day I will concern myself with justice only.

What is justice? Let art answer with its symbol, a pair of scales. Justice is balance, poise, equilibrium. The physical universe is order, not confusion; cosmos, not chaos. All evolution is a movement toward a more nice adjustment of part to part, of force to force. Attraction and repulsion strike their balance among the atoms, and they become solid granite. The centrifugal and centripetal forces tug away at the planet; both forces are obeyed—the straight line is curved and the planet continues its unjarring flight through space. Gravitation is that subtle poise of contending forces that permits the bird to flit through the air and hold all the stars in their courses. Emerson predicts the time when the teacher of religion will follow these shining laws until he sees "the identity of the law of gravitation with purity of heart." There is that in religion that stands for the law of balances. Society is an adjustment of conflicting forces, and when the laws of trade and labor are as well understood and as obediently followed by men as the laws of motion, chemical affinity and gravitation are obeyed in matter, then men and women will move in their social order as rhythmically and divinely harmonious as the stars. Justice implies this poise, and religion is a search for it. Take the nearest word-equivalents,—erect, correct, upright, downright,—and they all indicate a reaching after this balance; this proper relation of part to part. To be true is to discharge every obligation. "Ought" is the payment of what I owe. Duty is the settlement of my dues. Justice, then, is not mere conformity to the laws of the United States, the laws of Moses, or any other external code, but it is the conforming to the laws of the moral universe, which are as inexorable when defied and beautiful when obeyed as are the laws of the material universe. Justice is not conforming to the dictates of your own conscience, but it is conforming to the conscience of the universe. Justice thus understood insists that there is a place for every individual in the moral universe as there is for every atom in the material universe, and when in its right place every individual, like every grain of sand, has rights which Deity himself is bound to respect. Justice thus interpreted, you will readily see, is a prophetic and not a popular requirement of religion. Men have hardly learned how to pronounce the word justice yet.

This recognition of the universe as an unit, and of God as the uniform and persistent power of which the universe of matter and of mind are manifestations, is just dawning upon the souls of men. It is insisted upon more often by the teachers of science than the teachers of religion. Rhys-Davids, perhaps the greatest authority on Buddhism, says that Buddhism should be classed among the very latest productions of the human mind. In this large time view we may well say that justice is a recently introduced element in religion. Judaism, Christianity, Mohammedanism, and all the great Bible religions have sprung out of modern times comparatively speaking, when we think of the unnumbered thousands of years through which the race in its childhood has crept through unlettered ignorance and unclassified thought. We can see readily that religion was in the world before morality, and that they had found word or words for God before they had found a word for justice. The crude thought and primitive feeling that belong to the childhood of the race still survive in our religious vocabulary and institutions; even yet, as in the days of pagan Greece and Rome, the very gods men worship are selfish, partial, changeable and unjust. Like the ancient Athenians the devotees at the altars of religion confess themselves tired of the word justice, and they ostracize him who makes it the prime requirement of his life, as Aristides was ostracized from Athens long ago. A life shaped by justice is even yet sometimes characterized in our pulpits as more dangerous than a life of wickedness, and "righteousness" is compared to "filthy rags." In the great creeds of Christendom there is more about the Trinity, the Immaculate Conception, Atonement, Sacrifice, Hell and Bodily Resurrection than there is about justice. Read any of them, and note how small is the emphasis placed upon this central word. Article XII of the thirty-nine articles of religion frankly states that good works, although pleasing and acceptable to God in Christ, cannot put away our sins, and do endure the severity of God's punishment. Article XIII goes still farther and urges that good works, arrived at in any other way than through the theological avenue recommended, "are not pleasant to God, neither do they make men meet to receive grace." And it naively concludes "we doubt not but they have the nature of sin." The pulpit themes most familiar to church-going ears are still those that relate themselves to problems of baptism, sacraments, church extension, and what is to become of scientists and infidels in the next world, rather than the ever-present, pressing demands of justice. The hymn books of the past have had more to say of pearly gates, jasper walls, angel wings and the chorus of seraphim and cherubim than the claims of our neighbor and the demands of the Golden Rule.

This line of thought, and the large class of facts developed thereby, presents itself to me this morning, not for the purpose of theological controversy, but as illustration of the great law of development, without an appreciation of which our study of religion would end nowhere. Try to realize how slowly and painfully have the higher conceptions been evolved, how laboriously are the higher rounds of the spiritual ladder attained. I would show you the long way of the past, that we may better appreciate the high vantage ground of to-day, and the more confidently reach after the still higher ways of the future. I would call your attention to the fact that even Christianity, one of the latest and best ministrants of soul, has fixed the gaze of man so steadily on the blood-stains on Calvary that it is in danger of forgetting the deep injustice that set that blood flowing, that still wounds and crucifies the anointed right. The Christly virtues of love, honor and truth still have their Gethsemanes and Golgothas. I would hasten the time when righteousness, the great word of Hebrew prophecy, the battle-cry of the Old Testament, will lay aside its formal garments with which it has been clothed, and when it will come forth draped in the warm, loving, living attributes of the heart's noblest passion. This can not be done until we realize that justice is the constitution of the kingdom of God. It is more than the Ten Commandments, though they were engraved by God's own hand on thunder-capped Sinai. Justice is more than paying your debts and letting other people alone. Its demand can not be determined by appealing, Shylock-like, to what is "nominated in the bond." Mythology was the theology of the untutored—the poetry of untrained minds. It has grown out of the fertile but unenlightened heart of humanity. Among the deities in this Pantheon was Astræa, once the goddess of Justice, who walked on earth until man fell from his golden estate; then she was metamorphosed into one of the stars of heaven. Art has blindfolded this mute divinity. She has been elevated to the dome of our modern court houses; but religion insists that the bandage be torn off, and that she preside within the court house a living intelligence, using all her senses.

Justice, if it is the rightful moral relation of things, is the key to all our modern perplexities. It curbs my liberties so that they co-ordinate and not overshadow those of another. It will not allow us to stand in each other's way; there is a place for both. This thought of justice, arrived at through the slow inductions of human experience, enforced by the careful generalizations of science, demands a readjustment of our thought of God; indeed, it gives us a new idea of God. The gods of polytheism were querulous,—they tried to thwart each other's treachery with cunning. A candid study of the Old Testament shows up the Jehovah of the Hebrews as a partial, jealous deity, whose special favor and love were limited to the inhabitants of a strip of land some 180 miles by 70 on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean. He hated the Gentile world and slaughtered Egyptian babes and whelmed the Egyptian warriors in the waters of the Red Sea. Much of the so-called Christian theology gives us an omnipotent Shylock for God. So exacting is he for that which is written "in the bond" that he permits the innocent to be executed that the million guilty ones may go free. Under the domination of such ideas can we emphatically say "Do justly?" The soul must stand upon the serener heights from which he sees all the forces of the universe moving with divine certainty towards holy and impartial ends. They represent a just God, who enfolds the weakest in his protecting law. The king on his throne, the priest at his altar, and the swallow on the house-top, in Him find shelter. When we recognize that the forces that paint the violet, and pierce the crystal with light as divine, and know that God is on duty preserving the balance of function in the most obscure recesses of the universe, as well as in the large events of human history, then will justice to the smallest and weakest become within us a religious passion; truth and right will become the prime words in our devotion, and the devotees will exclaim in the words of Carlyle, the stalwart prophet of the gospel of justice, "Know, O brother man, that the great soul of the world is just. At the bottom all is justice. Forget that and you forget all, and the whole universe is against you."

This larger thought of God of course gives us a larger thought of providence—God's method of dealing with men. Religion now insists, in tones that can not be misunderstood, that you and I and all men are dealt with now and always with exact justice. There is no wavering from this by the providence of the Almighty. "O Lord, if we had had our just deserts we would long ere this have been cut down and cast into outer darkness," has been the language of many a devout one. But religion to-day says: "Hush such blasphemy! You have had your just deserts up to this present moment—nothing more and nothing less; you are to-day held at your exact valuation at the market of God, for He is just." "Just my luck," says the faithless in the presence of disappointment or disaster. No, not luck; your fault or somebody's else. There is sure and direct cause for it all. There is no "luck," for all is law, and God is just. Men used to say "God's Providence," when some worthy plan failed; now, with more wisdom, they say "man's improvidence." Men used to talk of the "fated ship," when the vessel went down with her living cargo; now they talk of careless or incompetent shipmasters.

A little over sixteen years ago the world was startled by the news that Chicago was burned by what reporters called the "fire-fiend." Can we not say to-day that it was burned by the "fire-friend?" God was so good to this city that He would not change His beneficent law to its hurt. Just in proportion that men feel that they are dealt with exactly in this universe, that God deals out justice, nothing more and nothing less, whether they believe it or not, then will they begin themselves to do justly as they never have done before. You say this is terrible doctrine to the poor sinner! No, not terrible, but beautiful consolation. Saving strength to the sinner is this doctrine. It is the power of life unto salvation to him. Should our prayers to be saved from the consequences of our own actions be answered we would lose far more than we would gain. The young man arraigned before the court burst into tears when his attorney assured him that justice would be done him and exclaimed, "That, sir, is what I am afraid of." He little understood what heavenly benedictions uncompromising justice had for his guilty conscience. Ned Bratts and his wife, uncouth characters in Robert Browning's poem of this name, who voluntarily brought their unsavory lives to confession before the court and on bended knee begged the Majesty to make haste and hang them that they might have done with their bestiality and face the light, were nearer the truth than this trembling criminal at the bar. But Mildred Tresham, in another of Browning's stories,—whose pathetic confession she sobbed over and over:

"I was so young—I loved him so—I had
 • No mother—God forgot me and I fell!"

saw deeper into the workings of divine justice than either of these. When later on she was not afraid to speak before her God her full defence, she could say :

"I dare approach that heaven
Which has not bade a living thing despair,
Which needs no code to keep its grace from stain,
But bids the vilest worm that turns on it
Desist and be forgiven."

Let me try to be a little less theological, and bring home the subject on its human side. When we can think of justice, not as some cold system of book-keeping or mechanical arrangement of our obligations, but as an imperative, cosmic law enforced by the movements of the universe, we will give it more attention—yes more devotion than is our custom. Our thought of justice must grow like all our other thoughts ; it means all it has in the past and more. Justice demands that we pay our debts and more, that we give fair days' wages for fair days' work, and more. Justice sometimes says give bread to the hungry and clothe the naked, but not always. But it always says, "You must not occupy more standing-room than belongs to you in society." To quote Carlyle again, "Justice is truth acted out." But it is more than that. It is truth thought out, felt out in regard to all the other beings who share the bounty of creation with you. What mean all these discordant notes that fill our ears,—the strife between labor and capital, between producer and consumer, between the governed and the government, between sect and sect ? Why has not the rumble of cannon balls and the clash of armament passed from the face of the earth ? It is because the canker worm of injustice is still gnawing away at the core of society. Religion has not taught men to be mindful of this law of poise. The false balance is still an abomination to the Lord of the universe. But men have been very slow to realize it. Our religion has had too much to say about "charity," too little to say about justice. If the criminal and the pauper were granted full justice, they would have little need of what we falsely denominate "charity." You see the limp, inefficient hand held out for the dime to "buy a loaf of bread" that he may not starve, and you ask, In the name of sweet charity will you not allay the pangs of that stomach ? But religion says in the name of sweeter justice : "Nay, withhold the blighting, the debilitating dole. Give him instead the open path to honest industry, to fair remuneration. Then, if he refuses to walk therein, let him receive the divine persuasions in the way of pain and hunger. Aye, do you give him justice, and then if he refuses to walk in the path thereof do you follow the divine justice. Let him starve himself out of the life that can do him no further good into whatever possibilities there may be in store for him in another." When the vicious begs in pity's name at our hand, let us in justice remember how he fell on the slippery place where we scarcely stood with all the helps which he had not. In justice let us remember that he was crowded to the wall because we very likely occupied more than our share of the secure ground. That low forehead, that hungry heart, that narcotized frame, arraign what we call the best society before the criminal bar at which he stands, and make of those who represent the latter perhaps the greater criminals. Let not the judge in pity shorten his sentence, but in the name of high justice let him also pronounce theirs—let him demand that they

"Put a thought beneath his rags
To ennoble the heart's struggle."

We boast so proudly of our so-called charitable institutions, and upon them rest our claims to be a Christian people. I would not underestimate the genial impulses that gave these institutions existence ; but in the last analysis they are monumental witnesses to the injustice of our times. They aggravate the disease they are meant to cure. With our tender left-handed charity we nip off here a bud and there a bud of violence and cruelty, while with our thoughtless and greedy right hand we water diligently the great tree of injustice that grows Upas-like to yield its harvest of direful fruit, our inefficient charities, our narrow soul-saving institutions, our protective laws, all of them justifiable and necessary when compared to the mountainous injustice of man toward man. The greed for money and lust for power remind us of the man running with his hat to stop the leak in the ship's side through which a cannon ball had pierced. It is Mother Partington trying to keep back the Atlantic ocean with her mop.

When Jesus gave religious recognition to publicans, when he granted fellowship to sinners, which, in New Testament phrase, means transgressors of the ecclesiastical, not the moral code, when he threw his protection over the fallen one he was simply standing for even-handed justice, which we debase when we call it charity. He only did what was right and what all others ought to do. I do not understand the intricacies of trade or the complications of politics well enough to know where the sin lies or how the remedy is to be applied, but I know that there is injustice in the land ; labor and capital are not adjusted by the perfect balance, and there is power in the hands of those where reason, fairness and rectitude are not found in adequate counter-balance. While this is so, I will look with interest and profound gratitud upon the labors of such zealous, devoted (and the word here suggests its companion word "devout") workers as Henry George, Father McGlynn and their associates of the Anti-Poverty Society, and will keenly regret that I do not know enough to take hand in the solemn discussion, and to take part in the holy war against injustice somewhere. And I will be patient and sympathetic with the ill-advised and misdirected agitation, because I think there is a hope for justice wherever there is a blind sense of injustice making miserable the life and unsettling the artificial in society.

In putting justice first among the requirements of universal religion, making its demands the highest among the sanctities, we give thereby intellect a high place in the spiritual life,—we make reason an essential element in piety. A child can give alms to a beggar, but only a wise man can do justice to him. Whoever would shape his conduct on the lines of the universe must seek an ever-growing acquaintance with the methods of this universe ; and the only church that permanently blesses a community is the church that expands the souls, enlarges the minds, increases the life of the members of that community. Justice and judgment have common roots, and they travel the same route ; both are based on the laws of the universe, and they are revealed through the rational nature of man ; justice is impossible to the ignorant. No man can be just without much thought. No state can be just that is not intelligent. No church can serve the cause of justice that is not rational. Dishonesties of thought breed more injustice in the world to-day than dishonesties of action. A dishonest banker visits cruel injustice upon men,—he robs the widow of her pittance and the mechanic of his earnings ; he breaks down men's confidence in trade and renders uncertain the commercial transactions upon which rest the material prosperity of the community. But a dishonest thinker, a timid or shiftless priest, who, at the sacred altars of religion, debauches the reason of men and women, does an infinitely greater wrong to society because he breaks down men's confidence in the spiritual verities ; he confounds the laws of thought, he blurs the conscience, debauches the reason, robs the mind of its integrities. Upon these eventually rest all commerce and all industry.

Justice is, therefore, the fundamental element of the mind as well as the heart. It is fundamental in religion because it is fundamental in morals, because it is based deep in the constitution of things ; it is the burden of God's revelation to man. It is revealed to him through the accumulated experiences of the ages. The intuitions of thoughtful generations have become to us the intuitions of right. When this dearly bought knowledge becomes baptized with the sanctities of religion, when morality is crowned with piety, then justice indeed will flow as a river. Then the Golden Rule will become the ritual of the soul, and conscience will be as delicately poised in the moral universe as the stars are in the physical. The great Lisbon earthquake in 1755 sent its disturbing wave clear across the Atlantic, and many days after the upheaval the sands on the American shore were disturbed in consequence thereof. Even so sensitive is the poise of the spiritual universe. Every deed of wrong, aye, every unjust thought, gives rise to a disturbing wave upon the sea of life that will continue its work of violence until it disturbs the humblest atom on the farthest shore. Surely then justice, justice, justice must be the last behest of religion, whatever may be the first. Micah crowns the prophetic mountain, the base of which rests in the simple croonings of barbaric fear and superstitious ignorance. Sun and stars, thought, feeling, conscience, all the forces of the world within and the world without, are high sheriffs of God commissioned to enforce His commands. O soul of mine, be thou just that thou mayst know the God of justice, and find thy brother man, who is revealed to thee only in so far as thou dost weigh him in the just balances. O church of ours, become the church of justice. Do thou champion the rights of those who have none to plead their case. Do thou befriend those whom injustice has rendered friendless. Let this simple altar plead the cause of the outcast; be a Providence to the improvident, and be a home to those who have been made exiles by their thinking and rendered homeless by their sincerity. O church of ours, may it ask of no man, dole in the name of religion, but demand of all that come within its power that patronage of time, talent and money which is the right of religion, the just equivalent for service rendered. O church of All Souls, study well that divine justice that holds in respectful poise and delicate balance every grain of sand and every throb of spirit. Serve well those "shining laws that reveal the identity of the law of gravitation with purity of heart; and show that the ought, that duty is one thing with science, with beauty and with joy." O heaven-born religion, bring to us this energy of justice; link each to each in the bonds of equity, rebuke the lust of self, teach us to relinquish our unjust claims, inspire our souls so that all their energies may be bent in paying all we owe and settling all our dues. Thus wilt thou make duty and ought regnant words in our confessions of faith, the king-words of our religion. Then discord of life will become harmonious and dissonance will melt into melody; strife will melt into co-operation, and righteousness will appear to man as it always has appeared to God, the only road to heaven.

ASTRÆA.

"Jove means to settle
Astræa in her seat again,
And let down from his golden chain
An age of better metal."
BEN JONSON, 1615.

O POET rare and old!
Thy words are prophesies:
Forward the age of gold,
The new Saturnian lies.

The universal prayer
And hope are not in vain;
Rise, brothers! and prepare
The way for Saturn's reign.

Perish shall all which takes
From labor's board and can;
Perish shall all which makes
A spaniel of the man!

Free from its bonds the mind,
The body from the rod;
Broken all chains that bind
The image of our God!

Just men no longer pine
Behind their prison-bars;
Through the rent dungeon shine
The free sun and the stars.

Earth own, at last, untrod
By sect, or caste, or clan,
The fatherhood of God,
The brotherhood of man!

Fraud fail, craft perish, forth
The money-changers driven,
And God's will done on earth,
As now in heaven!

THE HOME.

The Apple Lesson.

A beautiful, rosy apple
Came into my hand one day
From the hand of a kindly neighbor,
Who dropped pleasure along his way.

"Could anything be more perfect?"
I said, as I turned it around;
"Perfectly lovely in color,
Perfectly sweet and sound."

But, when, with pride and pleasure,
I cut my gift in two,
The winding house of an apple worm
Came clearly into view.

How do you think he got there
To the heart of my beautiful treat?
How did he find a chance to spoil
So much that was fair and sweet?

Only one way could it happen:
Far back in the sunny spring,
When, instead of the fruit was a blossom,
(A delicate, tender thing,)

Right into the heart of the blossom,
An enemy thrust an egg,
So that when the little worm was hatched
He had neither to work nor beg.

For home and food were ready,
And then, as the apple grew,
The havoc made by the little worm
Grew steadily larger, too.

Did you ever think, dear children,
That young hearts are blossoms, too;
And the trouble that came to the apple bloom
May easily come to you?

Then watch you well in the spring time;
Let not little wrong come in
To grow as you grow, till, one day,
You'll find your fruit marred within.

JUNIATA STAFFORD.

An Incident.

A glimpse of real life in a kindergarten comes to us in the following:

The children were sitting around in a circle playing the "shoemaker." The Directress stopped between two of the verses of the song to tell them about the funny little raps the cobbler gave the pegs in the shoe; then she told them of the carpenter's heavy blows on the big nails used in the wood. She told the children to look around and find some nails in the floor, and behold, not one to be seen! "Why, what holds the floor down?" "Well, little people, you go home and ask your papas, and tell me all about it to-morrow." Seven little ones came in the morning and reported that their papas said "the nails are there, plenty of them, but you can't see them," and they tried in their childish way to tell how they were "driven under." One little girl brought two pieces of pine board, each several inches long and two or three wide, which her father had whittled with his pen-knife, showing her how the boards were fitted together, with the tongue and groove; and showing, too, where the nail was driven deep in the groove. The children had a fine talk over it, and little Lily was sent home at noon with a big "thank you" for her papa, whom she found at the door, eager to know how his explanation had been received.

THE CABIN IN THE CLEARING, AND OTHER POEMS.

By BENJAMIN S. PARKER.

"Here is something new. Here is a voice that ascends from the pioneer's clearing in the forest and chants not the weak and effeminate rhymes of the singer in the gilded world, to whom life is a mere matter of conventionalities, but the strong, earnest notes of one who has really seen and felt nature, and to whom living is still a matter of old-fashioned responsibility. He sings like a wood bird, because he has something to sing."—Cincinnati Times Star.

The sternest of critics, under the spell of this greenwood music, would forget to frown, for here is the very scent of clover and elder-bloom, the whistle of the quail, the merry chatter of wren and chipmunk, the ripple of forest streams and dance of chequered sun-beams. . . . Here is that "local color for which our English writers have so often clamored, and the genuine "artless art that tarries long."—Alice Williams Brotherton, in UNITY.

THEODORE PARKER'S

Lessons from the World of Matter and the World of Man.

Selected from Notes of Unpublished Sermons, by Rufus Leighton. Cloth, 12mo, pp. 480 reduced from $2.50 to $1.25.

"It has been a great comfort to me often to think that after I have passed away some of my best things might still be collected from my rough notes and your nice photograph of the winged words. The things I value most are not always such as get printed."—Theodore Parker to Rufus Leighton.

"This volume is by all odds the best one-volume introduction to the great preacher. Kindling passages caught on the wing by the stenographic pencil of an appreciative listener, they give the glow and the fire of one who dispensed both light and heat in days that were dark and chilly. The reduced price ought to give this perennial book a fresh lease on life and a new field. * * * The book contains one of the best portraits of Theodore Parker extant, good enough to be cut out and framed if the owner is willing to mutilate the book."—Unity.

This volume, edited by Mr. RUFUS LEIGHTON, was first brought before the public in 1865. It ran through several editions, but for a number of years has not been regularly upon the market. We have just concluded an arrangement with Mr. LEIGHTON by which we shall have the exclusive sale of the book. The price, originally $2.50, we have

REDUCED TO $1.25.

The book contains 430 large duodecimo pages, and is substantially bound in cloth. The general divisions of subjects are as follows. The Material World and Man's Relation Thereto, the Nature of Man, Traits and Illustrations of Human Character and Conduct, Phases of Domestic Life, Education, Human Institutions and National Life, the Power and Endurance of What Is Noblest in Man, Human Progress, Jesus of Nazareth, Man in His Religious Aspect. Each of these divisions is subdivided into from seven to forty sections; for example, the chapter on Human Progress is subdivided as follows: Man to Make His Own Paradise, the False Idea of Man a Hindrance to His Progress, Man's Progress not by Miracle but by the Use of Natural Forces, Power of the Human Will Over Circumstances, the Necessity for an Ideal, Death a Blessing to Man, the Founders of New England—the True Way to Honor Them, the Prophecy of the Past to the Future, the Next Half Century.

The book is copyrighted, and no portion of it is accessible in any other form, except a single section which has been used in the recent volume published by the American Unitarian Association.

* * * The book is for sale in Boston at Roberts Brothers' Book Store, and may be obtained through the trade generally, or will be mailed on receipt of price ($1.25) by

THE MORALS OF CHRIST.

A Comparison with Contemporaneous Systems.

By AUSTIN BIERBOWER.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS.

An admirable example of the scientific treatment of a historical subject, almost as systematic as a treatise upon one of the great sciences.—Daily News.

A remarkably suggestive and striking treatise. Mr. Bierbower has done the work which needed to be done.—N. Y. Independent.

One of the most notable works of the period, remarkable for its uniqueness as well as high literary character. It may be doubted if another so thoroughly non-controversial work on Christ's teachings can be found in the entire range of the literature of the Christian era.—Inter Ocean.

The book is one of great suggestiveness.—Critic.

The whole is written in a crisp, epigrammatic way that serves to keep the reader's interest closely through the whole inquiry.—Chicago Times.

The book has many striking excellencies.—Interior.

The work is exceedingly well written. The pointed, epigrammatic phraseology, in which the rich contents are placed before the mind of the reader, is an insurance against weariness and security for unflagging interest.—The Standard.

An interesting and forcible book, in which the author undertakes to differentiate Christ's morality from the Jewish or childish, the pharisaic or ecclesiastic and the Graeco-Roman or worldly. Much of the distinction is of value.—Atlantic Monthly.

Mr. Austin Bierbower, the author of this book, writes in commendably clear and telling sentences, and many will be attracted to his chapters by this style. * * * It is suggestive and stimulating, and it approaches its subject from an unusual direction.—The Congregationalist.

We like to look often into Mr. Bierbower's "Morals of Christ." The titles in the table of contents form a suggestive syllabus of ethics.—Unity.

Mr. Bierbower is known as a very independent and suggestive thinker.

* * * His book we can cordially commend as stimulating and thoughtful, and likely to be useful to readers who are accustomed to do their own thinking.—Christian Union.

The book, a note-worthy one, abounds in strikingly suggestive headings.

* * * The points are fine and strongly taken. It draws such sharp distinction that it may be charged occasionally with over-statement.

But here is the accrescence of a remarkably clear, fresh, discriminating and sententious style.—The Advance.

Mr. Bierbower's timely book is just what was needed. His comparison of Christian with ancient secular ethics is at once scholarly, scientific and eminently judicious.

Mr. Bierbower's method of attack is bold and spirited, his analysis keen and searching, his style unconventional, breezy, fresh, and the treatment systematic from the first to the last. The work is both scientific and popular.—Mind in Nature.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Denver, Colo.—Another department has been added to Unity church, in the form of Saturday evening social religious meetings. In these an opportunity is given for the asking and answering of any questions pertaining to religious views, though some definite topic is always announced. How we came by our present New Testament, was the theme on Saturday last. Sunday evening's discourse was upon Martin Luther, and we were shown that his bravery and love of goodness need more followers to-day. His bigotry and narrowness were deplored. A church directory has lately been issued, containing a photograph of the pastor and one of the church, in addition to matter usually found in directories. Nearly three hundred members' names appear, though these by no means represent the number attending services. The pastor's Annual Reception, held last week, was, to the recipients of invitations, a very pleasant affair. Only male pew-holders were favored, but there were enough of these to form a large party. A fine supper was given, with the ulterior aim of arousing enthusiasm in lifting the church debt, and the amount subscribed equalled the expectations. The Ladies' Aid Society has planned an entertainment to liquidate their assumed portion of the debt. At the meeting of the Women's Auxiliary Conference, held last Wednesday, a paper on temperance was substituted for the one announced in programme, and it was greatly enjoyed, and called out many earnest questions as well as differing views. E. H. H.

Woman's Gain.—"The English Woman's Review" sums up some of the gain of woman—no gain of mankind. The women of Belfast, Ireland, are availing themselves of their newly-won privilege of franchise. The Woman's Liberal Association has established a federation, of which Mrs. Gladstone is president. Women on both sides of the water are taking their places as guardians of the poor—not in the ancient way of doling out old clothes and cold victuals at the back door, but in the larger and more helpful way of overseers and assistant overseers. And we find that the newly-appointed inspector of lace manufacture in Ireland is a lady. We sincerely hope that the business of inspecting our laces before we get them may not unsex her. You know that this has been our greatest danger in breaking from old customs. In England they are trying to introduce, with the precedent of New England to aid them, the appointment of police matrons."

Chicago.—The union teachers' meeting was held as usual Monday noon. Mr. Blake, the leader, being absent, Mr. Jones took up the lesson, in Luke, 14th chapter. This seems to be a chapter largely devoted to lessons from feasts. Jesus, sitting at the table of one of the chief Pharisees, comments upon the manners and selfishness of his fellow-guests; later tells a story or parable to impress quite a different lesson. Mr. Blake arrived at this point, and remarked first upon the visiting and cheer upon the Sabbath that appears here in the narrative. The Sabbath, though a holy day upon which no work must be done, was yet a holiday. Then taking up the matter of the feast, the choosing out the chief rooms was explained in reference to Oriental customs. Each guest measures himself in comparison with all present as to his rank, and takes his place accordingly, but if a more honorable guest then arrives the master of the feast may have to rearrange the guests. It may also be his duty to correct any errors that guests may have made in their own estimates of their rank. As to the other feast, the parable, Mr. Blake said that the bidding the blind and the poor was a common thing among Orientals. The parable, as a whole, in Jesus' mouth, might have had two meanings. First, a purely kind and benevolent intention—sympathy for the poor; but secondly, a meaning that Luke would chiefly see and remember it for, namely, that if the Jews do not enter in and possess the kingdom of the Messiah other outsiders will be asked to come in. This is Pauline Christianity, to be sure; but the meaning is in the story as well as in other verses of this and the preceding chapter.

—The monthly meeting of the Chicago Women's Unitarian Association will occur on Thursday next, February 23, in the Third Unitarian church, corner Monroe and Laflin streets. The president, Mrs. S. W. Conger, will read a paper on "Contact with Children as an Educating Influence."

Newark, N.J.—The "Unity Congregation" of Rev. Hugh O. Pentecost continues to attract large numbers; the hall is crowded each Sunday evening. The same sermon, if we understand it, is given the same day at Masonic Hall in New York city in the morning, and at Brooklyn in the afternoon. Each Sunday's programme is neatly printed with hymns and responsive services. An unique feature is the printing on the fourth page the financial statement of the week, which keeps the money problem of each week before the audiences and the movement on a solid financial basis. Mr. Pentecost has a frank way of talking. We do not wonder that large numbers like to hear a man who knows how to say what he means and who manifestly means what he says. Here is a sample from his sermon on "Parasites": "The next class of parasites are the intellectual—the people who won't do their own thinking, who never know anything about the President's message, or the labor question, or politics, until they have read their favorite newspaper; who always vote with their party blindly, because it is easier to vote that way than to vote thoughtfully; the helpless ones who, when they see an editorial in a newspaper that presents a different view of a thing than accords with their own likes, write a letter to the editor right off, telling him to stop their paper. These are intellectual parasites. They are in a condition of moral and mental degeneracy."

Cleveland, Ohio.—Dr. W. N. Hailmann, superintendent of public schools in La Porte, Ind., gave two lectures, February 10 and February 11, under the auspices of the Froebel Society. The first lecture, upon "The Essentials of the New Education," was given in Unity church parlors, before an appreciative audience largely composed of teachers. The second lecture, upon "Sense and Nonsense in the New Education," was given on Saturday afternoon in the rooms of the Board of Education. Both lectures were instructive, and were much enjoyed. On Sunday morning, by invitation of Mr. Hosmer, Dr. Hailmann spoke in Unity church upon "Culture and Efficiency" to a large congregation. Dr. Hailmann is a man of thought, warmed with earnest purpose, and has won friends by his works in the Forest City.

Muskegon, Mich.—Good Major Davis is no more in the flesh to bless his city with his benefactions, to be the center of the Unity circle in this place, to be the unwavering friend of UNITY and the Western Conference, to cheer them with his frequent visits, and to sustain them with his money. His funeral was held at the Opera house last Monday, Rev. Reed Stuart, of Detroit, officiating. Chauncy Davis belonged to that type of stalwart souls, matured by western pioneering, made tender by hardship and intelligent by activity, of which we hear much, but not enough, to secure the appreciation which they deserve. He began his career at twenty years of age, like so many others, by teaching school on the pioneer line in New York, and came westward with that line, and his growing career touched Chicago, Kenosha and Muskegon. Much of his life he was engaged in the lumbering interest, which would have made him very rich had he not been very generous and very just. The Morning News, at this place, estimates that he has given over a hundred thousand dollars for the public good in Muskegon, not in any one great thing to perpetuate his name, but in many good things to bless his town. Railroads, bridges, schools, halls, churches, libraries, all knew the patronage not only of purse, but of head and heart.

Champaign, Ill.—Acting in co-operation with the American Unitarian Association the Illinois Unitarian Conference has inaugurated a series of twelve liberal lectures to be given on Saturday evenings, and of twelve sermons on the Sundays following. The ministers of the state, with one or two from adjoining states, are to give their services, the eastern association bearing the incidental expenses. The visits are to be made fortnightly; six of them this spring and six of them next autumn. Mr. Jones, of All Souls Church, chairman of the committee, opens the course to-night (Saturday, the 18th) with a lecture on "The Relations of Religion and Culture;" to-morrow he preaches on "Spiritual Health."

Sioux Falls, Dak.—The blizzard still holds its reign of terror over this country, and railroads are often blocked, so the dedication of the Home Church is postponed until the flowers come. But the happy pastor, Miss Bartlet, will lead her large congregation into the new church for the first time to-morrow, and UNITY sends its greetings.

Beware of Scrofula

Scrofula is probably more general than any other disease. It is insidious in character, and manifests itself in running sores, pustular eruptions, boils, swellings, enlarged joints, abscesses, sore eyes, etc. Hood's Sarsaparilla expels all trace of scrofula from the blood, leaving it pure, enriched, and healthy.

"I was severely afflicted with scrofula, and over a year had two running sores on my neck. Took five bottles Hood's Sarsaparilla, and am cured." C. E. LOVEJOY, Lowell, Mass.

C. A. Arnold, Arnold, Me., had scrofulous sores for seven years, spring and fall. Hood's Sarsaparilla cured him.

Salt Rheum

Is one of the most disagreeable diseases caused by impure blood. It is readily cured by Hood's Sarsaparilla, the great blood purifier.

William Spies, Elyria, O., suffered greatly from erysipelas and salt rheum, caused by handling tobacco. At times his hands would crack open and bleed. He tried various preparations without aid; finally took Hood's Sarsaparilla, and now says: "I am entirely well."

"My son had salt rheum on his hands and on the calves of his legs. He took Hood's Sarsaparilla and is entirely cured." J. B. Stanton, Mt. Vernon, Ohio.

SILK AND SATIN RIBBONS FREE LADIES, THIS IS FOR YOU!

A rare gift for the ladies. Save much money and secure the best! Every lady knows and appreciates the privilege of having a few remnants of ribbon handy for the thousand and one tasty and useful purposes for which such goods are used, and which they, the ladies, use to such advantage. To purchase what is wanted at the usual prices such goods are sold for, would create a large bill of expense, and therefore deter a great many from indulging their tastes in this direction. Realizing that there were thousands upon thousands of remnants of ribbons among the large importing houses of America which they would be willing to dispose of in bulk, for a small fraction of their cost, to any one capable of purchasing largely, we instituted a search, resulting in our obtaining the entire stock of Silk and Satin Ribbon Remnants of several of the largest of these houses, who imported the finest goods. These goods may be depended upon as superior to anything to be found, except in the very best stores of America. Yet they are given away free! nothing like it ever known. A grand benefit for all the ladies! We have expended thousands of dollars in this direction, and can offer an immensely varied, and most complete assortment of ribbons, in every conceivable shade and width, and all of excellent quality, adapted for neck-wear, bonnet strings, hat trimmings, bows, scarfs, dress trimmings, silk quilt work, etc., etc. Some of these remnants range three yards and upwards in length. Though remnants, all the patterns are new and late styles, and may be depended on as beautiful, refined, fashionable and elegant. How to get a box containing a Complete Assortment of these elegant ribbons Free. The Practical Housekeeper and Ladies' Fireside Companion, published monthly by us, is acknowledged, by those competent to judge, to be the best periodical of the kind in the world. Very large and handsomely illustrated; regular price 75 cts. per year. Send 35 cents and we will send it to you for a trial year, and will also send free a box of the ribbons; 2 subscriptions and 2 boxes, 65 cts.; 4 subscriptions and 4 boxes, $1. One-cent postage stamps may be sent for less than $1. Get 3 friends to join you thereby getting subscriptions and based on this fact—those who read the periodical referred to, for one year, want it thereafter, and pay us the full price for it; it is in after years, and not now, that we make money. We make this great offer in order to at once secure 250,000 new subscribers, who, not now, but next year, and in years thereafter, will reward us with a profit, because the majority of them will wish to renew their subscriptions, and will do so. The money required is but a small fraction of the price you would have to pay at any store for a much smaller assortment of far inferior ribbons. Best bargain ever known; you will not fully appreciate it until after you see all. Safe delivery guaranteed. Money refunded to any one not perfectly satisfied. Better cut this out, or send at once for probably it won't appear again. Address, H. HALLETT & CO., PUBLISHERS, PORTLAND, MAINE.

The Progressive Pulpit.

An Independent Religious Publication, containing Sermons by JAMES H. WEST.

Bi-Monthly, 30 CENTS A YEAR.

SIXTEEN TWO-COLUMN PAGES.

The object of THE PROGRESSIVE PULPIT is the spread of earnest, reverent liberal religious thought, and the endeavor to "establish ethics and religion upon a scientific basis." The actual needs of humanity in the present day are so widely different, in many ways, from humanity's supposed needs in the past; the changed basis of modern knowledge, from the basis of older systems, is so complete; to those who are able to see there is so much more of beauty and helpfulness in the New and True than in the still-prevalent religious phantasies of the child-world, that the editor deems there will be place and room for it.

THE PULPIT will be published regularly six times a year, each number to contain one sermon by Mr. West, besides such other articles and comments of a progressive religious nature as the space of the magazine may permit.

Comments on the First Number.

"I like the look and tone of your little serial, and much admire its ability and spirit."—Rev. J. H. Allen, Editor Unitarian Review.

"You ought to make it semi instead of bi-monthly, and get $1 per year. It is the best thing I have seen of its kind, a word of freedom of spirit in religion."—From a Unitarian Minister, Cambridge, Mass.

"I congratulate you on your intellectual advancement, and wish you abundant success."—B. F. Underwood, late Editor of the Open Court.

"I heartily sympathize with the spirit which animates your work. Wishing you abundant success in bringing to inquiring minds the consolations of a rational faith, I am yours faithfully."—Leola G. Jones (author of 'A Study of Primitive Christianity'), New York.

"I do not know when I have read anything which I have enjoyed more thoroughly. I sent it directly, with a note, to— He is a very bright, earnest thinker, thoroughly alive and ideal in spirit, and I knew he would appreciate and enjoy it."—From a Post-Office Mission Worker in New York State.

"Please enter my name as a subscriber. I like the spirit of all Mr. West's works, 'the good time coming,' 'the immortal hope.'"—From Indiana.

HYMNS LOOKING ONWARD, INWARD, UPWARD.

"Valuable as a collection of untheological religious verse, even when not intended to be sung." Single copies, postpaid, 10 cents. More than ten copies, 5 cents each.

"A pamphlet of Forty-Two Hymns, collected and arranged by James H. West. Older collections of church hymns furnishing little that he could use consistently with modern rational religious thought, this thin pamphlet was printed for temporary use, to serve until something larger and better should be demanded by a growing consistency on the part of liberals as a whole. These hymns are of human hope and human endeavor, and are valuable as a collection of untheological religious verse, even when not intended to be sung."—Index.

A SUCCESSFUL BOOK.

THE EVOLUTION OF IMMORTALITY; or, suggestions of an Individual Immortality, based upon our Organic and Life History. By Dr. C. T. Stockwell. We can give this week but a few extracts from many favorable reviews and letters received since our last number went to press. Mr. E. P. Powell, author of "Our Heredity from God," writes the author: "If my book has done nothing else, I shall count it to have well paid me by having given me your book and your acquaintance. I am reading it with a keen relish and delicious sensation of satisfaction . . . I shall at once write an article on Science and Immortality, giving strong emphasis to your truly noble work."

Dr. C. S. Boynton, of Burlington, Vermont, writes: "The little book is but another link in the evolution of God's truth; but it will be, in my opinion, the link that will carry conviction of its truth to many a weary and almost disheartened searcher into the mysteries of the great beyond."

The Open Court, in its last issue, discusses the book in a four-page editorial, in the course of which it says: "Although we do not agree with the views presented therein, we thank the author sincerely for the pleasure his suggestive little book gave us. . . . The book is attractively written and full of poetic thought. . . . The author proves his deep insight into the nature of life and death."

The price of this book is one dollar. We regard it as worth the money, and have no intention of making any reduction.

But we are anxious to add a thousand names to the subscription list of UNITY before March 1, the beginning of a new volume, and therefore we wish to offer our friends a sufficient inducement to help us bring this about.

It has been urged on us that a dollar offer is the most attractive to those who order by mail, on account of the convenience of slipping a dollar bill into a letter instead of taking the trouble to procure a bank draft or postal order. We shall be glad to test this theory, and therefore make the following offer:

Send us one dollar, with the name of a new subscriber to UNITY for eight months, and we will send a copy of "The Evolution of Immortality," free by mail. If you can induce a friend to subscribe, the book will cost you nothing. If not, you can get the book at the regular price, and make some one a present of UNITY without further outlay.

This advertisement will meet the eyes of some who are not subscribers. If any such will send one dollar with his own subscription for eight months, we will send the book as before described.

The foregoing offer applies only to new subscriptions, not to renewals. But if any subscriber not in arrears will send us his renewal for a year with $1.50, and 50 cents additional, or $2.00 in all, we will send a copy of the book.

These offers hold good until March 1.

MASON & HAMLIN ORGANS.

The cabinet organ was introduced in its present form by Mason & Hamlin in 1861. Other makers followed in the manufacture of these instruments, but the Mason & Hamlin Organs have always maintained their supremacy as the best in the world.

Mason & Hamlin offer, as demonstration of the unequalled excellence of their organs, the fact that at all of the great World's Exhibitions, since that of Paris, 1867, in competition with best makers of all countries, they have invariably taken the highest honors. Illustrated catalogues free.

PIANOS.

Mason & Hamlin's Piano Stringer was introduced by them in 1882, and has been pronounced by experts the "greatest improvement in pianos in half a century."

A circular, containing testimonials from three hundred purchasers, musicians, and tuners, sent, together with descriptive catalogue, to any applicant. Pianos and Organs sold for cash or easy payments; also rented.

THE WOMAN'S TRIBUNE

Published Weekly by

CLARA BEWICK COLBY, EDITOR,

BEATRICE, NEBRASKA.

Subscription Price, $1.00 a year. Sample copies, five weeks for 10 cents. Single copies, 5 cents.

THE WOMAN'S TRIBUNE was founded in 1868. It has a wide circulation and many able writers among its contributors. It gives reports of woman suffrage conventions and of legislation relating to women, and its departments of law, hygiene, literature, etc., make it interesting to all classes of readers.

Persons in sympathy with the work of the National Woman Suffrage Association—Elizabeth Cady Stanton, president; Susan B. Anthony, vice-president—will find it, as also all official announcements, duly recorded in the WOMAN'S TRIBUNE. Every person interested in the effort to obtain political, legal and industrial equality for women should become subscribers. Readers are invited to send items of news and names for sample copies.

PREMIUM.

For a club of twenty new yearly subscribers to the WOMAN'S TRIBUNE the three splendid volumes of the Woman Suffrage History will be furnished in cloth as a premium. For a club of twenty-five the same bound in leather.

Liberal cash premiums will be given to canvassers. The WOMAN'S TRIBUNE and UNITY to one address one year for $2.10.

A STUDY OF PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY.

BY LEWIS G. JANES.

320 pages. 8vo. Cloth. Gilt top. Price $1.50

"No fairer statement has been made of the grounds on which the anti-supernaturalist Humanitarian bases his opinion of Jesus and of the origin of Christianity. * * Its theology and christology are of the most radical Unitarian kind; but the temper and the spirit of the book are so refined, so earnest, and so fair to all opponents, that it must impress those who are compelled to disagree with its most prominent conclusions as a model of polite and generous controversial writing."—Brooklyn Union.

THE OLD FARM HOME.

A SHADOW OF A POEM.

BY ABBIE M. GANNETT.

In description and reminiscence, Mrs. Gannett is at her best. Some of the lines are worthy to be of the pen of Whittier.—Boston Transcript.

A daily volume that will appeal to the heart of many a man and woman whose tenderest memories of childhood are bound up in such a home.—Christian Register.

The even flow of the narrative is broken by song or lyric which bring a memory, an inspiration, or a thought, as part of the history, and will make many a wanderer from New England look back to the old farm home through a mist of tender tears.—The Universalist.

Cloth, blue and gold. 88 16mo. pages, printed on tinted paper. Mailed to any address on receipt of price, 75 cents, by Unity Hymns and Chorals.

NEW EDITION, CLOTH, GILT TITLE, WITH ADDED INDICES, JUST READY.

This is the standard hymn book used among the Western Unitarian churches, and its merits and low price (only 25 cents in quantities) are rapidly extending its use among Unitarian and Universalist churches everywhere. The book contains 253 hymns and 66 tunes. By a simple device, any tune may be brought opposite any hymn,—a special advantage for untrained congregations, who can thus use a few familiar tunes for a variety of hymns.

Specimen copy mailed to any address for 35 cents, postpaid. To churches, in quantities of twelve or more, 25 cents each, expressage or freight to be paid by purchaser.

[NUMBER 26.]

EDITORIAL.

THE cross has no healing power until it is taken up and carried. To the hand that seizes it there is warmth; to the soul that bears it there is strength.

THE Indian Messenger, published in Calcutta, is elated over the success of the work done by the Pundita Ramabai in America, and says: "The training she is receiving is just the thing needed to fit her for the arduous duties of a reformer and philanthropic worker in her own country."

A WRITER in the Ymofynydd, the organ of the Welsh Unitarians, quotes Spurgeon as having once said that he "smoked to the glory of God," but thinks that that is a dangerous line of justification, and asks the pertinent question: "How can a minister effectively preach self-denial while he himself conspicuously practices self-gratification?"

THE least justifiable of all bigotry to-day is Unitarian bigotry, because the chief justification of Unitarianism lies in the fact that it is a protest against bigotry; it is an appeal from external authority to internal sincerity. In all questions of dispute, the Unitarian should "move the previous question,—the question of right doing and loving."

THE London News says: "An American critic is very angry with Mr. Browning because that gentleman's poetry is unintelligible to him. Mr. Browning might use the retort of another great poet, and reply, that 'the clearest handwriting is not decipherable by twilight,' but he will probably preserve a dignified silence. It seems hard that a man can't write as he likes, since no obligation is imposed on anybody to read him."

WHAT a grand idea of the patience of God does the new science furnish us when it tells of the slow progress of man's growth on this one little planet! Eighty thousand years, perhaps, since the primitive savage first showed his manhood by chipping a stone for a tool! If he has waited a hundred thousand years for the first glimmering of conscience, may we not learn to have patience with our own struggling generation?

Is conscience the "voice of God in the soul of man?" Of course He does not dictate human action. That is left to the individual judgment. Through whatever way it has come, whether through the slow process of growth, becoming stronger by every act of obedience, or not, the sense of obligation in conscience tells of a Will not our own. But how do we know that Will is worthy of trust? Only by trusting.

A CORRESPONDENT to the Germantown Telegraph, alluding to the reception given to Mr. and Mrs. Clifford, spoken of in our news column, indulges in the following bit of prophecy, based on history, which runs so parallel with UNITY's faith and aims that we are anxious to pass his words along to our readers: "Looking upon this scene, I could not but contrast it with the impossibility of such a gathering as this twenty years ago, when the word 'Unitarian' carried with it an opprobrium which few outside of its pale had the courage to question. The growth, as far as numbers, has been slow, but as regards influence it has been sure and strong; it has gone out as a leavening process, removing barriers, widening thought, and strengthening reason,—that soul-given quality of man. The world perhaps is loth to admit this truth, but Unitarianism has liberalized the orthodox church, as homeopathy has mitigated the doses of allopathy. With this liberalizing of thought, this bringing together of all denominations in generous expression of good will, evinces to my mind the dawn of true Christianity—the expression of brotherly love, the keynote of Jesus's teachings. And this is the lesson of the hour!—a dawning of that millennium when all sects can meet and clasp hands on the common but sacred ground of 'love to God and love to man.'"

A PRIVATE letter suspects that the following story "is too profane for the pages of UNITY," but we think it contains so much pathos and tender humanity that our readers will not think it irreverent. A kindly woman, before whose place of business a small squad of Salvation Army people had marched for months, was aroused on one of the bitter nights in January once more with the tambourines and the "Jesus marching" song. And the kindly voice of the motherly soul artlessly said: "There they go again, poor creatures! Still a following Jesus. I do hope they will soon overtake that man!"

WE are not disturbed by the apparent alarm in some quarters, lest either our Unity Clubs or our Unitarian Churches will lose their sanity over Browning any more than over Emerson, Socrates or the Book of Job; eventually all these will go for just what they are worth; but from time to time, as space permits, we will continue to offer such helps to the study of all these students of soul as come in our way, to show that there is sense even in the most forbidding of the Browning poems to those who apply sense to the study of the same; we print elsewhere the results of such a search among the lines which even the Browning student is generally inclined to skip, "The Prince Hohenstiel-Schwangau."

THIS bugle note of alarm from the New York Observer, the organ of the Presbyterians, is a significant sound to all won to the liberal fold of faith and more rational modes of thinking: "Unimportant, unsubstantial, ephemeral as 'new theology' may appear to the historian or philosopher, it is nevertheless a power in the present. It has taken possession of some of the heights of Zion in New England. Not only at Andover, but in New Haven, it is an appreciable element in the religious atmosphere of the churches and the schools. It is influential in some of the churches in Boston. It is believed to have a standing in other theological seminaries where its position is not prominent." The heaven is working, almost faster, the pessimist might say, than we could have hoped. And that the new theology "is believed to have a standing" in seminaries not openly given over, is good orthodox evidence of a fact long since patent to impartial and intelligent observers.

THE idea of ownership has been of incalculable assistance in the evolution of society. But all the history of evolution teaches us that even the most helpful of human ideas must pass away and give place to others broader and deeper. Property rights can not be the eternal basis of social laws, because they are not adequate measures of the soul-realities. What if the next great advance in social evolution were to substitute trusteeship for ownership, property as an obligation, not an indefeasible right! This is the higher law of the Gospel: Life is a trust put into thy hands. "Give account of thy stewardship." There is food for thought in this passage from Morgan's Ancient Society: "Since the advent of civilization the outgrowth of property has been so immense, its forms so diversified, its uses so expanding and its management so intelligent in the interests of its owners that it has become, on the part of the people, an unmanageable power."

The human mind stands bewildered in the presence of its own creation. The time will come, nevertheless, when human intelligence will rise to the mastery over property and define the obligations of its owners. A mere property career is not the final destiny of mankind, if progress is to be the law of the future as it has been of the past. The time which has passed away since civilization began is but a fragment of the past duration of man's existence, and but a fragment of the ages to come. The dissolution of society bids fair to become the termination of a career of which property is the end and aim; because such a career contains the elements of self-destruction."

THE following bit, which is going the rounds of the papers, recently lit up at least one Emerson class, and it is good enough to make a text for a searching talk in many other Emerson classes,—perhaps to suggest to some one the possibility of starting an Emerson class, which means the bringing together of a certain number of souls in the sincerity of the spirit, the acuteness of intellect and that fellowship of heart that will transfigure common problems and shames the common flippancies of life. "An old washerwoman in Concord, at work one day, as it began to grow dark unrolled her sleeves and said she must go home and get ready for Mr. Emerson's lecture. 'Why, are you not too tired to go?' she was asked. 'Oh, no, indeed; it always rests me,' was the reply. 'But do you understand what the lecture is about?' continued her questioner. 'Well—no,' was the answer; 'but it does me good to see him stand up there looking so beautiful and telling us all we are just as good as he is!'"

PROFESSOR BLACKIE says, in his article on "Festivals," in the Encyclopædia Britannica: "To trace the festivals of the world through all their variations, would be to trace the entire history of human religion and human civilization." This is strikingly illustrated in the festival of St. Valentine, just celebrated,—the lightest and most secular festival of the year; but even this leads us back of Christianity; back of Rome itself to the old Lupercan festival held on the Palatine hill in honor of Lupercus, the "Protector from Wolves,—" the divinity of a shepherd people. The feast of the Lupercalia came at nesting time, when the currents of life began to flow more genially; when the flocks went forth in search of tender grass. The story of the festival all the way down is instinct with humanity, and the childish prattle of to-day is the distant echoes of old time reverences. Their mirth is the silvery refrain of antique solemnity. The frivolities of this week lead us back to the temple door, and the study of them enlarges and deepens the life.

WHY did not somebody think of it before? Mr. Simmons, the president of the Board of Education for the city of New York, is in the way of making himself famous by his suggestion of putting the American flag into all the public school-rooms of America. His "reform" is greeted with enthusiasm from all parts of the country. In connection with this, it is suggested to make a regular feature of patriotic songs and the celebrating of National anniversaries in our public schools. When we remember what a large population of foreign birth there is to be educated in this country, and that there are thousands of native born children of German and Scandinavian parents who can not read or even understand the English language, we continue to wonder why this thing had not been thought of before. While so many school boards are agitated over the question of German in the public schools, it may be well for some one to move the introduction of "United States" into the schools, whose main purpose ought to be the making of intelligent and noble citizens of the United States.

THE Andover Review for February gives to the much-abused, so-called "lost" heathen a great message of hope. We clip from it the following editorial statement of no uncertain sound: "The theory which confines the redemptive work of the spirit to this life, not only runs counter to the current of Biblical representations of the nature and purpose of that work, but empties history of its religious sincerity and reality. . . . Probably the chief reason which now holds men back from admitting this 'hypothesis' [of the spirit's temporal mission beyond the limit of death] is its supposed bearing on the seriousness of present opportunity under the gospel. But a right conception of the spirit's mission would supply the necessary cautions, and at the same time avoid fettering it with conditions which, to say the least, are apparently incompatible with its true and glorious universality." A little more generous taking down of the bars and the whole flock of the fear-stricken, honest doubters, who have so long trembled before their conception of divine justice, may once more lift hopeful eyes to the future.

Editorial Wanderings.

Last week the senior editor was on wheels again. After launching his own Unity Club on Monday evening into the study of George Eliot's "Felix Holt," with a paper on the same, and enjoying with his Tuesday evening class that most brilliant chapter of John Fiske on the "Genesis of Man Intellectually," he severed unceremoniously the many subtle and vital strings that bound him to Unity and All Souls, and took the cars Wednesday morning at 8:30 and enjoyed a vacation of five hours, at the end of which time he was landed at Lafayette, Ind., the seat of the Purdue University. This represents one-third of the higher educational institution of the state. The industrial and technical branch. The literary and classic third is at Bloomington, and the Normal third at Terre Haute. It was in the afternoon that he visited this institution, resting placidly upon the ample lawn of its two hundred acres' experimental farm—"the richest land in the world, the best of the Wabash lands, which is the best anywhere," is the way they put it. The class rooms were closed, but the boys were at work in the shops. Lathes and circle saws, forges, pattern-making tools and molding troughs made bright the eyes and flushed the cheeks, that somehow we feel have a pathetic tendency to be sad and blanched in Indiana,—the land of malaria, the ancestral home of the ague, and the traditional market for quinine and cholagogue. How manly did these boys look at their benches, how easily did it seem in that presence to make toil classic and to compel labor to give cultured dignity to the laborer. But Purdue believes in co-education, and there are girls on the campus and in the halls, bright, healthy, legitimately boisterous. The catalogues and programmes, as well as the testimony of the professors, show that they carry off their full share of the honors of the institution, and that they are equal to its tasks; and when we went in search for their manual training and technical culture, we found traces of it in rather cramped quarters, where some creditable wood-carving is being done—oak leaf ornaments for bedsteads, rosettes for the corners of looking-glasses, etc. We found a bright class at work painting in oils a vase that stood on the stand, and learned that they have opportunities to train their fingers in modeling and drawing. This is very well. We hope that the public spirit of the place leads the boys to seek these same things; but why should not a girl know how to saw to a mark and to drive a nail without hitting her thumb? Why should she not learn how to dovetail a box, make the pattern in wood, and even mold the same in sand? None of these tasks require as much muscle as washing clothes, ironing or sweeping; and if there is brain culture in this kind of activities for young men, why should not the young women avail themselves of the same discipline? We were told that there is nothing to prohibit girls from taking such training at Purdue, except that the girls do not ask for it. They have not quite courage enough to take it. We wait for the girls who will have courage enough to take these tempting, life-giving courses of instruction offered in our technical institutions. There are fine careers waiting such girls.

But Purdue is not unmindful of the wealth of letters, and Mrs. MacRae, the Professor of English Literature, is wise enough to take her classes into those fields where help is needed, rather than waste the college years in the reading of those things that need no study, and the acquiring of facts and dates which can always be kept within reaching distance in a $15 encyclopædia. Her classes have wrestled with Emerson's "Nature" and cognate thought and writers, and are just now entering upon the study of Browning, to aid and abet which was the object of the editor's visit. Perhaps 150 people gathered in the lecture room of the second Presbyterian church down town in the evening, the faculty and students of the college being well represented. Thursday evening he told the same story to a parlor full of people in Indianapolis, in the hospitable home of Mr. and Mrs. Horace McKay, and in the afternoon had time to visit the phenomenal Plymouth church, shaped and directed by the independent minister, Oscar McCulloch. Some friend, mingling an architectural fling with a spiritual compliment, has dubbed this church, "The Providence Depot," so unconventional is it in form, so full of benefactions is it in its activities. Here the "gates are never shut by day." Institute work, like that of the Athenæum in this city, the Charity Organization Society, and lecture-room work, with many fresh and vital phases of church life, are all realized in this building.

Friday morning the editor breakfasted at home. On Saturday morning he was again on wheels, leaving his own pulpit in the hands of Secretary Effinger for Sunday morning, and Mrs. Jones for Sunday evening while he went to inaugurate the University course of Liberal Lectures and Sermons at Champaign, the seat of the Illinois State University. This work is inaugurated by the combined efforts of the Illinois State Unitarian Conference and the American Unitarian Association, the former giving time and labor, the latter paying the incidental expenses. Prof. S. A. Forbes, State Entomologist, chairman of the local committee, had the plans well matured, and, although the weather was of a kind to dampen ardor, over 200 people were out at Armory Hall to listen to the lecture Saturday night, Professor Peabody, Regent of the University, introducing the speaker. On Sunday afternoon the Congregationalists hospitably tendered the use of their church, and over a hundred people were present. All the indications are that good will come of this movement. Six fortnightly visits are arranged for this spring, and six more for next autumn. The editor's coach called for him at 2 A.M., and the wheels brought him home to a Monday morning breakfast.

"We See as We Are"—in Men.

"Let me go where'er I will,
I hear a sky-born music still:
'Tis not in the high stars alone,
Nor in the cups of budding flowers,
Nor in the redbreast's mellow tone,
Nor in the bow that smiles in showers,—
But in the mud and scum of things
There alway, alway something sings."

So said the listening Emerson. And the song that he heard in "the mud and scum of things," the ear is growing in many men to hear. Oppressions linger, and crimes and ignorance abound among us,—still, look around, and then look back, to see how the spirit of society toward its younger and poorer members and lower classes and more degraded races is changing for the better. The change will be a cause, but it is also, and it is first, the consequence of a finer moral tone within ourselves. "We see as we are." In men to-day we are seeing more because we are more ourselves; because the average amount of manhood incarnate in 150 pounds of flesh and bones and nerves is greater than it used to be.

For example, the school: the "New Education" assumes that the child is a being all wings and faculties, and that the teacher's part is not to put knowledge into a mind-box, but to tempt the wings and faculties to grow. To the right-seeing teacher the school of to-day is an angel-garden. Again, the prison has long been the den where the most dangerous could be herded out of society's sight; for those whose fangs proved most injurious nothing better than killing could be devised. It is not the discovery of this century that our criminals are men and women like ourselves, that souls and consciences go behind the barred gates and into the striped clothes; but only after all these centuries of growth have our eyes come to see that fact plainly enough for us to think of prisons as reform schools, and of reform schools as a kind of public home. To-day the aim in the best prisons is nothing less than to create a citizen,—to give back to society a self-supporting, self-controlling, self-respecting man in place of the untamed creature that went in. The sacredness of the human being is growing in our eyes, and we see more to respect in these our troublers, because we have more to respect in ourselves; we are more, and as we are, we see. So, too, with the treatment of the insane, and of those maimed from their birth in mind. It is but a century since men saw in them beings past the touch of reasonable and kind address. To-day we watch miracles of resurrection wrought by the touches of human sympathy and human patience. The insane asylums of our land have been radically changing the last ten years to adapt them to the system followed so successfully in certain English and Scotch asylums,—a system of unbarred windows, scarcely locked doors, open fire-places, and homelike entertainments for the maimed in senses: think of a Dr. Howe feeling his way to Laura Bridgeman's imprisoned soul, and finding that soul, and bringing it forth to society along the pathway of a single sense,—the sense of touch, left in the palm of Laura's hand. The feeling for and finding of Lieutenant Greeley in that hidden cove of the wild iceberg land was nothing to it. Dr. Howe's act of discovery is the type both of the science and the humanity of this century.

And thus it is in all our relations with each other, all human relations. The nation's conscience has at last begun to stir, even in our relations with the Indian. The savagery of war grows more horrid in the light of Healing Commissions and Peace Tribunals. Yes, even the savagery of that minor war that with audacious honesty we call "sport"—I mean the war man makes upon the races lower than himself, the tribes of brute and bird and fish; the "war" on them in mere pursuit of human fun,—bear-baiting, bull-fights, fox-hunting, pigeon-matches, squirrel-matches, and the common hunting and the common fishing, too; for, so far as these last are done for sport, they have to class with those discarded cruelties; and war, again, upon these humbler lives in mere pursuit of human decoration,—women's feathers; even this, I say, is growing over-bloody for nineteenth-century eyes, over-thoughtless for nineteenth-century minds and hearts. In the very brutes we are descrying more man-likeness, and in their natures ground for applying the Golden Rule, "Do by them as you would be done by were you a brute," as fast as we become more man ourselves.

Within a young man's memory the word "slavery" has become an abomination in people's ears. Garrison's motto no longer seems too strong,—"a covenant with Death and an agreement with Hell." John Brown "wins the world through shame." The readjustment of the laborer's relation to capital is the great question at issue now; no doubt will be the great question for the next few hundred years, for it is but the modern form in which the mediæval, or rather the chronic, problem of emancipation confronts the civilization of to-day. How it stared us in the face here in Chicago when those men, martyrs in their own eyes of a sacred cause, were waiting death! Death which will brand our civilization two hundred years hence,—murderer-martyrs though they be, and necessary as it is that in some way bomb-throwers be disabled from trying again their deadly ways of reformation. But the fact that so many of our best minds are already engaged upon the problem in full sympathy with the laborer, shows how different our vision of what have been called the "lower classes" is from that which has hitherto prevailed. Now, even when a prophet like Carlyle speaks slightly of the masses,—"England is twenty-seven millions, mostly fools,"—and especially when he writes of ourselves, "America is eighteen million bores," we only laugh and pity the seer. When Emerson speaks of the "guano-races" of mankind, we remember his "Boston Hymn" and the other noble utterances, and that his grim phrase is but the terse way of stating a half-truth. Never before, I suppose, has there been such a widespread hopefulness for mankind's future on the earth, or off the earth, and never so much charity of heart and helping of hand to those men and classes and races who seem the farthest down among their brothers.

"Power to become sons of God!" What grander text in all the Bibles of the world than that one out of John's mystic explanation of the Divine Light that has transformed the world from chaos to order, and men from brutishness to glory! "Power to become sons of God,"—it is the great cry ringing through all the earnest struggles upward of the oppressed, and the great inspiration which nerves every man to do his utmost by and for and with a poorer friend. "We see as we are:" do men appeal to us in this way as beings with power in them to become the sons of God? Are the streets full of souls to us, or only of bodies more or less clean, more or less agreeable, more or less fashionably clothed? A look of scorn in my eyes, a feeling of indifference or contempt in my heart, at any ignorance or shame I might see in a shanty or a street car, would convict me to myself of being something like what I thought I saw. If I were the son of God, I should see the sonship in all others, even in those bomb-throwers. Or look from streets right into our own homes: how is it with the children and the sick and the feebler-minded, in our homes? What do we "see" in them? The slowness and the bother and the ill-temper and the weak will? If that be all, then alas for us! "We see what we are;" and he who sees no more than that reveals how little more there is within himself. The best man thinks the best of others. Perhaps the secret of Jesus's power with the common people was that of many another of their best teachers,—he saw more in them than less pure eyes saw. If we use the name "God," then, because God stands for best of all, none thinks so much of you as he! It must be so, according to this law of insight; and is not that encouraging?

The Christ sees white in Judas' heart,
And loves his traitor well;
The God, to angel some new heaven,
Explores his lowest hell.

Through the degradation and the ignorance and the sin the pure eye pierces to the live soul deep within,—that slumbering embryo in which humanity and civilization and eternal life lie folded up. And if ever we feel despondent at the long delays of history and the seeming worm-likeness of human life, the trouble may be that we are seeing too much as we are ourselves. Perhaps we had better murmur to ourselves the verse from Mrs. Whitney's poem about the "larvæ," and with humility we may regain our patience:

"What if God's great angels whose waiting love
Beholdeth my pitiful life below
From the holy heights of their heaven above,
Couldn't bear with this worm till its wings do grow?"

CONTRIBUTED AND SELECTED.

Sea-Mosses.

Frail, delicate sea-moss,
Born where the wild tides toss,
Where pale pink coral clings,
Where mermaids and sea-kings
Sport, laughterless and mute,
With dolphin, shark and newt,
Or cleave the cool, green tide
By the sea serpent's side—
Crude, undeveloped thing,
Created but to cling
To some rude, ragged rock
That breasts the ocean's shock—
What message have you brought Meet for a poet's thought?

Softly the silence stirred
In answer to my word:
"In Nature's lowest forms,
As highest, God's love warms
And thrills the universe;
In love all being stirs—
The savage beast's low cry,
The poet's threnody
Are one, when once is shown
God's life in Nature's own.
From sea worlds up to suns
One loving purpose runs;
Seas roll, worlds swing, stars shine
By the same love divine
That thrills my life and thine,
My message, God's—His, mine."

JULIA MILLS DUNN.

What Can Unitarianism Do for the Heathen?

The above question was asked, but not answered, by the Christian Advocate, in its issue of December 29, 1887. Had the writer of that remarkable article asked, "What can Unitarianism not do for the heathen?" his reply to a self-made inquiry might have been as satisfactory to others as the attempted reply was presumably to him. Perhaps the writer is still anxiously seeking light as to the possibilities of the "ism" which he so ridicules, and the following suggestions may be of service to this inquirer, and perhaps to some others:

First. Unitarianism can carry correct views of God to the heathen. It can teach and preach that "God is love," that He is a "present help in time of trouble," that they shall have none other gods but him, that He is a Father, Saviour and Friend. This will work a great reformation among heathens who have long sat in gloom over ideas of an omnipotent butcher and revengeful fireman,—ideas which were unknown in foreign lands, until popular Christianity had planted its banners within their bounds.

Second. Unitarianism can carry to the heathen correct ideas of the unchangeable nature of God. It will not represent God as now loving, now angry, cruel, hateful. It will not represent Him as now present to bless, and now absent from his needy creatures. It will teach that God is always near and at hand to bless and cheer all classes of men whenever they call upon Him. It will teach that God's love is that of both father and mother, in its abiding and tender nature; nor will it confuse the mind of the heathen by preaching the existence of three gods, all sovereign, equal in power, yet so divided as to render it difficult to know whom to worship.

Third. Unitarianism can carry to the heathen a salvation which saves men, not in their sins, but from them. It will demand righteousness of the individual, and not goodness based upon another better than himself. It will demand confession and repentance as means of atonement, such as is genuine and followed by an upright life, rather than a reliance upon an innocent substitute. It will never make the pure Jesus a scapegoat for the sins of men, but leave him as an example for all time, and as one in whom God was manifest as He can be in others.

Fourth. Unitarianism can preach an immortality full of hope in foreign lands, as it can and does at home. It will not preach hope to its intelligent auditors at home, and preserve hell for its inferior hearers abroad. It will be honest the world over. It will eventually overthrow the idea that the creatures of God, to the extent of millions, will, in a future state, cry out for mercy from burning brimstone, to receive mocking responses from their Creator. It will teach that the Maker of us all is less a devil than they have in many instances already been taught. It will teach that punishment is corrective, and that it ceases upon the accomplishment of its purpose. God deliver us from theological bondage. God send us more laborers into the world's great harvest, laborers that shall be both sane and sound, sincere and zealous.

Fifth. Unitarianism can accept service from natives who will be loyal to God and to conscience—who will be true to all that is good in the Koran, the writings of Buddha, and who will gladly teach and preach all that is beautiful and good in the Bible. Unitarianism will insist upon loyalty to conscience, as superior to stooping to churches, creeds and forms, and can, if it will, accomplish wonders among heathens as yet unknown to missionaries of any nation, sect or name.

Lastly, if the "ism" to which our inquirer belongs makes hell a necessary part of its gospel, the "greatest good it can do for both itself and the world is to efface itself as quickly as possible." When that "ism" emphasizes practical religion as much as it does formal, then shall we gladly regard it as a competent instructor, and readily lend our ears to the lips of its teachers.

E. W. SYMONDS.

Browning's Statesman.

PRINCE HOHENSTIEL-SCHWANGAU, SAVIOR OF SOCIETY.

Those of us who are inclined to demand "reform" very urgently from our public men and legislators, will do well to study this presentation of the point of view of a statesman. Both have their place: he who boldly agitates a moral question and he who brings about a practical advance in its treatment—Garrison to thunder against slavery and Lincoln to accomplish emancipation. It is well to understand the motives and acknowledge the services of both. In this poem we find Browning's idea of the latter.

Hohenstiel-Schwangau's "revelment of myself" begins with his rule of life:

"Namely, that just the creature I was bound
To be, I should become, nor thwart at all God's purpose in creation."

He is not one of the rare regenerative natures, but

"A conservator call me, if you please,
Not a creator or destroyer; one
Who keeps the world safe.
Some dervish desert-spectre, swordsman, saint,
Lawgiver, lyrist,—oh, we know the names!
Quite other these than I. Our time requires
No such strange potentate,—who else would dawn,—
No fresh force till the old have spent itself."

Here is encouragement for those many faithful workers who can not originate, but endeavor to popularize and deepen the appreciation of the great originators:

"To shoot a beam into the dark, assists:
To make that beam do fuller service, spread
And utilize such bounty to the height,
That assists also,—and that work is mine."

He has held the balance straight for twenty years, not representing this or the other interest.

"Neither friend would I content,
Nor, as the world were simply meant for him,
Thrust out his fellow and mend God's mistake."

No upheaval of society does he want, and no "hazarding the main result by hoping to anticipate one-half in the intermediate process." Government must be for the mass of men.

"Oh those mute myriads that spoke loud to me,
The eyes that craved to see the light, the mouths
That sought the daily bread and nothing more,
The hands that supplicated exercise,
Men that had wives, and women that had babes,
And all these making suit to only live!"

Theorists from all sides cry out with what Spencer calls "the must-do-something plea." He replies that once upon a time he himself

"Was like all you, mere voice and nothing more," crying,

"Unfettered commerce! Power to speak and hear,
And print and read! The universal vote!
Its rights for labor!"

but

"Once pedestaled on earth,
To act, not speak, I found earth was not air.
I saw that multitude of mine, and not
The nakedness and nullity of air,
Fit only for a voice to float in free."

Yet these mute myriads did not make him "believe one whit less in belief, take truth for falsehood," nor cry for bread alone.

"Not bread alone, but bread before all else
For these; the bodily want serve first," said I."

Here is a hint to help those dwellers in a great city who are distracted by widely varying calls for their help. Men need help in intellectual life, in morals, in religion. The richest in money are often poorest in inner life. And yet so long as there are "men with the wives and women with the babes, and all these making suit to only live," why, then, "The bodily want serve first," say I, and keep up the charity section in your church, even if the Browning club languish. For if the body be not cared for in

"Earth's space and the lifetime,
Where is the good of body having been?"

He will

"Resolve to let my body live its best,
And leave my soul what better yet may be
Or not be, in this life or afterward."

It would be too long to describe how Hohenstiel-Schwangau carries out his aims, in spite of many temptations from Sagacity to secure present good at the sacrifice of the future, to

"Imperil, for a problematic cure
Of grievance on the surface, any good
I' the deep of things, dim yet discernible."

This is his answer:

"Least, largest, there's one law for all the minds,
Here or above; be true at any price!
'Tis just o' the great scale, that such happy stroke
Of falsehood would be found a failure."

Though a believer in peace, and describing the "Jingo" temper with indignation, he finds war necessary.

"Hear the truth, and bear the truth,
And bring the truth to bear on all you are
And do, assured that only good comes thence,
Whate'er the shape good take! While I have rule,
Understand!—war for war's sake, war for the sake
O' the good war gets you as war's sole excuse,
Is damnable and damned shall be."

But

"For truth and right and only right
And truth,—right, truth, on the absolute scale of God,
No pettiness of man's admeasurement,
In such case only, and for such one cause
Fight your hearts out, whatever fate betide
Hands energetic to the uttermost!
Lie not! Endure no lie which needs your heart
And hand to push it out of mankind's path!"

That has a ring like our Lowell's "To front a lie in arms and not to yield." And thus he governed.

"For the many first,
The poor mean multitude, all mouths and eyes;
Bid the few, better favored in the brain,
Be patient, nor presume on privilege,
Help him, or else be quiet,—never crave
That he help them, increase, forsooth, the gulf
Yawning so terribly 'twixt mind and mind
I' the world here, which his purpose was to block
At bottom, were it by an inch, and bridge,
If by a filament, no more, at top."

Thus he did his part;

"The man's, with might
And main, and not a faintest touch of fear,
Sure he was in the hand of God, who comes Before and after, with a work to do
Which no man helps nor hinders."

FLORENCE F. GRISWOLD.

THE idea that education is dangerous to religion and morals is the fear of a timorous and sceptical person, who secretly suspects that religion and morality have no solid basis, and that if too much light is let in, people will find it out. It is half-education that is dangerous. It was a wise man who said that a little learning tends to make people sceptical, but profounder knowledge inclines them to faith.—Woman's Journal.

Give.

"Good Teacher, what shall I do that I may inherit eternal life?" (Mark x: 17; Revised Version, marginal reading.) Jesus first repudiates the adjective "good," as savoring too much of worship. "None is good save one, even God." He does not tell the inquirer to believe, but "Thou knowest the commandments: Do not kill, Do not commit adultery, Do not steal, Do not bear false witness, Do not defraud, Honor thy father and thy mother." These six commands pertain to the duties of man to his fellow man, or to morality. The other four commands, based on man's relation to Jehovah, are not mentioned.

According to Jesus, then, morality is the prime requisite to one who would "inherit eternal life." The closing passage in Mark makes belief the prime requisition; but even orthodox scholars confess that the passage is probably spurious, as any one can see by consulting the Revised Version. Satisfied with the good morals of the man, Jesus "loved him," and said unto him, "One thing thou lackest: go, sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the poor." What was lacking? Not morals, but love. He had been a hard-faced, strictly just and in every way moral and a worshiping man; but had not concerned himself for poverty-ground humanity. He had grown rich in a land where poverty constrained men to pray "Give us this day our daily bread"—no provisions in the cellar and no money in the bank (very different from the case of the well-to-do, who now use that prayer three times on Sunday) and where people were so poor that if a woman lost a little piece of money she lighted a candle and searched till she found it, and then called in her neighbors, saying, "rejoice with me for I have found the piece which was lost."

This man, then, though moral and a worshiper of Jehovah, had never learned love's lesson, that "It is more blessed to give than receive." He would not take a penny more than belonged to him; neither would he give one that did belong to him. Jesus tells him that if he would live on in blessed memory in future ages, he must build himself a monument, not with stone, but with self-sacrificing deeds. As Stephen Girard lives to-day by Girard College, and J. Lewis Smithson by the Smithsonian Institute, and Peter Cooper by the Cooper Institute; as Jesus, himself, and Buddha live to-day in the thoughts and hearts of millions, so this man, if he would immortalize himself, must do it by the same means, and the only means, which in a good sense immortalizes other men, viz.; self-sacrifice. Give. Sell and give.

PERRY MARSHALL.

Resistance or Non-Resistance.

In an extract from Prof. E. D. Cope, published in UNITY, some time ago, I find these words: "If resistance to evil were more general, the world would be better." I say unto you, "Resist not evil," are the word of Jesus. Now do Jesus and Professor Cope teach antagonistic doctrines? If so, I must accept the teachings of Jesus rather than of Professor Cope. Did not the Shakers resist evil in the most effectual manner, and in the spirit of the precepts of Jesus, when, in their early history, they faced their persecutors, not with swords and clubs in their hands, but with stern and stinging rebuke, telling their persecutors that they were contending against the spirit of truth, against the teachings of Jesus, against their own sense of right, when they scourged, imprisoned, fined and tortured them for no crime of theirs, for no harm they had done, or wished to do, but because they worshipped God according to the dictates of their own conscience, and taught the members of their community to obey to the letter the precepts of Christ? It seems that this kind of resistance towards their enemies and persecutors proved effectual in quelling their hate and enmity, and soon made them their defenders and friends. We wish that Professor Cope would explain the exact methods we are to adopt in resisting evil. Are we to resist evil by doing evil? Is the old Mosaic code, "an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth," to be practiced now that Jesus has given us a different and, as we think, a better rule to go by? J. S. B.

Philanthropy.

If anything ail a man so that he does not perform his functions, if he has a pain in his bowels, even—for that is the seat of sympathy—he forthwith sets about reforming the world. Being a microcosm himself, he discovers—and it is a true discovery, and he is the one to make it—that the world has been eating green apples; to his eyes, in fact, the globe itself is a great green apple, which there is danger, awful to think of that the children of men will nibble before it is ripe; and straightway his drastic philanthropy seeks out the Esquimaux and the Patagonian, and embraces the populous Indian and Chinese villages; and thus, by a few years of philanthropic activity, the powers in the meanwhile using him for their own ends, no doubt, he cures himself of his dyspepsia, the globe acquires a faint blush on one or both of its cheeks, as if it were beginning to be ripe, and life loses its crudity and is once more sweet and wholesome to live.

I believe that what so saddens the reformer is not his sympathy with his fellows in distress, but, though he be the holiest son of God, is his private aid. Let this be righted, let the spring come to him, the morning rise over his couch, and he will forsake his generous companions without apology.

If, then, we would indeed restore mankind by truly Indian botanic, magnetic, or natural means, let us first be as simple and well as Nature ourselves, dispel the clouds which hang over our own brows, and take up a little life into our pores. Do not stay to be an overseer of the poor, but endeavor to become one of the worthies of the world.

—Henry D. Thoreau.

To do a piece of common Christian righteousness in a plain English word or deed; to make Christian law any rule of life, and found one national act or hope thereon,—we know too well what our faith comes to for that! You might sooner get lightning out of incense smoke than true action or passion out of your modern English religion. You had better get rid of the smoke and the organ pipes, both: leave them, and the Gothic windows, and the painted glass to the property man, and look after Lazarus at the door-step. For there is a true church wherever one hand meets another helpfully, and that is the only holy or Mother Church that ever was, or ever shall be.—Ruskin.

A New Version.

The child's prayer, "Now I lay me down to sleep," seems to regard "the Lord" as a stranger, certainly not as a relative. It puts fear of death into the mind of the little one, and that at the most unfavorable hour, if it were ever allowable, and suggests a doubt in regard to the child's well-being in case death should occur in sleep. Our little ones have used the following, which I offer, instead of the time-honored "Now I lay me:"

Now my Father, while I sleep,
Kindly watch-care o'er me keep;
When I wake in morning light,
Help me live the day aright.
Ever trusting in thy care,
May I feel thee everywhere;
I would see thy loving face,
I would thank thee for thy grace.

Record of Virtue.

William Bijlborough, an obscure member of Spurgeon's church, had a heart full of sincere though unobtrusive religion, and will be gratefully remembered by many women. In a back street he kept a second-hand furniture shop, in the window of which he placed the following notice: "Any poor and unfortunate sister that requires a good home, will she kindly inquire within?" He was the means of rescuing many, and he preserved a record of one hundred and forty-eight who persevered and are now honest women.—Journal of Woman's Work.

THE UNITY CLUB.

The Trial and Death of Socrates.

THIRD EVENING—"PHÆDO."

"That man should be of good courage about his soul, who, having adorned her with no foreign ornaments, but with those which alone befit her,—moderation and justice and courage and freedom and truth,—thus awaits his journey to the world below, ready to set forth whenever the voice of fate shall call him."

"Bury me just as you please, if you only get hold of me."

(1) Grammar Words. Noble sentences of the dialogue, from memory. A round-the-class exercise.

(2) Notes and Queries. Short oral explanations with reference to Æsop; Greek Slaves; the classic idea of Suicide; the Greek Mysteries; and what did Socrates mean by his last request?

(3) Paper. "Journeys to Purgatory, Heaven and Hell—by non-Christians and Christians."

See "Illustrations" at end of first volume of Longfellow's "Dante;" and Alger's "History of the Doctrine of a Future Life." Also at the close of Plato's "Republic," the story of Er and the revelation made to him.

After-talk.—Does metempsychosis seem to you unlikely? The immortality of brutes,—why not? What think you about personal pre-existence?

Read part of Wordsworth's ode,—"Intimation;" etc.

(4) Paper. "Plato's 'Phædo' and Emerson's 'Immortality.'"

The two essays analyzed and compared.

(5) Discussion and Readings.

(a) The fear of death: do many fear it? Who fear it most? Is the fearlessness of it proportioned to clearness of belief in immortality?

Read Robert Browning's "Prospice."

(b) Is our assurance of immortality—or our doubt of it—an instinct or a reasoned theory? What is your name for the assurance—is it hope, belief, faith, or knowledge?

(c) Which class of reasonings most confirms your faith,—The evidence appealing to the senses? (Jesus's resurrection, mediums, etc.)

Or the possibilities which physical science suggests? (Etherial bodies, evolution, etc. Such books as Tait and Stewart's "Unseen Universe," Fiske's "Destiny of Man," Stockwell's "Evolution of Immortality.")

Or arguments based on the nature of the Soul,—its instincts and powers? (Plato's, Emerson's, Wordsworth's, etc.)

Or those depending on the Moral Law? (Justice due to our implanted longings and our love; the law of compensation, etc.; the goodness of God.)

Read the close of Emerson's "Threnody." Does George Eliot's "Choir Invisible" satisfy you? And what say you to Matthew Arnold's sonnet, "Immortality?"

If the class will spend a second evening on this subject, Tennyson's "In Memoriam" and Robert Browning's "La Saisiaz," might each be made the theme of a paper and discussion.

FOURTH EVENING.—THE INFLUENCE OF SOCRATES.

"Such was the end of our friend, a man whom we may well call, of all men known to us of our day, the best, and, besides, the wisest and the most just."

(1) Bible Resemblances.—A round-the-class exercise. Those who have noted passages in the three dialogues akin to Bible words now compare their lists in the class.

After-talk. Is Christianity in all respects the higher faith? Take the question on three sides,—as to moral ideals, the thought of God, and the thought of immortality.

(2) Paper. "Socrates the Teacher, and his Influence."

His Subject: in what sense was he "parens philosophia?"—His method of "intellectual obstetrics;" his "two innovations;" in what sense was he "father of science?" Socrates and Bacon.—His theory of ethics, "virtue is knowledge." Was he a "utilitarian?" His moral ideals.—In what did his greatness lie? His place among the world's great thinkers.

After-talk.—Was the oracle right? Did he over-estimate his "mission?"

(3) Tributes to Socrates. What does the world think of him? Read short tributes.

For instance, what does Plato say of him at end of the "Phædo?" And Xenophon at end of the "Memorabilia?" And Cicero, in "Tusculan Disputations," v. 4? And John Stuart Mill, in his essay on "Liberty?" Grote, in his "History of Greece," VIII., 457, 488? Stanley, in his "History of the Jewish Church," III., 245, 252? Emerson, in the Plato chapter of "Representative Men?" etc.

(4) Paper. "Socrates and Jesus."

Compared as to outward circumstances; as to character; as teachers; as martyrs on trial and in death; as sources of influence.

After-talk.—Do you agree with your essayist? (All should read beforehand parts of the "Memorabilia" of Socrates, and re-read the Sermon on the Mount and the account of Jesus' trial and death, in the Gospels.)

THE STUDY TABLE.

Idols and Lyrics of the Ohio Valley.—By John James Piatt. Boston, Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.25

Mr. Piatt has done wisely in here collecting in one volume the poems bearing directly on western life, for he is pre-eminently the poet of the Ohio valley. The local color is perfect in every idyl, yet the whole landscape is bathed in "the light that never was on sea or land." Mr. Piatt's metres are severely simple; his effects are unstudied; he has the gift of seeing the poetry in everyday life. As direct and natural as Wordsworth, his is the subtle instinct the other sometimes lacks, which discriminates between the common and the commonplace.

The atmosphere of the book is the atmosphere of Indian summer, of dreamy reverie, of tender pathos, best illustrated by his own perfect quatrain, "Torchlight in Autumn:"

I lift this sumach bough with crimson flare,
And, touched with subtle pangs of dreamy pain,
Through the dark wood a torch I seem to bear
In Autumn's funeral train.

Non-Biblical Systems of Religion. A Symposium. New York: T. Whittaker, Bible House. Cloth, pp. 243.

This volume contains the following chapters: Ethnic Inspiration, by Archdeacon Farrar, D.D.; Ancient Egyptian Systems, by George Rawlinson, M.A.; Ancient Canaanite Religions, by Rev. William Wright, D.D.; Earlier Hellenic Religions, by Rev. Edwin Johnson, M.A.; The Jewish Faith, by Rabbi G. J. Emanuel, B.A.; Islam and Christianity, by Sir William Muir; Buddhism and Christianity, by T. W. Rhys-Davids, LL. D., Ph. D.; Ancient Scandinavian Religion, by Hon. Rasmus B. Anderson; Positivism as a Religion, by Prof. J. Radford Thomson, M. A.; The One Purely Moral Religion, by Rev. W. Nicolson, M.A.

The character of this book is guaranteed by the writers of its chapters. It is very interesting, full of information, and generally broad and catholic in its treatment of the subjects above mentioned. The book is a reprint of articles originally published in the Homiletic Magazine. It will prove of value to all students of comparative religion.

A Garland for Girls. By Louise M. Alcott. Roberts Brothers: Boston. Price, $1.25.

A collection of short stories. Each story is woven about the flower from which it takes its name. The lessons of self-sacrifice and kindness to others contained in these stories cannot fail to help the youthful readers, so earnestly are they presented by the author, who has endeared herself to girls.

UNITY CHURCH-DOOR PULPIT.

Love.

A SERMON PREACHED BY REV. J. LL. JONES, AT CHICAGO,
JANUARY 15, 1888.

(Published by the Congregation.)

He hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?—MICAH vi: 8.

II.

"TO LOVE MERCY."

"To love mercy." This is the second prophetic requirement of religion as stated by Micah. Without stopping to discuss texts and words I take this phrase at its largest, and will let it stand for love. This is another of those great words that can not be tethered. It refuses to be harnessed with any intellectual gear that the mind of man can shape for it. Like religion, it is one of the great verities that defies definition, because it is so intimate and integral a part of our life. It reaches deeper than experience can fathom and stretches higher than observation can follow. I will not attempt this morning to do what my betters have so often failed to do, viz.,—to shape the philosophy of love; no, I can neither analyze nor define it. Like the woman in the story who found her wholeness by touching the hem of the garment of that high embodiment of love whom we all do honor, I will be content if I may touch here and there the hem of love's ample garment, and be strengthened thereby. I will attempt first a few descriptive sentences; second, to discover a few of the obstacles in the way of love as an element in the religious life; third, point out a few of the signs of that love that is religion, or that religion which is love.

First,—remember what I have said before so often: I abandon the fruitless attempts at definitions here as elsewhere in the domain of religion. Not from emptiness, but from fullness, not because it is vague, but because it is overwhelming. Not because it is shadowy and intangible, but because it is substantial, that which stands under, the foundations that are ever out of sight if adequate. The quality of mercy which the prophet had in mind is that love which is too real for demonstration. At the risk of reiterating my words of last Sunday, I again say, that it is only the detached fragments of the universe, that which is remote from ourselves, that yield ready definitions and arrange themselves promptly in our classifications. The great cosmic realities, gravitation, electricity, spirit, thought, love, God, are known only as they touch us by first-hand connection; they are things of revelation not of definition, they are discovered only through experience; searching them we miss them so often; not finding them they are with us. Nay, we are of them, in them. We see the planets waltzing through the graceful changes of the heavenly dance, ever being precipitated one upon the other, but never colliding. We feel ourselves held solidly to our place, and trustingly resign ourselves to sleep in the arms of a force to which, in order to cover our ignorance, we give the name "gravitation." We thankfully accept the message that drops from the lightning-tipped pen, and shape our conduct accordingly; we seek another screen to hide our ignorance, and call the messenger electricity. This word in the hands of the most skillful scientist is like the pigeon-hole in your desk marked "miscellaneous," into which you put all papers that defy classification. The callow birdling in his nest feels the helpful ray and grows strong of wing in the heat of the sun, yet the closest student and greatest philosopher has been unable to wrest from that ray its innermost secret. So is it with love—one of the most intimate and universal experiences of life; nay, as the etymology of the word would perhaps indicate, it is life itself, and on this account it eludes the crucible of the dictionary-maker; whatever it is, it is one of the superlative forces in religion. It is the cement of history. It is the gravitation of the spirit that binds each to all. It is that which puts a moral meaning into everything. It is the glow from the central sun that warms everything. It is the radiance that touches with a wild and strange beauty the dank-est marsh and lights up the gloomiest forest. It is that which can flood the poorest soul with joy and make rich the most barren life. Love shelters without walls, love builds homes where no architect has reared them. Love sanctifies altars where no ceremonial waters have been sprinkled by priestly hands. Love makes a church where no spire is. It consecrates its priesthood without the help of bishop hands. Love commissions prophets who refuse to sign the creeds, and tips with inspiration words thrown out of glowing hearts in every clime and by every people. Love, and love alone makes worship spontaneous, heaven a present reality, every truth a treasure, and God an attraction instead of a terror,—a reality embedded in all real things, a presence in every present verity of matter and mind. Love is that positive force that polarizes all other forces; without it truth becomes a falsehood and justice tumbles over into injustice.

But why waste time in trying to describe that which you already know better than any description? Why try to characterize that the signs of which are manifest in every character? What is love? I do not know. But it is the anxiety which I see in the mother's eye and the tenderness in the father's touch. It twines the child's arm about your neck; it presses the little face close against the window pane, and keeps it waiting and watching there. It is that which binds distant hearts in close embrace, and, by its subtle existence, makes light burdens of heavy tasks and makes heroic hearts that, without it, would be draped with cowardice. Let me carry this search still closer to the earth. The love that is the requirement of God—an essential element of religion—is that which makes faithful the dog that clings through life to the dissolute man, which bends the neck of the faithful horse to receive the caresses of a child. That power that makes the most timid bird brave to fight for her brood is one in essence with that power that carries the soul in its unspeakable longings toward the Infinite. It is one with the thirst for the ineffable,—man's passion for things eternal. When we think of the distance which this Ineffable and the Eternal is away from us, we call it God; but when by love's light we are conscious of the nearness of these things, we call it our Father, and when we have the fullness of this mercy, this love, the "Our Father" breaks like the jet of water in the fountain into a thousand pearly words—wife, husband, son, daughter, brother, sister, dear, darling: every accent of endearment, every touch of tenderness is a confession of faith in God, a movement of spirit in prayer. It is the "Our Father" prayer reduced to the vernacular of home and our daily needs. In this way is the old inspiration of our Bible-maker verified in the new experiences of to-day. "Love is the fulfilling of the law." "He that loveth not is not of God." The truest and most searching name of Deity is that of love. Our homeliest experience justifies Paul's rhapsody, in which all gifts of knowledge and of prophecy are subordinated to the gifts of love.

The Dakota farmers, who last week wandered through the blinding blizzard tied together with ropes in search of missing school children, justified Paul's saying: "Greater than faith and hope is love." Without love, faith's anchor-cable snaps; without love the song of hope is hushed.

"Love God and man,—this great command
Doth on eternal pillars stand;
This did thine ancient prophets teach,
And this thy well beloved preach."

I turn now to my second task, and try to enumerate some of the obstacles in the way of this religion of love. First, I think one of the most common perplexities is the persistent assumption, born out of a crude philosophy, that love springs from some fractional part of human nature called the heart, which fraction is ever arraying itself against another fraction of human nature called the head. Much of our religious thought is based on this assumed antagonism. It proceeds on the theory that justice is in perpetual conflict with love, and that this conflict is carried into the very center of the godhead. The old rhetoric of the pulpit used to draw vivid pictures of the great debate in the council chambers of heaven, in which justice and love figured as the rival disputants for the possession of man. This desperate dispute was not settled until Jesus came forward and decided the case in favor of love by appeasing justice with his precious blood. God is love, says the prophetic voice. "Aye," groans the theologian, "but He is just also;" and deals with the problem as though these two words represented the irreconcilable sides of a paradox. All this degrades sentiment into sentimentality. That is a false judgment that assumes for one moment that it is possible to be just without being loving, or that it is possible to be loving and at the same time to be unjust. The experience of humanity, as well as the largest generalization of science, proves that love and justice are not foes, but friends; nay, there are not two of them, but one. They are the two syllables in one word. Love is the emphasis of justice; it is the divine seal that makes authoritative, executive the decrees of judgment. Justice establishes the balance, the even poise between atom and atom, between neighbor and neighbor, between man and woman, between humanity and God—and love causes these forces to clinch and hold. One is impossible without the other. Material atoms are nicely poised by the balances of attraction and repulsion, but it takes fervid heat to fuse these particles into solid rock and precious metal. Justice holds human beings to the nice balance of rights and duties in a moral universe; love touches this balance with a heat that melts all into one supreme interest. Love is justice in earnest; it is duty changed into a privilege, obligation glorified into an opportunity. Justice says, you must do this; love says, of all things this is what I desire to do. Justice constructs the engine, fits the parts and lays the track; love builds the fire under the boiler, and it goes. Love is justice with the bandage torn off her eyes. O, but you say, love is blind. I do not believe it. Injustice is; reckless passion is blind, but love is illuminated,—it is all eye. No one feels so keenly the short-comings of a child as the mother that bore him, save that one that loves the child more than mother. No, love is not inanity; it is no sentimentalist, it is divinely stern. It will use the cruel knife and guide it through quivering flesh, if thereby the insidious cancer can be removed. Love can hurt when hurting is helpful. It will not curse the loved one with any pitiable dole of pity. That is the severest chastisement, as so many of us have realized, that which is administered in tears. Every patient knows that the loving surgeon has a stern touch; he handles the broken limb with a firm hand. Judgment is the material with which love builds her most enduring fabrics. Well does the poet say—

"The learned eye is still the loving one."

You find me a full heart, and I will find not far away a large head to feed the fires of that heart. O, we little know how strong is love, how deliberate and reliant is love. I remember with awful vividness that long sick, helpless day at Corinth, where I lay at the outer edge of the battle, where the wasted waves of carnage broke incessantly around my feet. I saw strong men in those amateur days with blanched faces grow weak by the sight of torn limbs and mangled corpses. I saw the knife drop from the nerveless fingers of incipient surgeons as they stood appalled by the flow of patriot blood; when the frail form of a woman, a seeming shadow among the large-limbed men rushed forward, grasped the severed artery, staid once more the crimson flow, and summoned back to duty the bigger, though the weaker vessels at her side, she was the stronger because she loved the more. The poet's dictum is equally true when reversed: "The loving eye is still the learned one." When the hot breath of the advancing flame drives back the stalwart fireman, a mother rushes into the red hot jaws of the flames, gropes her way through smoke and falling timber to the child, and returns triumphantly with it in her arms. She loved more, hence her stronger judgment. I do not forget my last Sunday's sermon, and I hope you do not. Justice is still the paramount thing in religion. It is piety unimpaired with selfishness; but justice would ever fail of fruition were not love ever near to enforce its behests. Let me repeat, love is justice in earnest. Love is right militant, is truth active; it is religion in the concrete, it is embodied piety, it is faith in a life not faith in a creed,—it is life. Away, then, with that mediæval phantom that is afraid that love will interfere with justice, and is suspicious of its power in the world. The honor of men and the rights of women are safe in the stern hands of love, and they are safe nowhere else. Love, when asked by justice, promptly draws on the steel gauntlet, and, if need be, most dexterously it can use the sword.

"Till out strode Gismond: then I knew
That I was saved. I never met
His face before; but, at first view,
I felt quite sure that God had set Himself to Satan. Who would spend
A minute's mistrust on the end?"

"And e'en before the trumpet's sound
Was finished, prone lay the false knight,
Prone as his lie, upon the ground:
Gismond flew at him, used no sleight
O' the sword, but open-breasted drove,
Cleaving till out the truth he clove."

The common conception of love in religion is, I think, that the prodigal when he went away from home left love behind him. Love staid on the farm to feed the calf, that it might be ready for the dinner when the wayward returned; but the truer conception is that love went with that bad boy and staid with him. It was love that parted him from his gold, made hard his bed, and tore into shreds his garments. Love made bitter the husks and still more bitter his reflections among the swine. Love was just as active in wringing tears out of his debauched life as it was in changing his penitential rags for the best robe of hope and endeavor. I repeat, then, that this essential element of religion, this tremendous power that is to influence men and women into noble deeds and high living, is no maidenly inanity that faints at the sight of a tear, that will veil the eye of justice with a glamor of pity, or will pinion the arm of justice with any bandage of mercy,—because the arm of justice is the arm of love; there is but one arm for this one verity. Cut this body in two, and neither part, no, nor both parts put together again by any contrivance is ever a human body; so with the soul,—dismember it and you destroy it. Take the head out of religion, and you have no heart left in it worth speaking of. Your sentiment will grow into sentimentality, and your affections will end in affectation. And take love out of religion, take feeling out of the soul, and you have no justice left; you have only a cold stone image which you call justice, which will make the very multiplication table lie, and the Golden Rule cruel.

A second obstacle to the religion of love is logically connected with this one we have been discussing. The crude metaphysics that dissected the soul of man, put love and justice into antagonism, of course has passed over into theology. It has enthroned above a cruel divinity, and this God reacts upon the men and women who worship him. So long as men are taught of a jealous, vengeful God, so long will the hearts of his worshipers be sullen and morose, so long will they, in sullen imitation of their God, continue to hate and persecute. To such all the fires of the sun will fail to make a cheerful glow of this sunny world of ours. While the highest conception of being that men carry about with them in their bosoms is of one who, in his infinite wisdom of finite weaknesses, still persists in tossing the poorest and weakest of his creatures into any form of deathless damnation, so long will such men hate without reason, condemn without mercy, resent without judgment, distrust the forces that cradle them, and reject the messengers of the most high that are sent to them. So long will they try to divorce justice from love and so lose both. And their lives will continue to remain miserable. But when men will learn that the reins of the universe are held in impartial hands, that all the tumultuous play of forces, from the seethings of a volcano up to the eruptions of a French Revolution, ever tends to make mind, free mind—that is, minds unobstructed on the lines of their larger evolution, minds permitted to move on the lines of their greatest opportunity and highest estimate—then will they gather courage in the turmoil and find peace in the conflict. When men learn that there is one tender solicitude for the growth of life and the development of soul, reaching from the protozoan, who measures one one-thousandth of an inch in diameter, up through Shakespeare to the highest archangel wherever he may be, they will learn to condemn not, and with the loving justice of him who uncomplainingly endured the cross and bade men go “sin no more” they will work and wait with that cheerfulness that is both just and loving. While pulpit or creed teach of a jealous God solicitous for his own glory, so long will religion remain to some minds a sort of a spiritual sulky, two-wheeled and single-seated, in which they try to win heaven for themselves. But when they realize that all the forces of God are friendly forces, that, as Emerson says, the universe takes care of the culture of the boy who tries to do his duty, that all the experiences of life, bitter and sweet, if properly understood and rightly utilized are conducive to excellence, then will the lives of men become more and more loving, and they will carry benedictions wherever they go. The worst atheism is a belief in a bad God, because it breeds hatred, wrath and jealousy, and these are to life what darkness is to light, what cold is to heat,—the absence of them.

“O Father of All,
Thou lovest all! Thy erring child may be Lost to himself, but never lost to thee.
All souls are thine; the wings of morning bear
None from that presence which is everywhere
Nor hell itself can hide, for Thou art there.”

A third barrier in the way of the religion of love is found in our crude faith in the superior power of the physical. We still are children of our barbarian ancestry and believe tremendously in outward facts to the neglect of inward verities. The thought that brute violence is more terrible than anything else still lingers in the preaching of to-day, and it forms the practical creed of too many of us. My friend admits to me that this religion of love is a very desirable thing among cultivated and right-minded people, that he himself finds food in none other, but that it has little power over the vicious and no terror for the sinner; consequently he pays his money to the support of the church that deals still in some hell-fire tortures for the benefit of the ignorant, the vicious and the depraved. There are plenty of preachers who will conscientiously tip a knowing wink to the wise ones in their congregation, and say: “God can not be as bad as our creed; there may be even a probationary chance for a heathen after death. But it is best to keep the fires of hell alive yet in the public mind as a protection to morals, even though they may not exist anywhere else.” Somebody won fame during our great war by saying that hell had become a military necessity while treason lasted. “Rule by love if you can, but if you fail, rule anyhow,” is the practical instruction, I suppose, to most of our school-teachers.” As if love was not the most force-full of all the forces, as if it is not the most stern of all stern. Love is the right arm of omnipotence. Where it goes it must triumph because it is enkindled right, it is justice red hot, it is truth with the steam up. Love tames the wildest horse, the most skillful horsemen know no other power; love domesticates the eagle, makes a pet of the panther, causes the lion to withdraw his fangs, and makes his paws as harmless as a silken glove. Is the lowest and weakest savage less amenable to the religion of mercy and the forces of love than these. Shakespeare and Robert Browning notwithstanding, I believe that there is no Caliban wearing the remotest semblance of humanity but that can be reached by love, and when reached can be lifted up and quickened by love. When love fails to control an unruly life, to discipline a lawless school, to manage a turbulent populace, then hate and wrath may well give over the task. Of course I mean no rose-water sensibility, no limp tenderness, but I mean the strong, heartfelt grasp that brings to bear every movement of the mind and applies the latest dictates of wisdom and knowledge. I mean the love that is clear-eyed to see all deformities and to see also the flickering sparks of goodness and righteous ambition in the darkest recesses.

Now for our fourth undertaking,—What are the signs of this great religion of love? First, last and always, love makes religion helpful, it shames the soul out of a whining concern for its own salvation, it fills it with a noble yearning for the salvation of others. The selfish, “What shall I do to be saved?” of the revival room is changed into the sublime prayer of forgetfulness, “What can I do to save?” Love gives the weakest something to do,—makes a work-bench for the most helpless. Usefulness is the watchword of the religion of love. Its devotees prefer, like the robin, the Bron-rhydden, the “scorched-breast” of the fable to burn their bosoms in carrying drops of cold water to cool the parched tongues of those who writhe in the lowest hell, rather than have a seat in the high galleries of heaven where, in uninterrupted idleness, they may listen to harping seraphs and choir-ing cherubs.

Love brings trustfulness; the loving soul is a confiding one, for “perfect love casteth out fear.” However conflicting may be the “broken arcs” upon the earth, the religion of love teaches us to believe that they all conspire to make in some high “heaven the perfect round.” Failure itself is evidence that the soul is made for some fullness that can not fail. Love relates us to the ultimate purposes, gives us great zeal for the universal. Show me the man who is patient in the face of difficulties, tolerant in the face of opposition, broad in the face of narrowness, and I will show you the man who has a loving soul, and him I call religious, however undogmatic his thought and however unsatisfactory his creed may be.

The last sign of the religion of love I wish to speak of is cheerfulness, and this may well include all others. I challenge the religion of any man or woman who does not add something to the moral sunlight of the world. Such a religion has a poor right to exist, and the sooner it gets out of the world the better for the world. Religion has too long been allowed to drape itself in sable garbs. I believe that it is yet to appear that one of the most malignant forms of impiety is that which takes the form of the “blues.” I know that despondency may and does often spring from physical causes; I know what a burden is sometimes entailed upon us by our ancestry in this matter. But it behooves us to learn that such a disposition, however we may come by it, carries with it terrible moral results, and we must, each and all of us, hold ourselves morally responsible for depreciating the spiritual life about us. Cheerfulness is the oxygen in the spiritual air, breathing which vitalizes the blood and invigorates the life of the soul, while despondency and discouragement is to the soul what malaria is to the body,—a subtle, pervasive poison, which baffles the physician’s skill, and is the starting point of the diseases that infect modern life. Are you cross and petulant? The doctor may tell you you have a torpid liver, and he is right; but I also tell you that you may have a torpid heart, an inactive head. Your life is wanting in love. And I, also, am right, and some day the doctor and I will agree about your case, and we must compound our prescriptions before the difficulty is reached. Is mankind ungracious; do things conspire against us? Oh, let us look within and find our barrenness, see how naked are the walls of the soul. Then let us open wide our eyes; let us look around us, about us, beneath us, everywhere, and see that the world is full of throbbing, vigorous, beautiful, growing life. Let us take some of this into our own life and enlarge the boundaries of our being. When we cease to hate we forget to mourn. The only pessimism to be dreaded is that born out of unloving lives. Don’t accuse me of preaching the easy gospel of the healthy to the fortunate,—I confront the facts of a poverty-stricken world. The day is cold and it means misery. I know the grave and the sick bed is in the world. I have felt the touch of grim hands; I know the weight of burdens, and it is in the face of these that I still say that life does not warrant the funeral garb, the sepulchral tone and the downcast eye that do so frequent the altars of religion, because love is capable of lightening all these burdens, and mellowing all these sorrows. Love has enabled souls to turn from new-made graves to sing and to teach others to sing, "How beautiful it is to be alive!" Love has made the sick-chamber a larger world of usefulness and joy than the halls of mirth and revelry; and many a poor man in this world has, by the power of love, made a home in the world which the capitalist, with his millions, lacking love, has failed to do. The log cabin of the one is a sunny spot in the landscape; the stately column, reared of polished marble, of the other, is as a gloomy presence, chilling and darkening the horizon.

For your concluding question, the one I ask so often in this pulpit,—ask, that I may have a chance to answer it, I have no new answer to those who are accustomed to hear me preach—How am I to obtain this love, this divine passion for justice?

I would like to love God, but I do not know Him. I have sought Him, but can not find Him. Again your failure comes in trying to grasp this cosmic law of unity. Our little systems attempt to divide the indivisible, to separate the inseparable. We talk of divine love as though it was something from human love. I tell you, the love of God is the love of man, and they are interchangeable terms, or rather both of them phrases thrown out toward a reality big enough to include both. The affections of heaven are not opposed to the affections of earth. I know not how to divide and classify this sublimest passion of the human soul. You can not cut it up into kinds and say one is good and the other bad, if you do not even know what the phrase "love to God" means;—very well, love mankind; take your age and race into affectionate embrace. Again you reply: "I would, if I could, but I can not. Men are so vulgar, women so flippant, humanity so low, taken in bulk, I do not like it." Very well; cherish profoundly your affections for husband or wife, son or daughter, father or mother. "But I have no father or mother, no brother or sweetheart." Very well; love your dog; take into your heart a canary bird or a rose-bush, if there is room for nothing more. You remember the misanthropic prisoner, in that charming little French story of "Picciola," who won his way back to his home, his country, his kind and his God through the help of the little flower that pushed its way up through the cracks in the stone pavement in the prison yard. Begin there, and you have a bit of the love that is divine—you have found so much of God. Put your reading, your wisdom, your affection into "the meanest flower that blows," and it will give you thoughts too deep for tears, until at last, like Schiller, you will "want to take the world" into your arms and kiss it. You will find that you can not do justice to the wife that you do love, unless you have a thought for the beggar boy in Bombay. The tears of a child over the dead body of a pet bird spring from the same fountains of love as that which will one day cause her to brood children, croon over grandchildren, to reach out into the neighborhood, to all the world, to look up into the unfathomable depths and feel the real presence of the Father above all and beneath all, in whom "we live and move and have our being." Begin anywhere and love anything with the wisdom of a rational being and the inspiration of justice in your soul, and you love God. "You loved the child too much, so God took it away from you, lest you make an idol of it to His exclusion," is the way preachers used to talk. I decline to reverence such a God, and devoutly deny His existence. Commend me rather to the lowly piety of the gentle Cowper, who said, "I would not enter on my list of friends the man who needlessly sets foot upon a worm." The religion of love does not necessitate the rhapsodical piety difficult to understand and seldom experienced, though far be it from me to deny the reality of such; but it is the obedience to the simple, natural impulses of human nature; it is the discharging aright of your functions as a factor in the home, as a neighbor and as a citizen. Thus inevitably you become a member of the household of humanity, a grateful inheritor of the past, a diligent contributor to the future. And this is religion.

THE HOME.

Snow Bound.

Inside one's home, with plenty of fuel, food and light is a very comfortable place to be snow bound. We felt this, and did not complain when looking from our windows on Thursday, January 26, we saw the door-yard piled full, the barn doors blocked, and our once vine-clad sunny south door piled half its height with snow. Drift upon drift covered the walls, fences and the huge pile of wood in the yard. The snow was blown by the high wind into mammoth piles unknown in this region for years; all day the tempest raged, but our coal fire burned bright the while, and we had plenty of nuts and apples. These, with our reading and the work that willing hands ever find to do, made us quite contented.

Friday morning came, but no foot-track of either man or beast broke the smooth hillocks of pure white snow. The sun rose displaying millions of diamonds,—not black diamonds, dead and lusterless, as seen upon Chicago's snow, but ablaze with beauty. The expanse of pure, spotless snow, with a background of evergreen trees, would scarcely recognize with brotherliness the filthy snow of the city. Imagine the moonlight upon this scene of purity! 'Twas like a bride dressed for the altar. The smoke curled upward from our neighbors' chimneys, and through the still air we heard the lowing of their cattle and the cackling of their fowls. Our chore-boy dug a channel to the little shop across the yard, but ventured no farther, and spent the day building a rat trap. At night the howling wind shrieked and moaned through the tall fir trees in the yard. Never did the wind seem more angry. It spent itself at last, and Saturday morning it was calm; so from over the hill a mile away came young Parker, with snow-shoes on his feet and a shovel on his back, to help "break out."

Once again we were in communication with the outer world. No stage could scale the mountainous drifts, and our mail was brought from Concord (seven miles) on the back of our brave stage driver. Let those who have their mail placed upon their table daily, and who need only go round the corner to post a letter, think of us snowed in a mile away from the post-office. We watch eagerly for a neighbor going to the village, knowing that he will bring the mail for all the neighborhood.

This is a winter that calls for deeds, not words. God pity the poor!

A Boy's Prayer.

Omaha Mamma—"There now, stop chattering and say your prayer."
Little Son—"Make sister shut up so I can. Say, mamma, can"—
"I told you to stop talking."
"I know. Can you—"
"Say your prayers!"
"Yes, I'm goin' to. Now I layedowntosleep I prayth' Lordmysoul tokeepif Ishoulddie before awakelprayth' Lordmesoultotake say mamma, can you move your ears?"

The above is clipped from the Household Monthly. There is many a mother who questions whether it is of any use to compel her boy to do a thing continuously which he neither understands nor cares for in the least. Yet she might not be troubled with doubts when insisting that he hang his cap in the hall, always, when he comes into the house, even if he didn't care to, nor understand why it wasn't just as well to toss it on the parlor sofa; or, when steadily insisting upon his prompt and regular attendance at school, as he grows older; upon good manners and honest performance in everything. In time the habits become a part of himself, and the meaning which lies behind them gradually sinks into his life, shaping it for better or worse.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Philadelphia.—The members of the Germantown church made Friday evening, the 10th, notable by a celebration of the fifth anniversary of the installation of their present minister. Every reception in which the heart shares is of course successful, but I think this one to Mr. Clifford, which seemed to witness an almost unanimous rejoicing in his spiritual methods and success at Germantown, was, in some respects, unusual, and in all respects gratifying to those rightly informed as to the spontaneity of the offering. There was nothing parsimonious in the spirit with which the occasion was invested. The courtesies of invitation were spread generously to all the liberal societies, and, I believe, to at least many representatives of orthodox churches who could properly be approached. I recognized there myself familiar faces from the Ethical and Camden societies, as well as from the older churches, and the feeling throughout was cordial, as fitly might have been expected of any demonstration of fellowship with which Mr. Clifford, or any person who understood him, was in any way connected. There was nothing formal in the incidents of the evening. The decorations of the parlor, the feast spread in a neighboring room, the ever changing groups of interested talkers, gave simplicity and beauty its free way. Some absent members sent up from the south a remembrance of palmetto and palm leaves. Of the representatives of the societies, Messrs. Ames, Weston and Haskell were present. Although no stated recognition of the honor done him was given on the evening in question, Mr. Clifford preceded his sermon of the following Sunday with a few brief sentences expressive of his gratefulness. In conclusion, I should say that Mrs. Clifford's meed of influence this day, as in the general life of her husband, must be regarded as a factor which, though not to be defined, is too sure and large to be withheld from mention. The tribute was naturally to both, and had either been absent, there would have been a blunt point to the purpose of the reception. It is to be added, moreover, that the local papers, in so far as they noted the event at all, were awake to the evidences of large inclusiveness by which it was to be remembered.

Fall River, Mass.—The Flower Mission started in the Unitarian church in this city has resolved one branch of its work into a charity organization for the city. The Browning class, limited to seventy-five, has reached a membership of sixty-eight.

San Francisco, Cal.—DEAR UNITY: It is a great delight to receive you every week. We have had the privilege, by invitation, of worshipping in the beautiful Temple Emanu-El until our new church be built—which, you will be happy to know, is to be free from debt. The annual meeting of the Unitarian church was very interesting. According to the report read, we are $5,000 ahead of the "estimates," so far, and we are to have the finest and sweetest toned bell that can be bought, a present from Mr. John Perry, one of the early pillars of the church. The site is a choice one and the plan beautiful. The corner-stone was laid Christmas day—the same corner-stone and the only stone that was in the old church (which was of brick, stuccoed over so that nearly everybody thought it was of stone), with the same and added inclosures. The sarcophagus that contains Starr King's body is to be placed in the lot beside the new stone church.

Dr. Robert Collyer's sermon was grand, and the church was crowded the last time service was held there. You know what glorious sermons and lectures that greatest of living preachers freely gave us while he was here. He spared not himself, he was equal to every demand, soul-satisfying to the crowd that flocked to hear him,—an apostle of good. One lecture he gave to our Channing Auxiliary, and one collection our trustees gave to our society for Christian work. Each of these societies connected with our church has now $1.00 on hand in the treasury.

The Oakland ladies said they had been greatly benefited by Doctor Collyer's preaching for their society. They are first and foremost in energy and achievement, and all good works. Rev. Mr. Wendte made a success of our Pacific Coast conference at Oakland,—you had the particulars. It was one of the most interesting I ever attended.

We are delighted that Hon. Horace Davis, so prominent in our church, so beloved in the Bible-class, so superior a speaker and scholar, is lately elected president of the University of California, and has accepted the position.

Dr. Stebbins gives us, as usual, fine sermons, morning and evening, and a lecture to our Channing religious class every fortnight at his home.

Chicago.—Mr. Jones led the noon teachers' meeting. The lesson was the 15th chapter of Luke—three parables with one meaning. These incomparable parables were Jesus's answer to the charge of the Jews that he consorted with publicans and sinners. The question was asked, Is it right that one silver piece and one sheep should be of more value because lost than those which remain? Ought there to be more rejoicing over the recovery of the lost than over those that always were kept safe? This was answered mainly, No; yet allowance must be made for the keen and intense feeling aroused by experiences while they are new and fresh. Mr. Jones thought the elder son in the Prodigal Son stood for the Pharisaic party among the Jews.

—As the result of four weeks of "revival meetings," conducted upon a broad and non-sensational plan, the Rev. Mr. Conklin, pastor of the Universalist church on the west side, recently welcomed forty new members into his church.

—The Library Association of All Souls church was the recipient of a pleasant windfall the other day in the shape of a complete set of the Encyclopædia Britannica with Stoddart's "American" supplement, from W. H. Rand, Esq., chairman of the board of trustees of the Methodist church across the way. And now the niches on either side the "Unity mantel" in the parlor have realized the prophecy which they have heretofore represented. This gift is not only valuable for its own sake, accessible to any one, and useful to the increasing number of Unity Club workers and other students in the parish, but it is valuable as a pledge of fellowship, a symbol of the good will that overreaches church lines.

St. Cloud, Minn.—Unity church, of this place, was legally organized on February 11, and a board of nine trustees elected by the congregation.

Boston.—The Superintendents' and Teachers' Union will consider at their next meeting the subject of "Temperance in the Sunday-school." —Rev. Geo. L. Chaney, of Atlanta, Ga., last Sunday preached for Rev. J. F. Clarke, who is slightly ill. Mr. Chaney addressed the "Boston Association" on Monday, at the house of Rev. Doctor Cadner. His society is composed of families from the south, the north and the west, about one-third each. He finds large elements of strength and activity in that combination. In Atlanta there now exists very little prejudice against northern men and ways. That prejudice is fast wearing away, even in conservative towns like Aiken, S. C. The south own their need of northern co-operation in the now appreciated education of white and colored children, in feeding newly aroused religious thought, in introduction of the best literature, and in business development, as in commerce, farming, manufactures and mining. Northern Methodist or Presbyterian ministers are received less cordially than northern liberal clergymen. Orthodox ministers there are generally quite as liberal as the advanced evangelical preachers in the north. Since the war, all the people think more carefully, and are given to weighing opinions and ideas with a more accurate beam than before their great struggle.

Toledo, Ohio.—The growth of the new movement at this place continues. Recently it organized under the name of the "Church of Our Father," with the following Bond of Union: "We, whose names are hereunto subscribed, believing that we can better promote pure Christianity—love to God and love to man—by associating ourselves together as a religious society than we could in our individual capacities, unite in the interest of this cause and work. Recognizing the right of private judgment and the sacredness of individual conviction, we require no assent to any doctrinal statement, but welcome all who desire to co-operate with us in advancing the cause of rational thought, religious culture and right living."

Still Hebrews.—Moses Myervitz, of Nashville, Tenn., has published a physiological household handbook, in Hebrew, under the title, "Source of Life," for the benefit of those in this country who "read the Hebrew only, or in preference to any other language!" We supposed there were none such.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Combines, in a manner peculiar to itself, the best blood-purifying and strengthening remedies of the vegetable kingdom. You will find this wonderful remedy effective where other medicines have failed. Try it now. It will purify your blood, regulate the digestion, and give new life and vigor to the entire body.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla did me great good. I was tired out from overwork, and it toned me up." MRS. G. E. SIMMONS, Cohoes, N. Y.

"I suffered three years from blood poison. I took Hood's Sarsaparilla and think I am cured." MRS. M. J. DAVIS, Brockport, N. Y.

Purifies the Blood

Hood's Sarsaparilla is characterized by three peculiarities: 1st, the combination of remedial agents; 2d, the proportion; 3d, the process of securing the active medicinal qualities. The result is a medicine of unusual strength, effecting cures hitherto unknown. Send for book containing additional evidence.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla tones up my system, purifies my blood, sharpens my appetite, and seems to make me over." J. P. THOMPSON, Register of Deeds, Lowell, Mass.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla beats all others, and is worth its weight in gold." I. BABINGTON, 130 Bank Street, New York City.

Liverpool.—A leaflet advertising the February activities of the "Domestic Mission" managed by the Unitarians and led now by the Rev. T. Lloyd-Jones, is before us. This is the way the weeks run: Sundays—Children's religious service in the morning; evening, preaching service, "seats free and hymn-books provided." Books issued after Sunday evening service from the library. Sunday-school in the afternoon. Savings bank deposits received from the children after that service. Mondays—Temperance Society meeting; the programme of the month published. The Provident Society receives deposits of one penny and upward for two hours that day. Tuesdays there is Mothers' Meeting, Married Men's Class and Junior Singing Class. Wednesdays there is a Girls' Club, a shorthand class and religious service. Thursdays a musical and dramatic society meets, and there is a fife-learners' class. Fridays there is the Band of Hope and a Dorcas Society, and the Elder Scholars' Society; this last manages a printing press, runs a reading-room and administers the library of 1,000 volumes. All checks on the Provident Society paid. Saturdays the drum and fife band practice is suspended for the month. Helpers to distribute temperance tracts are called for, and the whole ends with the following rhymed tract, which may be the kind of thing which we ought to have in our "Short Tract" series to do duty with in America, and in certain quarters which our printed word seldom reaches. It is entitled "What Makes a Man," and runs as follows:

"Not numerous years nor lengthened life,
Not pretty children and a wife,
Not pins and chains and fancy rings,
Not any such like trumpery things;
Not pipe, cigar, nor bottled wine,
Nor liberty with kings to dine;
Nor coat, nor boots, nor yet a hat,
A dandy vest or trimmed cravat;
Nor all the world's wealth laid in store;
Nor mister, reverend, sir, nor squire,
With titles that the memory tire;
Nor ancestry traced back to Will;
Who went from Normandy to kill;
Nor thousand volumes rambled o'er;
Nor Latin, Greek, nor Hebrew lore;
Nor judge's robe nor mayor's mace,
Nor crowns that deck the royal race.
These all united never can Avail to make a single man.

"A truthful soul, a loving mind,
Full of affection for its kind;
A spirit firm, erect, and free,
That never basely bends a knee;
That will not bend a feather's weight
Of slavery's chance for small or great;
That truly speaks from God within;
That never makes a league with sin;
That snaps the fetters despots make,
And loves the truth for its own sake;
That worships God, and him alone,
And bows no more than at His throne;
And trembles at no tyrant's nod;
A soul that fears no one but God,
And thus can smile at curse or ban—
This is the soul that makes a man."

India.—The seventeenth, eighteenth and nineteenth days of January the Brahmo Samaj celebrated its fifty-seventh anniversary. The Indian Messenger calls the founding of this church "an event to the religion of India what the French Revolution has been to society. The creation of a theistic church, accessible to all men, irrespective of color or caste, in caste-trodden and scripture-ridden India, was a marvelous experiment." In another connection this paper speaks of the four characteristic outcomes of this movement as "immediacy, spirituality and catholicity." Lord Ripon, at the head of the English government in India, recognized these three days as legal holidays and ordered that no case in which a Brahmo was concerned should be tried in the court on that day.

Wisconsin is having a "pulpit" of its own, entitled the Wisconsin Unitarian Pulpit. The December number is "The Unitarian Gospel, by T. B. Forbush; the January number, "Jesus Brought Back," by J. H. Crooker. They are neatly printed, and deserve wide circulation. Other things being equal, the native seed in the long run yields the best harvest, so we rejoice in the multiplication of activities.

Deserving of Confidence.—There is no article which so richly deserves the entire confidence of the community as BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES. Those suffering from Asthmatic and Bronchial Diseases, Coughs and Colds should try them. They are universally considered superior to all other articles used for similar purposes. The late Rev. Henry Ward Beecher said of them: "I have never changed my mind respecting them from the first, except I think yet better of that which I began by thinking well of. I have also commended them to friends, and they have proved extremely serviceable."

Every Sunday-school would find it an advantage to have in its possession a sample line of Sunday-school Lessons, for reference or to select from. In preference to sending out returnable sample copies, we offer, at a very low figure, a full set of samples. Our eighteen series of Unity S. S. Lessons, and one copy of Unity Services and Songs, will be mailed, postpaid, upon the receipt of $1.00.

Any numbers ordered as samples with a view to introduction when the full set is not wanted, will be sent, not returnable, at wholesale price.

For Rickets, Marasmus, and all Wasting Disorders of Children.

Scott's Emulsion of Pure Cod Liver Oil, with Hypophosphites, is unequalled. The rapidity with which children gain flesh and strength upon it is very wonderful. "I have used Scott's Emulsion in cases of Rickets and Marasmus of long standing. In every case the improvement was marked."—J. M. MAIN, M.D., New York.

Catarrh, Catarrhal Deafness and Hay Fever.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby catarrh, catarrhal deafness and hay fever are permanently cured in from one to three simple applications made by the patient at home. A pamphlet explaining this new treatment is sent free on receipt of stamp, by A. H. Dixon & Son, 308 West King street, Toronto, Canada.

For The Nervous The Debilitated The Aged.

Medical and scientific skill has at last solved the problem of the long needed medicine for the nervous, debilitated, and the aged, by combining the best nerve tonics, Celery and Coca, with other effective remedies, which, acting gently but efficiently on the kidneys, liver and bowels, remove disease, restore strength and renew vitality. This medicine is

Paine's Celery
Compound

It fills a place heretofore unoccupied, and marks a new era in the treatment of nervous troubles. Overwork, anxiety, disease, lay the foundation of nervous prostration and weakness, and experience has shown that the usual remedies do not mend the strain and paralysis of the nervous system.

OUR HEREDITY FROM GOD.

BY E. P. POWELL.

This work is a study of evolution with special reference to its moral and religious bearing. "It is impossible to give even in outline a sketch of the long and accumulative argument by which the moral beauty and religious satisfaction of the evolutionary aspect of nature is unfolded in Mr. Powell's mind."
